Mr. Heald: I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) on introducing the Bill, which builds on the achievements of MAVIS, Crowthorne and the motability scheme, which have given many people a degree of independence that they had not enjoyed hitherto. A young constituent of mine returned from the Falklands conflict seriously injured. He was extremely depressed and anxious and had lost much of the morale and fortitude for which we had known him. Now that he has been to Crowthorne, used the MAVIS scheme and got his motor car through motability, he is a changed man. He is living an independent life and is much more like the person we all knew before he went to the Falklands. I therefore pay tribute to MAVIS and all its achievements.

Having achieved the degree of independence that a motor car can bring and having had the opportunity to learn to combat their disability, the many people like my constituent would be much better able to teach other disabled people to drive effectively than a fully able-bodied person who did not understand some of the difficulties.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My hon. Friend has reminded me of a point that I intended to make. Someone qualified to be a driving instructor using only an automatic transmission car will not be confined to teaching only disabled people; he will be able to teach anyone who wants to qualify to drive by himself in an automatic transmission car. Rather than providing for specialist driving instructors, we seek to remove a barrier. I am sorry that I did not make that plain.

Mr. Heald: I have read the Bill and I entirely accept that point. It seems to me, however, that someone who has striven to overcome his disabilities can shed a new light on the business of instructing someone with similar disabilities in how to drive a vehicle. That important aspect commends the Bill to the House.

I must say that I was surprised to be described as a radical Turk. I have always been a Conservative, but I do not think that I have ever been radical. In considering a measure that deals with the attainment of a vocational qualification, it is important to examine the experience in other professions. I am ashamed to admit that I am a barrister because I know that we are not popular in this place. Usually, someone seeking to attain a professional qualification has no appeal. If he fails the examination, he is usually given the opportunity to have another go, but he cannot usually have the assessment reviewed by the Secretary of State in an attempt to second-guess the original assessor or examiner. If we are considering a vocational qualification, it is far better to grant the right to retake the examination or assessment than to review it.

Mr. Luff: The parallel with a professional qualification is a little forced. The new clause refers to the emergency control certificate which is an additional requirement over and above the vocational examination which a disabled person will have to take and for which no new appeal procedure is suggested.

10.30 am

Mr. Heald: I believe that we are talking about a vocational qualification. It is a qualification to allow someone to teach driving. It is not like a criminal case or an assessment for benefit. It is a vocational qualification. I believe that it would be wrong to have a system with an overlying appeal process which would create bureaucracy in the Department of Transport.

One of the great strengths of the Bill, which I agree should be passed and is achievable, can be found in the explanatory memorandum which, in relation to the states:

"Financial and public service manpower effects of the Bill"

"The Bill will have no direct financial effects.

The Bill will have no effects on public service manpower."

Mr. Peter Bottomley: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend is coming close to suggesting that my new clause is out of order. I believe that my hon. Friend is almost making a direct criticism of the Chair. If my new clause affects public service manpower, would it have been called for debate? I am very worried about this.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): The hon. Gentleman is aware that that is a matter for the Chair to decide.

Mr. Heald: I do not wish to stray out of order on this point and I know that I will not be allowed to do so.

It is important to consider that, although the new clause may not be out of order, a layer of bureaucracy would be created and inevitably that would mean that staff at the Department of Transport would have to deal with the appeals.

We do not know how many people would take the test. I believe that there are 100,000 disabled drivers, very few of whom may want to take the assessment. However, perhaps a far larger number than we imagine might decide to take it. When we consider that it is a logical career for a disabled person who has acquired the skills to want to pass on that knowledge, perhaps a substantial number of people might want to grasp this opportunity. If that is the case, many people in the Department of Transport will have to deal with the appeals.

If that is the case, we should consider whether that is an example of creating bureaucracy and red tape and the kind of things which we as Conservatives—even if we are not radical—do not normally support. I argue that it is unnecessary to create this new layer of bureaucracy because, with a national vocational qualification, we would not expect this kind of appeal.

We can tackle the issue with amendment No. 22. That amendment would reduce the period between which tests can occur to three months rather than six months. I would support that because if the three-month period were in operation, people——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying into another debate.

Mr. Heald: I will not go down that line, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Given that it is possible to take the test again relatively speedily, the position would be entirely different if we approved the new clause. Twenty-eight days' notice of appeal would probably mean that a decision would not be made for at least three months and possibly six months anyway. It might be better for an aggrieved person to take the test again and not go through the appeals procedure. Even on the grounds of efficiency and getting the job done for the aggrieved person, I believe that it is likely to be better to opt for a shorter period between tests.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam), whose championing of the causes of the disabled is unrivalled in this place. I am absolutely delighted that he came so high in the ballot and that he has introduced this Bill.

It is remarkable that we have continued for so long with this inequality in our system. The more that I consider the problems of disabled people, the more inequalities I find. Although we have come a long way, I believe that we still have a long way to go.

The fact that the Bill has all-party support is delightfully refreshing. Although hon. Members are thin on the ground in the Chamber today, the way in which the Bill was introduced and its passage through Committee are an endorsement of the will of the House and of the political will of all parties to support it.

Ms Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North): In view of what the hon. Lady has just said about all-party support for this Bill, will she join us in support of the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill, which was talked out on an earlier occasion?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) must not go down that road.

Mrs. Gillan: Thank you for that advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I must admit that I have sympathy for the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley). She has championed her cause almost single-handedly on the Opposition Benches.

Mr. Luff: Some Conservative Members believe that the Road Traffic (Driving Instruction by Disabled Persons) Bill is a better example of the kind of targeted employment legislation which can bring real benefit to disabled people than the more omnibus approach suggested in the Bill referred to the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are discussing the Road Traffic (Driving Instruction by Disabled Persons) Bill and new clause 4 and no other Bills.

Mrs. Gillan: I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff). The Bill reflects a practical way of approaching some of the problems of disabled people.

I contrast this Bill and the way in which the House can be seen to be behaving at its best with some of the scenes over the past few weeks and months, when the House has not sent the right message to the rest of the country and when it was seen to be behaving at its worst. It is a pleasure to be here on an occasion on which the House is perceived to be performing its duty towards the people of the country.

It is the role of the House to look after the small sections of the population that are often left behind and forgotten when we are introducing legislation. We must never forget that we should examine our citizens and society closely and strive continually to help the small groups of people who are perhaps disadvantaged unfairly or left out when we are legislating for the country as a whole. In a ten-minute Bill next week, I will try to redress the balance for a small section of our population—parents who adopt children—who I believe to be disadvantaged.

The Bill will be welcomed throughout the country and when my hon. Friend the Minister replies, I hope that the time scale will become apparent and that we will know when we can expect the first disabled driving instructor to be operating in this country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady is making a Third Reading speech. She should return to the new clause.

Mrs. Gillan: I will defer to your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

New clause 4 was ably moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley). I am pleased that he has introduced the possibility of an appeal. After all, in the assessment of a disabled person seeking to practise as a driving instructor, an important medical element may demand a second opinion. It will be subjective. Therefore, for some elements of the assessment, two points of view will need to be brought to bear. During the passage of the Bill—perhaps when it is considered in the other place—I hope that we can ensure that disabled people who apply for the emergency control certificate will not be disadvantaged in any way compared with able-bodied drivers who are assessed during their period as driving instructors. If able-bodied driving instructors do not come up to standard, there is a period in which they can still instruct and then be reviewed. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald) that perhaps 28 days is not long enough. When we introduce a level of bureaucracy, which must accompany this——

Mr. Duncan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way on the question of bureaucracy, which was mentioned a moment ago. It may be fallacious to suggest that an enormous layer of bureaucracy would be created by this measure. If there are, say, 200,000 registered disabled people in the United Kingdom, perhaps at the outset a maximum of something like 1,000 may wish to register under the scheme.

Once the system is up and running, in the years ahead, fewer people may apply for the emergency control certificate and we will find that only 20 or 30 a year need to invoke the appeals procedure. Even the least efficient of civil servants—increasingly, our civil servants are becoming more efficient—will be able to sustain the burden of a mere 20 or 30 appeals without great cost to the Exchequer—if, indeed, any at all.

Mrs. Gillan: I imagine that the number of appeals will be fairly small. When the Bill goes through the other place, I hope that we will carefully ensure that we do not disadvantage disabled people and create another barrier for them over that of able-bodied driving instructors.

I said earlier that the Bill will be welcomed throughout the country. It will certainly be welcomed by my disabled residents in Chesham and Amersham. We are opening new horizons for disabled people. I wish the Bill a speedy passage on to the statute book.

Sir John Hannam (Exeter): This has been an excellent debate on the new clause proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) and other hon. Friends. It has given us an opportunity to examine in some detail the emergency control certificate assessment system. A number of interesting points have been raised which I hope to deal with in my speech.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham for his remarks about the importance of the Mobility Advice and Vehicle Information Service—MAVIS, as my favourite girlfriend is now known—advice centre because it plays a crucial role in advising disabled drivers all over the country on what sort of vehicles they need and the necessary adaptations, generally giving them confidence to embark on driving their own vehicles and getting their own mobility.

I shall start with a few words about the way in which the assessment is carried out, because it will help in my later arguments for resisting the new clause. The assessment will take place at MAVIS using one of a fleet of cars. An extensive fleet of cars is available—I have photographs of the range provided and the different adaptations. The assessment can also be carried out in a vehicle supplied by the person undertaking it. The choice of vehicle used will depend entirely on how the specific vehicle has been adapted.

The assessment will be subjective and will assess a person's performance. The driving adviser will act as the pupil. When I went to Crowthorne I tried out several vehicles and went through the test procedure. I behaved as a disabled driver with the instructor—the assessor—sitting beside me. We then changed round and, pretending to be disabled and using the adaptations, he tested my ability to effect an emergency stop. Under the system, the driving adviser will act as the pupil and the disabled driver undertaking the assessment will take the role of the driving instructor. It will be a practical assessment in a moving vehicle around the test area at Crowthorne. The potential driving instructor will be expected to take control of the steering and braking at any time—in other words, in any emergency—at various stages of the test course.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Colchester, South and Maldon): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I apologise for interrupting my hon. Friend, but the annunciator says that my hon. Friend the Member for Ravensbourne (Sir J. Hunt) is speaking at present, rather than my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam). I know that many hon. Members may wish to come and hear my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter. I apologise: the annunciator has now been changed and hon. Members may come to hear my hon. Friend's speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I note that it has now been changed.

Sir John Hannam: It is nice to have the right name on the annunciator. It always takes a little time for the right name to appear.

Potential driving instructors will be expected to demonstrate control of braking and acceleration for the purpose of tuition. They must show that they will be able to carry out all those measures when giving instruction, if they become approved driving instructors. They will need to show that they can correct minor errors and take positive action in a simulated emergency. In the demonstration of their actions, they must show the highest regard to and protection of life and property. The assessment will not look simply at the ability of potential driving instructors to give driving tuition: it will establish that there is a potential for that tuition to be carried out safely.

The main concern expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) and other hon. Friends is that, if an emergency control certificate is refused by the assessor, the disabled driver should be given full reasons for that refusal. I am happy to reassure the House that subsection (9) in new section 133A on page 7 of the Bill clearly requires the assessor to give those reasons for refusing permission.

I appreciate the initial attraction behind the new clause, which is that the Bill should provide disabled persons who are aggrieved by a decision of the assessor with a statutory right of appeal against that decision. That point was considered carefully in the drafting of the Bill, and I hope that I can persuade my hon. Friend for Eltham, for whom I have the the highest regard through his work as a previous transport Minister, that the new clause is not necessary.

It must be right that disabled registered driving instructors and candidate instructors should be treated no differently from their non-disabled counterparts when it comes to rights of appeal. The existing legislation governing the registration of able-bodied driving instructors—the Road Traffic Act 1988—does not provide a statutory right of appeal against the decision of those responsible for assessing the ability of the instructors or the candidate instructors to give instruction. To take it a step further, nor does the existing legislation grant those who fail their ordinary driving test a statutory right of appeal against the decision of the driving examiner.

My Bill seeks to do no more than amend the Road Traffic Act 1988 to put disabled people on a par with those who are not disabled when it comes to registration as approved driving instructors—it is removing a barrier and a discrimination. It does not seek to confer on disabled people statutory rights in respect of giving paid driving instruction which are not available to able-bodied people. We are not creating positive discrimination—moving across the line and, therefore, favouring disabled people. We are simply establishing a level playing field.

There are good reasons why the existing legislation does not grant statutory rights of appeal against the decisions of driving examiners in the assessment of candidate and registered driving instructors. Those reasons also hold good for decisions of assessors of emergency control.

The first reason is that the circumstances giving rise to the decision of the assessor takes place in a moving vehicle. Actions and decisions are made as the person drives along undertaking the various checks and tests. Those circumstances can never be replicated to enable the person or body charged with determining an appeal to arrive at an informed and proper judgment of the decision of the assessor. The problem of replication makes it difficult, if not impossible, to see how an independent third party could arbitrate usefully on the assessment of emergency control. Assessment takes place in a moment under test circumstances.

Four decisions of the assessor of emergency control could aggrieve a potential driving instructor: first, a refusal to grant the control certificate; secondly, a decision to revoke an existing emergency control certificate; thirdly, the period specified in the certificate after the end of which the disabled person should undergo a further assessment —that point has been referred to in the debate; and fourthly, the required modifications to the vehicle, which may also be specified in the certificate.

The first two of those decisions—refusal to grant a certificate and revocation—will turn on the disabled person's ability to satisfy the assessor that he or she can safely exercise control of the vehicle, whether or not it has been modified, in a simulated emergency while giving instruction. Candidates must exercise control not merely in a driving test. They must convince the assessor that they can carry out an emergency control stop while giving instruction.

So any possible appeal against the assessor will be based on the disabled person's opinion that he or she exercised the necessary emergency control, against the assessor's judgment that the person did not exercise that control. Consequently, if the Bill provided a statutory right of appeal against the decision of the assessor, the arbitrator or appeals tribunal appointed by the Secretary of State for Transport would be tasked with deciding whether the assessor's judgment was right.

The independent third party would be expected to second-guess the assessor in respect of an assessment which could not be replicated and which was carried out when the third party was not present. So the arguments brought before any third party responsible for determining such an appeal would be reduced to the assessor maintaining that the disabled person did not exercise the required emergency control, and the disabled person claiming that he or she did.

The House can imagine—my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham pointed this out—the fruitless appeals which would be occasioned by statutory rights of appeal which turned on the professional assessor's judgment. Let us take the analogy of the ordinary driving test, which I suppose that most Members have taken and passed, if not at the first attempt. A driving examiner who failed a candidate might say, "You failed to make proper use of your mirrors and to make a safe controlled emergency stop." The candidate might say, "That was not the case." The examiner would say, "Oh, yes it was." The candidate would say, "No it was not. Furthermore, I shall exercise my statutory right of appeal against your decision to fail me."

Obviously such a dialogue would prove unsatisfactory and create a ridiculous scenario. It would not get the parties in dispute any further. The driving test that gave rise to the appeal could not be replicated. I am sure that the House would not want to create such a scenario in the judgment of emergency control ability. That is the unsatisfactory position which would almost certainly be created.

Mr. Heald: Does my hon. Friend agree that just about the only way of creating a successful appeal process would be something similar to the way in which medical appeals for benefits are treated? A medical appeal tribunal makes its assessment of the person's disability. With an emergency control assessment, an appeal panel would have to undertake a reassessment. Given that that is the only practical way, is it not just as good to allow the disabled person who wishes to become an instructor to take the assessment again, as the Act provides?

Sir John Hannam: My hon. Friend is correct. We have provided for the failed potential driving instructor to come back within a reasonably short period if he or she feels, as we often feel in similar circumstances, that the judgment was wrong. We must create in the Bill fair treatment for potential disabled driving instructors, but, at the same time, ensure that we do not land ourselves with a litigious process which would not work in the long term.

Disabled candidates may rehearse the same arguments over and over again. Many of us, in dealing with our constituents in other matters such as disability allowances, come up against people who rehearse the same case over the years. They feel aggrieved that they do not receive mobility allowance or whatever allowance they wish to claim. We perhaps can see clearly from the first instance that their entitlement is not necessarily established.

If the Bill granted a statutory right of appeal against the decision of the assessor of emergency control, it would be difficult for my hon. Friend the Minister for Roads and Traffic to resist pressure to amend the existing legislation to grant the same rights to all people to appeal against the decisions of driving examiners in connection with the ordinary driving test, vocational driving tests, the approved driving instructor practical tests and the periodic check tests of registered instructors. I submit that there would be no end to the differences of opinion between examiner and candidate.

I am sure that, in discussing the matter today, the House does not wish to question the objectivity and professionalism of the Department of Transport driving examiners. Nor do we wish to question the integrity and objectivity of the driving advisers who would conduct the emergency control assessment. Anyone who goes to the centre will soon come to admire their integrity, expertise and professionalism and the humanitarian approach that they take to the job that they do.

To introduce the concept of a statutory right of appeal against what must be matters of professional opinion could lead to a proliferation of appeals tribunals or something similar. Given that the assessment could not be replicated, the tribunal could do no more than require that the test be taken again. That is what we have provided for in the Bill.

There is nothing in existing legislation or in the Bill to prevent a person from taking a test or assessment again. A statutory appeals procedure is not necessary to provide that opportunity. The Bill enables a disabled person to apply for reassessment, although six months must elapse before a further assessment may be undergone at that person's request.

The six-month period is intended to prevent time wasters who have no realistic chance of satisfying the emergency control assessor. Without the six-month minimum period between assessments, such time wasters might be encouraged to seek more frequent assessments, especially because there will be no fee for that assessment.

The most that the third party could conceivably do when faced with what amounted to differing opinions on emergency control ability would be to order a reassessment. We can agree that the third party could not reach a judgment and would have to order a reassessment. If the arbitrator ordered a reassessment, unless the assessor of emergency control had acted perversely—that is an unlikely event—the outcome of the reassessment ordered by the third party arbiter would almost certainly be the same as that which occasioned the appeal in the first instance.

I submit that the assessment of emergency control is essentially black and white. The disabled person will either be able or unable to exercise the necessary control. That will be perfectly obvious during the test. In most, if not all, cases, I am sure that the disabled person would be in no doubt about whether emergency control was demonstrated. If the car finishes up in the trees, he has not done the job and knows that he has not passed. It is as simple as that. So I am sure that the House agrees that disabled people are not being disadvantaged by the Bill's not containing a statutory right of appeal against the decision of an assessor to refuse to grant an emergency control certificate or in cases where the assessor revokes an existing certificate.

In practice, there will be few cases of doubt. The assessment that was the subject of appeal could not be replicated. The best that a statutory right of appeal could provide would be the power of a third party to order a reassessment. The Bill already provides for a disabled person to apply for reassessment and that person would already have received in the refusal full reasons why he had been refused his emergency control certificate.

We would not want to do anything under the Bill that offered the prospect of statutory rights of appeal against decisions of professional Government officials in respect of driving tests or in the execution of the practical aspects of the approved driving instructor examination. The sensible thing is for the aggrieved candidate to take the test again. That is what many hon. Members will have had to do before tearing up their L plates. That is what underlies the lack of a statutory right of appeal in the existing legislation governing driving tests and the driving instructor examination. That is why I omitted from the Bill a statutory right of appeal against the judgment of the assessor.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) spoke about the medical aspects of the system. A disabled person might want to appeal against the period specified by the assessor in the emergency control certificate after the end of which that person should undergo a further assessment, which is set when there are doubts about a deterioration in that person's condition. Secondly, an appeal could be lodged on the modifications to the vehicle that the assessor considers necessary for the purpose of giving driving instruction. Essentially, those decisions are based on medical questions and the assessor's decision will be informed by the extent and nature of a person's physical disability.

In most cases, it is anticipated that disabled people applying for an emergency control assessment will have a stable condition, for example, paraplegia, where there is little or no likelihood of that condition worsening. In those cases, the assessor is unlikely to specify a period after which a further assessment should be undergone. Any worsening in such a person's physical condition, such as to render that person incapable of giving safe driving instruction, would, in those circumstances, be picked up as part of the periodic check testing that all registered driving instructors are required to undergo, as my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham pointed out.

The Bill places a duty on the disabled person, like his non-disabled counterpart, to notify the registrar of approved driving examiners if his physical condition worsens, unless that worsening is expected to be temporary. That duty is laid down under statute.

Any area of dispute about the period after which the assessor specifies that a further assessment should be undergone will arise in those cases where a person is suffering from a progressive illness, which leads to a reduction of physical capacity over time. It is possible to envisage granting a statutory right of appeal to a suitably qualified third party, but disputes about medical conditions are time consuming and costly to resolve. In practice, I do not believe that granting a right of appeal to some sort of independent medical tribunal is necessary.

The assesor will be well versed in the nature of various physical disabilities, whether stable or otherwise, and will have access to medical advice. That advice can come from the candidate's doctor and the Department of Transport's medical adviser. It is difficult to believe that the introduction of a statutory and costly right of appeal to third-party medical opinion would add anything constructive to that informative process.

If the disabled person considers that the assessor has reached the wrong conclusion about the nature or the pace of the progressive disability, it is open to him to produce medical advice to counter the assessor's conclusion. The assessor can then refer that advice to the Department of Transport's medical adviser. There will be a few cases where there is a marked difference of opinion, but I believe that the matter will be best resolved between the disabled person, advised by his medical practitioner, and the Department's medical adviser, without a statutory right of appeal to a medical third party. I hope that the House will agree with me that a statutory right of appeal against decisions of the assessor, for the purposes of the emergency control certificate, relating to the rate of progressive illness would be inappropriate and unnecessary.

That leaves the last possible area of appeals—those made against the decision of the assessor on the modifications to the vehicle, as specified in the emergency control certificate. This is a specialist area and it should be left to the professionalism and expertise of the driving adviser of MAVIS who will conduct the assessment. In practice, I am sure that a disabled person who is determined to become a registered driving instructor would not reasonably object if the assessor specified a modification that the disabled person was not persuaded was wholly ncessary.

Although I do not support the concept of statutory rights of appeal, disabled registered driving instructors will enjoy the same statutory rights of appeal against decisions of the registrar. The existing legislation provides that statutory right against decisions such as the removal of a person's name from the register. Those appeals are considered by appeals tribunals which make recommendations to the Secretary of State for Transport. My Bill, which deals solely with the emergency control certificate, does not change that process.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham, with his wide knowledge as a former transport Minister, will accept my arguments and will feel able to withdraw his new clause. I assure the House that full consideration will be given in another place to the other points raised during the debate. I would therefore ask the House not to accept the new clause.

Ms Walley: I congratulate the hon. Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) on his Bill, which has been subject ot considerable consultation throughout all its stages.

The hon. Gentleman has given us a thorough and comprehensive resumé of the existing safeguards in the Bill. The Opposition do not want to be classified as time wasters, to whom the hon. Gentleman referred, so I shall merely say that we have every confidence in the reply that the hon. Gentleman gave to the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley).

Mr. Peter Bottomley: With the leave of the House, I shall reply to the debate.

We have already agreed that we will all meet MAVIS at Crowthorne in June at the mobility road show.

The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley) has shown today, as she did on Second Reading, that she has gone into the details of the Bill. I know that she supports the Bill and we appreciate that the close work she has done with Lord Ashley is in the interests of people who are overcoming disability.

Although my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) said that he could not support new clause 4, I believe that some of his remarks lend support to an amendment that I hope will be discussed later today.

I am in a slight dilemma. If the estimate of the number of cases of appeal against refusal of the emergency control certificate came to 20, I calculate that my hon. Friend the Minister would be able to handle them personally at the rate of less than one a fortnight. I do not believe that anyone should have any doubt that that is not a matter of bureaucracy, but political judgment. My hon. Friend is well capable of making such a decision. If my hon. Friend is able to go to Crowthorne once a fortnight or once a month and went to one of the other mobility advice centres on the alternate fortnights, many would be persuaded to join him there, especially the media, who have done so much to help disabled people understand that they can get out and about, That would lead to even more barrier jumping.

You were kind, Mr. Lofthouse, when you did not call me to order earlier and I believe that I have an apology to make to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald) because I was guilty of a degree of political incorrectness. I am sorry I described him as I did, but it was meant as a term of praise and endearment. If he does not want to be called a radical whatever—[HON. MEMBERS: "Turk."] I shall call him a moderate Conservative with overwhelming arguments.

If I have exaggerated the scope of the problem, it was well worth raising that apprehension now, rather than after the Bill has proceeded through the House. The most important thing to remember is that the assessors are doing all that they can to try to help people gain the capability, if they do not have it already, to execute an emergency controlled stop of a vehicle under their control. Most people will clearly be able to obtain a certificate without difficulty or they will not obtain one at all. I suspect that the numbers of people on the margins will be small as this is a bi-polar issue—either people are capable or, quite clearly, they are not. The number of occasions when there will be doubt will be small.

I disregard some of the arguments that have been advanced as I do not think that they carry weight. One argument that is valid involves someone at the margin who wants to become a professional driving instructor, when there should be no doubt. In those circumstances, a wait of six months—or whatever period is considered suitable subject to future amendments—is reasonable. Although my heart is with my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff), my head is with my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North. The arguments advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter were overwhelming. Therefore, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 5

APPLICANT'S RIGHT TO ON-SITE MEDICAL EXAMINATION

'. Any applicant may, after giving notice of not less than three weeks, undergo a further medical examination at the site of his assessment centre undertaken by a doctor or qualified medical practitioner approved by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency.'—[Mr. Peter Atkinson.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 16, in clause 1, page 2, line 38 at end insert—

'(7A) On production of a medical certificate by a doctor approved by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency, any person previously recorded as disabled under section 125A(1) of this Act may apply to have the details of his disability removed from the register, and from his driving licence, and be notified by the relevant authority that such removal has taken place.'.

No. 18, in clause 1, page 4, line 37 at end insert

'or

(c) submit himself to any relevant medical examination as may be prescribed by regulations.'.

No. 20, in clause 3 page 6, line 35 at end insert

(c) a medical certificate from a qualified medical practitioner approved by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency detailing every relevant disability or prospective disability.'.

Mr. Atkinson: The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), on a point of order, questioned the motives of some of us for taking part in today's debate on the Bill. I may think that the hon. Gentleman's Bill about the press is an iniquitous attempt to censor it, but I am speaking today because I have a specific interest in the disabled.

My constituency contains Hexham hospital, which is the regional centre for spinal injuries for the whole of the northern region. Therefore, I see at first hand the effects caused, particularly to young people who are seriously injured in road and industrial accidents. They frequently come into town so we see how their recovery progresses and how people with appalling, crippling injuries can become much fitter and restored. The sort of measure proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) provides exactly the opportunity that such people need to find a different job. Therefore, I warmly welcome the Bill, which removes another barrier to the disabled.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): My constituents live side by side with the Stoke Mandeville spinal injuries unit. Constituents of hon. Members on both sides of the House will regard the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) as providing important new opportunities to disabled people. I think that our constituents, as well as hon. Members, will resent some of the insinuations contained in the remarks by the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley).

Mr. Atkinson: I agree with my hon. Friend, and appreciate that, as he has the Stoke Mandeville unit in his constituency, he has even more experience of what happens than I do.

One of the problems that people face on their way to recovery is that of their future. Many of them receive compensation for industrial and motor accidents, but life looks bleak unless they can find something worth while to do. That is why the Bill is so good, and why I largely support it. The only purpose of my amendments is to seek clarification on one or two issues.

I join in the congratulations to the Department of Transport, whose officials have clearly been extremely helpful. We often forget their role. The input of those at the disability unit must be particularly warmly welcomed by those of us who have sought their advice. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister for Roads and Traffic bears in mind my kind words when I come to him seeking a new bypass in my constituency.

The purpose of the new clause and the amendments is to seek clarification about the role of the medical assessor when granting disabled people licences to become driving instructors. Had I gone to MAVIS, who has been mentioned a number of times, my questions would have been answered. I was interested to read the report by the Standing Committee on the Bill and the remarks by my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter about MAVIS I must make an effort to go down to see her for, if no other reason than to eat the rock cakes, of which I am particularly fond, and which my hon. Friend mentioned on Second Reading.

One of my problems relates to when an applicant has a licence granted to him as a disabled driver some time after he visits MAVIS seeking the certificate to become a driving instructor. I am not sure how up to date the medical advice needs to be. The problem is that a disabled driver's licence could have been issued some time ago, and when he arrives at MAVIS his licence could be old and his condition could have deteriorated. The assessor who grants the emergency control certificate will have to make some form of medical judgment about the person seen on the day. I was trying to find out about the advice that the assessor would have in order to make that judgment. I see that on Second Reading it was said that the assessor would have access to medical advice, but I should like to know more about that advice.

New clause 5 gives the applicant the right to claim an on-site medical assessment provided notice is given. I floated that suggestion because it is important that if there were a dispute about the disabled person's condition, that person should be able to turn to an approved medical adviser and doctor for representation on the day. That might overcome some of the problems.

I also want to explore the medical qualifications of the applicant's assessors. They will clearly be skilled in driving and driving instruction. I am anxious to know more about their medical background. That matter was raised a number of times in the Second Reading debate, which was brief, and in Committee, which was also brief.

On Second Reading my hon. Friend the Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox), who is not present, talked about regular retesting and I think that the duty to disclose further disability was mentioned. A disabled driving instructor with a progressive condition has a duty to reveal that to the authorities. However, if someone makes a living from instructing—and given that being disabled makes earning a living harder—clearly, it would not be to his advantage to reveal that his condition was deteriorating, even if he had an obligation to do so. There is regular retesting, but I should like to know the length of the intervals before which the person with the licence is required to return for a test. Obviously, that would depend on the disability. In some cases, it might be advisable for a person to be retested every three months, but for others it might be necessary only every year, which I believe is the maximum allowed.

My other amendments follow the same line in that they require an applicant to provide a medical certificate. They also require that when the DVLA grants a licence, it can insist that the successful applicant returns for regular medical tests. I tabled the amendments because I was not sure whether the Bill covered this point—at least, I could not see it in the Bill. It seemed to me that the Bill perhaps leaves it too much to the disabled instructor's own volition to come forward. Of course, if he does not, he will commit an offence; but I thought that my provision was in the interests of public safety.

One of the other amendments deals with wiping the medical record clean, on medical advice, if a person is cured of his disability. This relates to amendments in a different group by means of which I have sought to incorporate notes of the disability in a record. It will of course be important to note the nature of people's disabilities so as to know whether their condition is likely to get worse. Nevertheless, if a disability has cleared up or disappeared, the record of it should be expunged.

These are certainly technical amendments, designed to illicit some clarity. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter will be able to shed some light on this subject. I reiterate that I believe this to be a worthwhile Bill. My hon. Friend deserves great credit for it, and I wish it an easy passage into law.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): I warmly welcome the Bill, the more so because I know of the deep commitment of my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannan) to getting a fair deal for disabled people in all walks of life.

We all feel a sense of involvement in trying to help disabled people. In my constituency, I have meetings with the Sutton Disabled Association and I know how strongly its members feel that they should have access to all the jobs that able-bodied people have. I am sure that they think that they should be able to become driving instructors, too. A cousin of mine has no hands, but he drives around very deftly. Why should not he be an instructor?

I sympathise with new clause 5. It is important to accord a high priority to a rigorous health examination. That in no way demeans the disabled person. Disabled people do not seek positive discrimination, and it should be clear to all that they are wholly capable of becoming not just drivers, but driving instructors. If there is any doubt about a person's medical condition, he should have the right to ask for a further examination to prove that he is perfectly capable of the task. Likewise, his medical condition should be regularly assessed; we should not rely on his revealing whether he is fit to become a driving instructor.

The Bill can achieve a great deal. It is important to remove all elements of doubt about people's ability to become instructors. After all, learner drivers need to feel confident that their instructors are as capable as able-bodied drivers. That is why this group of amendments deserves serious consideration.

Again, I wholeheartedly congratulate my hon. Friend on the Bill. It is long overdue.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am pleased to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland), and I apologise for having to speak now with my back to her—one cannot face in both directions at once, unless one is a better politician than I am.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) will allow me to speak against his new clause, although I should point out that his remarks may have made it possible to hold truncated debates on other groups, because he ranged widely over the issues.

The test of the assessment should not be whether a driver can make an emergency stop. Any driver needs to be able to do that. The question is whether a supervising driver can bring a vehicle to a controlled stop if the trainee gets out of control. The nearest analogy that I can think of would come from the occasional campaigns to require new drivers and experienced drivers to be extensively eye-tested. Of course, the real test is whether they can see what they need for driving—can they read a number plate at the specified distance? That should show whether their eyes are working well. Eyesight is not usually the key factor in crashes anyway. It is often young people, who have the best eyes, who have the most frequent and the worst crashes.

The point at issue, I repeat, is whether the person will be able to bring the vehicle to a controlled stop. I do not see how medical examinations are relevant to that. Passing or failing such examinations will not necessarily help. The only instance in which an examination would help is when people have disclosed the fact that they have a condition that is predicted to get worse. Some of the other provisions of the Bill may then be used to ensure that they present themselves for retesting.

I shall be interested to hear what my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) has to say in response. I recommend that we stick to the practical question: will the driving instructor actually be able to bring the vehicle to a controlled halt?

Mr. Heald: The Bill deals with people whose driving licences are limited under section 92(5)(b) of the Road Traffic Act—people who require a vehicle of a particular construction or design to be able to drive safely. The sort of people who have a medical condition that is likely to deteriorate over a fairly short period are usually dealt with under section 92(4)(b)—the section in which the Secretary of State must not refuse to grant a licence "on account of any relevant disability which is prescribed for the purposes of this paragraph . . . if the applicant satisfies such conditions as may be prescribed with a view to authorising the grant of a licence to a person in whose case the disability is appropriately controlled".

If a person's condition is deteriorating, the Secretary of State is entitled to impose particular conditions on his driving licence to take account of that. Is it not true that most of the people covered by the Bill will not have deteriorating medical conditions—at least not to any great extent? Will they not mostly be people with stable conditions who need a car that has been adapted?

Mr. Bottomley: I agree. That was most helpful.

Sir John Hannam: The new clause and amendments all relate to medical examinations or changes in medical circumstances. I hope to be able to persuade the House that they are not necessary.

The Bill takes the driving instructor approval process onto new ground—to include disabled instructors. As well as the requirement to hold a full driving licence, an applicant will need to get through the three stages of the qualifying examination: the written theory test, the test of driving ability and, finally, after a training period, the last practical test. That applies to everyone becoming a driving instructor, and the same conditions will apply to a disabled driver who has to satisfy all the requirements. The Bill takes us into new ground under clause 3, where we have assessment of the ability to control a motor vehicle in an emergency, so that the necessary emergency control certificate can be issued. Assessment of a disabled person's competence to take control of a moving vehicle is not a medical assessment of that person's condition.

A disabled person's medical condition will be relevant only in so far as it impinges on his ability to control a vehicle in an emergency situation while giving instruction, as my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) pointed out, with or without the additional modifications to the vehicle that may be necessary.

The assessment of emergency control proposed in the Bill will not be a medical assessment. The disabled person, whatever his medical condition at the time of assessment, will be required simply to demonstrate the necessary emergency control. If the disabled person can satisfy the assessor on that, he will be issued with a certificate which will enable him to apply for registration as an approved driving instructor, assuming that he passes all parts of the examination.

The new clause envisages a potential disabled driving instructor undergoing a further medical examination at the assessment centre. Why "further", given that the emergency control assessment will not entail a medical examination? If the disabled person can demonstrate satisfactorily to the assessor that he can exercise emergency control, the person's medical condition is relevant only, first, in respect of what additional modifications to the vehicle, if any, the assessor may specify in the emergency control certificate and, secondly, the time period, again if any, after which the assessor considers the person should undergo a further assessment of emergency control ability.

There is no medical examination, only an assessment of the condition of that person, and when he may be required to be brought back again for another assessment.

In reaching his view on those aspects of the emergency control assessment, the assessor will use his professional and specialist knowledge of the sorts of vehicle modifications that are available to assist a disabled person give safe driving instruction. Where a disabled person has a progressive illness that reduces physical capacity over time—that will apply in some cases—the assessor will, if needed, have access to medical advice from the Department's medical adviser at the DVLA, and the Bill places on the applicant a duty to disclose such details of his physical disability as the Secretary of State may require. If, in the rare case, the assessor considers it would be helpful for the applicant to undergo a medical examination, he can inform the applicant accordingly, and request, but not oblige, the person to have the examination and to inform him of the outcome, before finally making a decision on the details of modifications. In that case, the medical examination is aimed purely at arriving at the right kind of modification needed for the vehicle to be used by the disabled driving instructor, or for the time period to be specified. Therefore, the new clause is not required because we are not carrying out medical examinations and do not need to do so at the time of the assessment.

Amendment No. 16 appears to be designed to allow a previously disabled person who has taken advantage of the Bill, but is no longer disabled, to become an unrestricted driving instructor, and also, rather bizarrely, to have details of the disability removed from his driving licence. The Bill is designed to enable physically disabled people who meet the conditions to become driving instructors, but with the limitation that they can give paid driving instruction only in a vehicle and class covered by the person's limited driving licence. In practice, that means automatic cars with any additional modifications, which will be specified in a certificate. The Bill is not designed to deal with those who, for whatever reason, are no longer suffering from a relevant or prospective disability.

If a previously disabled person, who is registered as a disabled driving instructor, wishes to have that restriction removed from the register, the person must first obtain a full driving licence in the normal way. In other words, if a person who has recovered full physical capacity, such that his driving licence need no longer be limited by virtue of the earlier disability, there is nothing to prevent that person from taking and passing the driving test in a car fitted with manual transmission, and thereby obtain a full driving licence.

The production of a medical certificate, as envisaged by the amendment, will not be sufficient to change his driving licence in any material way. While there may be circumstances where limited improvements in physical capacity are such that certain restrictions may be removed from the driving licence, existing driver licensing regulations cater for such circumstances. There is no need for such a provision in the Bill.

If a previously disabled person obtains a full driving licence, that person can apply to the registrar for inclusion in the register under the terms of the existing legislation governing able-bodied driving instructors. The person would no longer meet the conditions proposed in the Bill. In practice, it is highly likely that a previously disabled registered driving instructor would wish to apply for unrestricted registration, since that would enable him to offer his instructional services to a wider market. There is no need for that to be enshrined in legislation in the way that the new clause proposes. Therefore, I hope that it will not be pressed to a vote.

The Bill provides that a disabled person may be included in the register of approved driving instructors, on condition that, at any time, he submits himself to a further emergency control assessment and a test of continued ability of fitness to give instruction. That applies also to able-bodied instructors, as at present. Amendment No. 18 speaks of a "medical examination". What matters is the ability to control a vehicle of a class covered by the driving licence, with any additional modifications, which may be specified. It is that emergency control ability, and general driving ability, which concern the registrar. If the registrar requires a registered disabled instructor to undergo a further emergency control assessment because, for instance, the person had notified the registrar that his disability had worsened, as he would be under a legal duty to do, it would be the outcome of that assessment which interested the registrar, not the outcome of any medical examination.

If, on a reassessment of emergency control, the assessor is no longer satisfied that the disabled driving instructor can exercise the necessary emergency control, the Bill provides for the certificate to be revoked. On receipt of notification of recovation, it will be an offence for the disabled driving instructor to give paid instruction, thereby preserving road safety interests, even though it may take a little longer for his name to be removed from the register. We are covering every possible aspect of road safety. Throughout the whole of the process, a medical examination is not relevant.

Amendment No. 20 would be extremely bureaucratic. It would provide some copper plating to minimise or remove the risk of applicants making incomplete declarations as to the nature of their disabilities. We debated how a disabled driving instructor may want to hold back from giving the necessary information. The amendment would place an unnecessary burden on the disabled person, who would have to incur the cost of acquiring a medical certificate before applying for an emergency control assessment. There is no evidence to suggest that such a measure could be justified on road safety grounds. Most physical disabilities will be obvious and the condition will be stable, for example in the case of paraplegics, and even where the disability is progressive, other provisions in the Bill adequately deal with that.

It is important to draw the distinction between applying for the emergency control certificate and later entry to the register of approved driving instructors. At the time of the certificate assessment, the declaration of disabilities and prospective disabilities will be to aid the assessor form a view as to the nature of any modifications to the vehicle that may be necessary for the purpose of giving instruction, and the time period to be specified after which further emergency control assessment should be undertaken. A medical certificate will not add anything to the assessment of emergency control. The person, whatever his certificate says, will either be able or unable to control the vehicle in the simulated situation. It is as simple as that.

When a disabled person has been included in the register, or when he holds a trainee licence to instruct, he will be under a statutory duty to inform the registrar if he becomes aware either of a relevant or prospective disability that he has not previously notified or of a previously notified disability that has worsened. A person who fails to comply with that duty will be guilty of an offence. On receipt of such notification, the registrar can require a person to undergo a further emergency control assessment. That, again, provides the necessary road safety safeguard.

We have to assume that disabled people are as law abiding as those who are not. The burden on the disabled potential driving instructor, which would be entailed by requiring the production of a medical certificate, cannot be justified, given all the other safeguards in the Bill. I hope that I have convinced my hon. Friend and the House that the new clause and the amendments are unnecessary.

Mr. Peter Atkinson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. As I said at the outset, this is a popular measure. Because of the time constraints on private Member's Bills, it flew through its Second Reading and Committee stage. One of the consequent disadvantages was that a few points were not fully explained. I am, therefore, grateful that my hon. Friend has dealt so fully with the points that I have raised. He has clarified the position. Therefore, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

REGISTRATION OF DISABLED PERSON AS DRIVING INSTRUCTORS

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 14, leave out

'as that of a disabled instructor'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 3, in page 2, line 18, leave out 'with an indication that he is a disabled person'.

No. 15, in page 2, line 19, at end insert

', and note the relevant disability against the applicant's name.'

No. 5, in page 2, line 32, leave out

'as that of a disabled instructor'.

No. 7, in page 3, leave out lines 33 to 35 and insert

'"a registered disabled instructor" means a disabled person whose name is in the register'.

No. 17, in page 3, line 35, at end insert

', and whose disability is noted against his name on the register;'

No. 8, in page 4, line 26, leave out

'as that of a disabled instructor'.

No. 6, in page 4, line 28, leave out 'a registered disabled instructor' and insert 'registered'.

Mr. Bottomley: As my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) said, the House wants to make progress. Therefore, if I say just a few words now, it may not be necessary to deal with all the other amendments that have been selected for debate.

Amendment No. 1 picks up a point that my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir. J. Hannam) made in an earlier speech. We want to treat people the same, overcome barriers and get rid of discrimination. The new section 125A which, under clause 1, is to be inserted in the Road Traffic Act 1988 contains, in subsection (1)(c), the words

"may apply to the Registrar for his name to be entered in the register as that of a disabled instructor."

The words

"as that of a disabled instructor"

worry me. If we have overcome the barrier, I do not know why the label should be left intact. That is the question that I must put to my hon. Friend. It is possible that the House will not press the issue to a Division. I hope that my hon. Friend will accept the amendment, but if he cannot do so I hope that he will reconsider it before the Bill goes to another place.

On file there will be information about what has happened, but once someone reaches the stage of having qualified as a trainee driving instructor, or as a driving instructor, without qualification, why should we make it a matter of law that that person's name should be entered on the register

"as that of a disabled instructor"?

I have tried to anticipate the answer, but I cannot think of one that is generally acceptable, so that it is a worry. If it were possible for my hon. Friend or the Minister to say whether a fee is likely to be paid for entering the name, whether or not the amendment is accepted, we should know a little more about the response to the debate, if we have one, on amendment No. 2, which deals with the question of a fee, if any.

Perhaps I may trespass on my hon. Friend's patience by looking forward to amendment No. 11, which would change the period of four years to two years and——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has been a Member of the House for many years. I am sure that he realises that he is dealing with amendments unrelated to those under consideration at present. I hope that he will stick to the ones that we are dealing with.

Mr. Bottomley: I shall say not another word about them, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I would just point out that before you took the Chair there were objections from an hon. Member who thought that we intended to delay the proceedings. I want to put it on record that we are trying to accelerate the proceedings as fast as we possibly can. I shall not add another word to what I have already said, apart from asking why it is not possible to have the European Community and Commonwealth exemption, which is the subject of amendment No. 12.

Sir John Hannam: This group of amendments can be divided into two—amendments Nos. 1, 3, 5, 7, 8 and 6, tabled in the names of my hon. Friends the Members for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) and for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley), and amendments Nos. 15 and 17, tabled in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson).

The first group seeks to remove the identification of disabled driving instructors from the register. Although it may appear to be a sensible move, I believe that I can show that it would be unwise to do so. In order to assist those who wish to consult the register of approved driving instructors, separate identification is considered to be necessary so that people who consult the register in order to get driving instruction—possibly from a disabled driving instructor, because they fall into that category—can identify those disabled driving instructors who are authorised to give paid instruction in automatic vehicles only.

If a disabled driving instructor were not identified in the register as such, an able-bodied person who wished to obtain a full driving licence covering cars fitted with manual gear boxes would have his time wasted by approaching that registered instructor. As a result of the Bill, many driving instruction schools will have on their staff disabled driving instructors. Therefore, someone approaching a school to seek driving instruction could find, when it came to the appointment, that the instructor was disabled and therefore able to give driving instruction only in cars fitted with automatic transmission.

Separate identification would also be helpful for disabled people who want to be taught to drive an automatic vehicle by a disabled instructor. We have to accept that the area of activity of disabled driving instructor will certainly concentrate largely on other disabled drivers—people who become disabled through accidents and wish to become licensed drivers of vehicles. In many cases, they will seek out someone with the expertise to understand their disabilities and needs. Therefore, identification is part of the requirement.

Mr. Thurnham: I am not entirely happy about this aspect of the Bill. I cannot understand why my hon. Friend's points could not be covered just by saying that the driving instructor will give instruction only in cars fitted with automatic gear boxes. I imagine that in a country such as America there are more driving instructors who give instruction only in cars with automatic gear boxes than there are driving instructors who give instruction in any car. I am not entirely happy with the idea that we should discriminate between driving instructors who are able-bodied and those who are not, for the purpose of indicating whether they can use a car fitted with an automatic gear box.

Sir John Hannam: I accept that point, which must be considered carefully, but we must also carefully consider the provision of necessary information to people seeking driving instruction.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The House has a genuine difficulty, which it could spend much time debating. May I put this suggestion to my hon. Friend? Will he consult the chairman and members of the disabled persons advisory committee and their officials to see whether it is possible to have disabled people entered on the register not as "disabled instructor", but with whatever qualification may be appropriate? As my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham suggested earlier, it might be sensible to consider the point in another place.

Sir John Hannam: I should like to pursue my arguments to their conclusion because, to a certain extent, they answer the nature of the concerns that are being expressed about the definition of the entry on the register.

I have dealt with the need to identify the disabled driving instructor on the register so that an able-bodied person can ensure that he does not receive instruction from a disabled instructor in an automatic vehicle and so that disabled people can ensure that they are taught by a disabled instructor in an automatic vehicle.

Separate identification is necessary for enforcement purposes. The Driving Standards Agency enforces the approved driving instructors scheme to ensure, among other things, that people who are getting paid for instruction are registered to do so—that they have valid certificates of registration. A disabled driving instructor, unlike his able-bodied counterpart, will be limited to giving paid instruction in a vehicle of a class covered by his limited driving licence, with the additional modifications for the purpose that the assessor may specify in the certificate. It will be unlawful for a disabled person to give instruction either in a vehicle of a class not covered by his limited driving licence or in a vehicle of a class covered by his limited driving licence but without the necessary modifications as laid down in the emergency control certificate.

To ensure proper and effective enforcement of the conditions that apply to disabled registered driving instructors, it is essential that the register separately identifies disabled instructors. The Bill does not propose the creation of a separate register for disabled driving instructors. The separate identification would be minimal—literally, the letter "R" for restricted or "D" for disabled at the end of the registration number, with an alteration to the certificate of registration to show any modification that the assessor has specified in the control certificate.

Mr. Heald: Is not one of the problems that the way in which the person is entered on the register is the trigger for a host of provisions in the Bill which protect the public on grounds of safety? I am looking at proposed new section 125B(6), which says:

"The entry of a person's name in the register as that of a disabled instructor shall be subject to the condition", which it then lists, about submitting to further assessments and so on. Without that entry on the register in a different category, there would be no trigger for many of the safety provisions. It is difficult to see, from a drafting point of view, how the mechanism could be triggered in another way. I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) has any suggestions about that, but it is difficult to see how it could be drafted effectively in any other way.

Sir John Hannam: This is the crux of the argument. It is a balanced decision. Obviously one does not want the Bill to be discriminatory, but nor do we want the register to be misleading. The register, and the information on it, could trigger subsequent actions. I should very much like to consider this point again when the Bill is in the other place. At the moment, I should be inclined to advise the House not to accept the amendments and I hope that they will be withdrawn to enable us to reconsider them.

Interestingly, amendments Nos. 15 and 17, which stand in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham, work the other way, as they would require a description of actual disabilities, which is a problem area. The argument advanced in the amendments is slightly unclear, but my hon. Friend seems to think that including the nature of the disability might be helpful. The registrar of approved driving instructors would have no reason to record the nature of the physicial disability in the register. The nature of the disability is not relevant. All that the registrar needs to know is that the person has a current emergency control certificate and, as long as the disabled person possesses that certificate, that he or she has passsed the qualifying examination as a driving instructor and is a fit and proper person. As long as those requirements are satisfied, that person's name will be entered on the register as a disabled driving instructor.

The entry on the register showing that a person is disabled will be confined to one letter after his or her registration number, so anyone consulting the register would know that a person is disabled and cannot instruct in cars fitted with manual transmission. Separate identification, but not the nature of the disability, is relevant for enforcement purposes, but the nature of a person's disability is relevant to the emergency control certificate. For example, the person may have a progressive illness that leads to increasing loss of physical capacity. In those circumstances, the certificate may specify, as we have already discussed, a period after which the registrar may order the person concerned to undergo further assessment. The currency of the emergency control certificate is relevant to the purposes of the register and not the nature of the disability. I hope that my hon. Friend will not press the amendments.

Mr. Peter Atkinson: My hon. Friend's remarks clarified the matter, for which I am grateful. I had not understood the position from his earlier remarks, but I do now and will not push the amendments.

Lady Olga Maitland: I do not support the amendments moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley). I fear that he is slightly confused in suggesting that a denoting mark beside a disabled driver's name is a slur on him or her or is some kind of discrimination. It denotes a statement of fact and it is important that people know from the register who is able-bodied and who is disabled. These provisions have a positive element because a disabled person seeking a disabled driver to instruct him could find an instructor who understands his problems and could provide a car adapted for his needs.

There has been a slight misunderstanding about the letter identifying a disabled instructor. It does not make him appear less qualified, but it helps those who would particularly appreciate instruction from such a person.

Mr. Thurnham: I take it that we are speaking to all these amendments, but I thought that my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) might have had a little more to say. He spoke only to amendment No. 1.

I am still a little unhappy about the separate register of disabled instructors because there are few other spheres of life in which a disabled person is shown as such on a register, unless he chooses so to appear. People can choose to be registered disabled for employment purposes, but, in this case, as I understand it, it is not a matter of choice. If someone is disabled, he will end up on the register of disabled driving instructors whether he likes it or not.

Lady Olga Maitland: Does my hon. Friend agree that a person's physical capability is enormously important if he is a driving instructor? We are not talking about a disabled clerk, secretary or bank manager. In this case, disability is relevant.

Mr. Thurnham: Many issues are relevant, including a person's abilities in other respects. I feel instinctively unhappy about the fact that, whether a person likes it or not, he is to be entered on the register. It is a valuable feature of our society that, in other spheres, people do not have to register as disabled if they do not want to. There has been a great debate about employers meeting quotas in employing registered disabled people. Often employers employ people who are disabled but who do not want to be registered as such. It would be wrong for the House to force people to be registered as disabled for employment purposes.

The Minister for Roads and Traffic (Mr. Kenneth Carlisle): I should like to reinforce what my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) said. It is a matter of practicality rather than discrimination. First, one wants to be helpful to people who are looking for driving instruction. If a disabled person wants to learn to drive, it would be helpful for him or her to be able to go through the list of driving instructors and seek out those who they can be confident will be able to teach with a manually controlled car. It is a helpful and practical measure for disabled people who want instruction.

Secondly, we must be aware of the problems of enforcement, an important issue stressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter.

Mr. Thurnham: I am grateful to the Minister for putting it so well. Although it would be a valuable facility for disabled people to be able to choose a disabled instructor because they believe that that would be the best way of receiving instruction, I am worried that the Bill offers no element of choice. A person will appear on the list whether he likes it or not.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I take the blame for that. The amendment proposes to leave out words, but I should have anticipated the need to include a qualification in the register. We are discussing what the qualification on the register should be. I suggest that it should be "restricted", because the driving instructor is to be restricted in the type of vehicles he can drive, not whom he can teach. It has nothing to do with disability. It is the consequence of overcoming the disability which requires a restriction on the vehicle to be driven. If the Chair will accept a manuscript amendment, I will change the original amendment. If the Chair will not, we shall have to take up time with a Division and require an amendment in another place to add the word "restricted" or, having aired the issue, we shall have to rely on the good sense of my hon. Friend and those advising him to change the word "disabled" to "restricted".

Mr. Thurnham: That is it in a nutshell. I should be much happier if we were able to consider the matter in that way.

Sir John Hannam: I said that the letter to be considered would be either "D" or "R" for restricted. We can certainly reconsider the issue during the Bill's consideration in another place. It would be unwise to jump in and make a firm decision today.

Mr. Thurnham: I am happy to leave it at that. We have had a useful debate, and my hon. Friend's suggestion would leave everyone satisfied that they could examine a list of driving instructors and find those who are restricted for one reason or another without people being distinguished because of their disability. I should be happy to leave that to my hon. Friend and look forward to the Bill's passage through another place when the issue can be given every possible consideration.

Ms Walley: I do not wish to detain the House unnecessarily, but the debate raises important issues. I endorse the suggestion that there is a valid reason for further discussions with the various disability organisations. The points made about not wishing to discriminate against disabled people are general and should be taken up right the way through the Department of Transport and perhaps by the Leader of the House.

I cannot let the debate end without making one observation. With the exception of the Minister for Roads and Traffic, every hon. Member who has spoken has talked of disabled driving instructors as "he", or male. [Interruption.] That will prove to be true if one reads Hansard. I should be heartened if the amendment acknowledged——

Mr. Heald rose——

Ms Walley: I shall not give way until I have made the point. If we want to outlaw all types of discrimination, we should consider the way in which we use the word "he" in the Bill.

As I said, I do not wish to detain the House unnecessarily. There are many important issues, but we do not wish to contribute to the labelling of or discrimination against any group of people.

Mr. Heald rose——

Ms Walley: The hon. Gentleman may catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I do not wish to detain the House unnecessarily.

Mr. Heald: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The word "he" is always used in parliamentary Acts to mean he and/or she under the Interpretation——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order for the Chair, and the hon. Gentleman knows it.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: On behalf of all the hon. Members who have expressed concern, may I tell my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) that his response is very welcome. I am sure that we can find a way to remove any controversy or doubt while retaining the benefits. On that understanding, I shall not press the amendment to a Division. I understand that a manuscript amendment may not be acceptable at such short notice. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We now come to amendments Nos. 2 and 9.

Mr. Bottomley: My hon. Friend the Minister may be able to deal with this matter in one sentence on Third Reading so I do not propose to move the amendments.

Clause 3

ASSESSMENT OF DISABLED PERSON'S ABILITY TO CONTROL A MOTOR CAR IN AN EMERGENCY

Mr. Peter Atkinson: I beg to move amendment No. 22, in line 49 leave out 'six' and insert 'three'.

I shall not detain the House for long. Amendment No. 22 would reduce from six months to three months the time in which an applicant who had failed an assessment could reapply. It seemed on that margin that the six-month period was rather too long, given the importance of someone being able to obtain employment. It would be kinder to allow the applicant to reapply after only three months. I am aware that I may have been considered to be beastly to the applicant in amendments Nos. 15 and 17, so I have been kinder in amendment No. 22. On the margin, I felt that it might be better to reduce the time involved.

Sir John Hannam: It is an interesting amendment about which I thought deeply. The Bill states that a period of six months shall elapse before a further assessment may be undergone. We decided that there would be no fee for the assessment, but if the period between assessments is too short, we should be encouraging time wasters at the expense of the taxpayer. If the period is shorter, it is less likely that there will have been a material change in the person's physical condition, so a shorter period may encourage some people to apply for another assessment when the likelihood is that the outcome will be the same.

I suggest that we need to see how the provision works in practice. If it transpires that six months is an unreasonably long period to expect disabled people to wait before they can apply for another assessment, regulations can easily be made to shorten the period or to lengthen it if our experience of the operation of the Bill suggests that. I should like the provision to stay in its present form with the six-month period. We should see how things turn out and, if necessary, amend the provision in future. On that basis, I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Heald: I am concerned about the six-month gap between taking an assessment and taking a further assessment, given that this is not an area in which there should be a right of appeal. Indeed, thanks to our earlier decision, there will not be such a right. Given that there is no right of appeal, it could be unfair to an applicant to have to wait as long as six months before the next assessment and that might lead to a sense of injustice in those who wish to take the test again speedily. With most vocational qualifications, there is some gap before one can take the test or the examination again, but it is not normally as long as six months. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) will be prepared to consider the matter again. We do not have to push the matter to a Division today. Six months is rather a long time to wait for such reassessment, so I hope that the point can be considered again.

Sir John Hannam: By leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I hope that I have made it clear that we shall have to look at the matter in the light of experience. No one is sure what the correct period is. With other forms of disability allowance, there are periods after which one can reapply. All that we can do at this stage is to take a period that seems to be reasonable and sensible. If necessary, it can be changed by regulation in future.

Mr. Peter Atkinson: I hear exactly what my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) says and I am grateful for his assurance that when the Bill comes into force, the practice will be examined to see whether the time scale needs to be reviewed. On that basis and as I see the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) waiting to proceed with his iniquitous Freedom and Responsibility of the Press Bill, I shall not detain the House. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule

RELATED AND CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS

Mr. Thurnham: I beg to move amendment No. 11, in page 12, line 6, leave out 'four' and insert 'two'.

The amendment is designed to reduce the restrictiveness of the Bill. We have too many burdens on enterprise as it is. A new Domesday book has been produced by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs who is responsible for deregulation. I have seen the book —I believe that a copy has been deposited in the Library —so I know that it is about 4 in thick. It lists all the burdens and restrictions on individuals and on enterprises. If people want to earn a living as a driving instructors, we should remove the restrictions as far as we can.

Although the Bill is extraordinarily valuable and helpful in opening up an opportunity for people to earn a living as driving instructors when they have not been able to do so before, it contains various restrictions. I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs has seen the Bill yet. No doubt it will be added to his Doomsday book of regulation. I should be grateful if my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) would give some consideration to an amendment which is designed to make life easier.

I do not know where the period of four years came from. I do not know whether the four-year period relates to provisions in existing legislation. Perhaps it could be relaxed somewhat to a period of two years, which would shorten the period in which someone is restricted. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter will consider that point so that we can amend the provision either now or in the other place. I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley), who tabled the amendment with me, is now back in the Chamber. He may want to comment briefly on whether he is happy for the period to be reduced from four years to two years. Alternatively, there may be further discussion during the proceedings of the Bill.

Sir John Hannam: This is rather strange. We had an earlier debate because of concern that we might discriminate against disabled drivers through an insistence on a distinguishing letter after their entry in the register, yet the amendment would create a form of discrimination against disabled drivers. The arrangements in the Bill are the same as the normal arrangements for non-disabled drivers. When one is registered, one has four years of registration. After that, registration lapses unless one continues to apply. The amendment seeks to deprive disabled drivers of the four-year and to replace it by a period of two years, after which they have to reapply. It would be unreasonable to penalise disabled drivers in that way. The amendment reflects a misreading of the Bill and it would discriminate against disabled drivers. I ask that the amendment is not pursued.

Mr. Thurnham: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendent by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I beg to move amendment No. 12, in page 12, line 51, at end insert—

'(g) that he is disqualified in another Member State of the European Community or in a Commonwealth country.'.

I should also be grateful to be told why a qualification obtained in another European Community country or in another Commonwealth country might equally not be acceptable.

Sir John Hannam: I am not at all clear why we should wish to amend the Bill as my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) proposes. The schedule does no more than mirror the provisions of the Road Traffic Act 1988 which prevent someone who is disqualified from giving paid instruction or from holding a trainee licence. The existing legislation does not require such people to be removed from the register or to be barred from entry to it if they have been disqualified in a European Community or Commonwealth country. Nor does the existing legislation prevent an able-bodied person from obtaining or holding a trainee licence if that person is disqualified from driving in an EC or Commonwealth country.

Why should a disabled driving instructor or a trainee licence holder be subject to such constraints? How is the registrar to find out whether a disabled person has been disqualified in one of those countries? There is as yet no common driving licence record system covering all those countries, so there would be no possibility of implementing the amendment.

However, if it comes to the registrar's notice that a disabled person or an able-bodied person has been disqualified from driving in any country in the world, it is open to him to consider that fact in deciding whether the person is otherwise a fit and proper person for the purposes of registration as a driving instructor or as the holder of a trainee licence to instruct. The Bill and the current legislation do not specify what factors the registrar should take into account when determining whether a person is a fit and proper person. That is the best way in which to deal with the intent that lies behind the amendment.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): The hon. Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) says that he does not know why Conservative Members want to amend his Bill. Let me assure him absolutely and categorically that his Friends have no intention of amending the Bill, and will withdraw this amendment just as they withdrew the previous one.

Mr. Thurnham: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) has not been here for the debate. Genuine points have been made and only a few minutes ago we agreed that the Bill should, indeed, be amended—if not by manuscript amendment immediately, in the other place.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): That is not a matter for the Chair, although it may be a point of substance.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I hope that it is, indeed, a point of order.

Mr. Bottomley: When an accusation is made against an hon. Member, there are ways of dealing with it—by rebuttal, for example. If the same rules applied in the House as might come into effect if the hon. Gentleman's Bill were passed, I could claim an equal right to reply. I could go to a statutory authority and take the hon. Gentleman to court, and I suspect that he would lose his licence to be a Member of Parliament and to make factually inaccurate points in the Chamber.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I used to be a teacher, and I somehow feel that I have a class of small boys in front of me. Let us move on.

Mr. Soley: I am inclined to agree with you, Madam Deputy Speaker, and I am grateful to you for your protection. I merely wanted to give the hon. Member for Exeter the absolute assurance that there is no intention to amend the Bill. I knew that to be the case some time ago.

Mr. Luff: That is not true.

Mr. Soley: There is no intention to amend the Bill in this House and at this time. As the hon. Member for Exeter knows, his hon. Friends' purpose is to create problems for the Freedom and Responsibility of the Press Bill, and they will withdraw their amendment in due course.

Mr. Luff: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Can you clarify whether it is in order for an hon. Member who has not been present during the debate and who has not heard the arguments advanced by Conservative Members to cast totally false aspersions on those hon. Members' attitude towards the legislation in question?

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order for the Chair. The occupant of the Chair is not responsible for the wisdom or otherwise of the words that are uttered, and that is a fortunate thing.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I proposed to respond to the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) in his reply to my amendment No. 12. The House will recall that we were interrupted when the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) made the assertion that the amendments that had been tabled were not serious. I did not press amendment No. 1, because, as any hon. Member who was present will have heard me say —the hon. Member for Hammersmith was not present and will not have heard me—I wanted to avoid the amount of time that a Division would take. It is the understanding of the House that my proposal will be accepted. I see every prospect of the word "disabled" being changed to the word "restricted", although—for reasons which we would not be given if we asked for them—my manuscript amendment was not acceptable to the occupant of the Chair.

What the hon. Member for Hammersmith came in to say was wrong. I regret that, and I suspect that, when the hon. Gentleman reads Hansard, he will regret it. I shall not try to insist on an apology because it is better to deal with such matters by controversy rather than by using a sledgehammer to crack an hon. Member for Hammersmith.

My hon. Friend the Member for Exeter has used the historic negative argument against amendment No. 12. It would be regrettable if the House and other member states of the European Community allowed the situation to continue whereby I might be disqualified for drink-driving in 11 of the 12 member states of the Community but could still come to Britain and carry on a trade as a driving instructor. That is undesirable. Perhaps it has arisen because of what the Road Traffic Act 1988 did or did not do. As I was the Minister responsible, I take responsibility for an unsatisfactory state of affairs. But there is no reason why, just because something was acceptable to me or to the House in 1988, it should remain acceptable in 1993, when we know more about such matters.

We can deal with the problem relatively simply by asking people for a declaration that they have not been disqualified in another European Community or Commonwealth country. I suspect that, like many other measures to overcome handicap, the emergency control certificate provisions will be copied, just as the orange badge and other provisions have been adopted, in other member states. If we ask people, "Have you been refused an emergency control certificate or been subject to court disqualification?", they will have to answer the questions honestly; after all, we rely on them to answer honestly the questions that are put to them when they first apply for a provisional licence or when they are over 70 and have to give a declaration of medical competence to drive.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: It may help my hon. Friend to know that the whole question of how restrictions on driving licences—endorsements—are treated as between common market countries is under consideration. We are trying to find a way in which to address the point that has been raised.

Mr. Bottomley: I accept the Minister's remarks and, in accordance with my earlier approach, I shall seek to withdraw the amendment rather than continuing with the debate that the subject clearly deserves. It might lead to a further eruption from the hon. Member for Hammersmith if we did what the House is supposed to do, which is to rectify what is wrong.

Mr. Thurnham: I do not know what has come over the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), who conducted himself so well when he introduced his Bill and took it into Committee. Today, he has come here to disrupt proceedings on the Bill before us, and I am baffled why he should do that. If it results in anything, it will result in there being less time for us to debate his Bill. He has not been here to hear our extremely useful debate. We have agreed—I use the word loosely, Madam Deputy Speaker——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. It is all too loose. The hon. Gentleman must look at the amendment under consideration and address himself to that.

Mr. Thurnham: I am delighted to speak to amendments Nos. 12 and 13, which stand in my name and the names of my hon. Friends the Members for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) and for Worcester (Mr. Luff). Those amendments raise the important question of the relationship between Britain and the European Community, which we have debated at enormous length in recent months. I am not quite clear whether the qualification to which we have referred, which would enable disabled people to become driving instructors, will enable them to do that job throughout the European Community. The amendment should therefore be looked at in both lights: disqualification elsewhere should be a barrier to someone's carrying on here as though nothing had happened, but, equally, the opportunities that my hon. Friend's excellent Bill has provided for people to earn a livelihood in this country should automatically enable them also to earn their living in other member states.

Mr. Heald: One of my concerns about the amendment is that the whole question of road traffic control and the regulation of driving licences has traditionally been dealt with by this House and this Parliament, and not by Europe. I am concerned that the approach that is suggested runs contrary to the principle of subsidiarity because it allows matters within the competence of this House to be dealt with on a Europewide basis. It is wrong for a party that is fighting hard for subsidiarity to suggest that we should consider the matter on a Europewide basis.

Mr. Thurnham rose——

Mr. Peter Bottomley rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We cannot have one intervention on another.

Mr. Thurnham: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. I was a little uncertain about how to cope with both points.

I should like to think that we would have an open situation. If someone is qualified to earn a living in a certain way in this country, that person may expect to be able to earn a living in the same way in other member states in the Community. If someone is a qualified driving instructor in another member state, one would hope that that person would be able to earn a living here.

Although we must consider the issue in terms of subsidiarity, I do not believe that it should be too great a problem. However, I am concerned about the fact that, in many areas, we are much more open than other countries in the Community. Someone can earn a living in this country as an electrician without having to be on a register of electricians. However, if that person goes to France or Germany, he may not be able to trade as an electrician unless he can enter his name on a register.

While an individual from another member state may come to this country and trade without restrictions, some restrictions apply in other member states. I hope that the whole matter can be opened and simplified.

Mr. Heald: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Thurnham: I wanted to cope with a point from my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley).

Mr. Peter Bottomley: On the grounds of subsidiarity, it is ludicrous to require someone like my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald) to take a French driving test before he takes his car through France and, the minute he reaches Italy, require him to take an Italian driving test. It must make sense to have common recognition. It is important to see how far we can remove barriers. If someone wants to teach in different European Community countries, it is as important to have common recognition of a qualification as it is to have common recognition of a disqualification.

Mr. Thurnham: I could not agree more with my hon. Friend's excellent point. If my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) responds to the debate, perhaps he will tell us the extent to which he feels that his initiative in this country will open up the situation throughout the Community as a whole.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: We have entered a wider field. It is sensible for the House to recognise that the Bill relates to existing legislation. It does not involve wider European issues. As my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) said, it is sensible that there should be a degree of uniformity. That would be helpful and we are considering these matters in a wider context. However, the issues are not truly within the scope of the Bill.

Mr. Thurnham: I think that I have covered the points that I wanted to raise at this point and I am happy to leave the amendment as it is.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I should like to force the amendment to a Division and take up another 20 minutes, but I will not do that. I hope that the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) will stop provoking us from a sedentary position.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. Gentleman seeking the leave of the House to withdraw the amendment?

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Yes, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Order for Third Reading read.

12.32 pm

Sir John Hannam: I beg to move, That the Bill be read the Third time.

I take this opportunity briefly to pay tribute to all those who have helped to make this Bill possible. We are talking about the removal of another piece of the wall of discrimination against disabled people. Although it will not benefit vast numbers of people, it is a very important step forward.

The barrier against the employment of disabled drivers has long frustrated people engaged in transport. In resolving that problem, I pay tribute to and welcome the support and assistance of my hon. Friend the Minister for Roads and Traffic and the staff of the Department of Transport disability unit who have been instrumental in bringing the various threads together to produce this legislation.

I am also extremely grateful for the support of all members of the all-party disablement group. Over the years, that group has secured a wide range of improvements for disabled people. The quiet, persistent determination of that all-party team has secured many of the steps forward that have been taken. I have no doubt that over the coming years, disabled driving instructors will join the staff of driving instruction schools across the country. I have no doubt that they will prove to be dedicated experts at their jobs, just as disabled workers have proved themselves to be in many other areas of employment.

As the Bill passes to another place, Lord Ashley, my co-chairman of the all-party group, will guide it expertly through its legislative stages there. Our debates this morning have examined in great detail many of the aspects of the Bill that we were unable to discuss on Second Reading due to the truncated debate that we had on that occasion and to the short Committee stage. The advice, opinions and constructive suggestions that have been given this morning through the various amendments that have been discussed will prove invaluable in ensuring that the Bill, when it finally goes through the other place, wil be in the exact form that we should all like to see. Therefore, I ask the House to approve the Third Reading.

Mr. Soley: I congratulate the hon. Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) on his good Bill. When we spoke about the matter some time ago, he knew that there was a danger that it could be talked out. I made it clear that I would not do anything of the sort because private Members' Bills need some protection. A review of the procedures of the House is long overdue to ensure that hon. Members who have a chance of getting Bills debated have the same sort of protection as Government Bills. We cannot talk out the European Communities (Amendment) Bill and we could not talk out the poll tax Bill. We should not be able to talk out Bills of this sort, and that is important.

At one stage, the hon. Gentleman seemed genuinely worried—I hate to see anyone suffering mental distress—that his hon. Friends would amend his Bill here. Clearly, they did not, and we knew that. I am grateful——

Mr. Peter Bottomley: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. In the absence of the hon. Member for Hamersmith (Mr. Soley)—undoubtedly, he was briefing the press at the time on what he thought was going on here—we almost carried an amendment which, I suspect, would probably have been accepted by my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam). The amendment not having been accepted—it was not possible to get it perfect—the hon. Member for Hammersmith should stop repeating things that he has already said which are wrong. They are matters of debate and matters of fact. When an hon. Member has been corrected, it would be a courtesy to the House not to repeat the same repetition on the same day. It would lead to a buzz on a radio programme, but not now.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order for the Chair, but it may well be a subject on which an hon. Member wishes to intervene. But let us be quite clear about the distinction between a point of order for the Chair and an hon. Member seeking to intervene to deal with what he thinks is an inaccuracy.

Mr. Soley: I am grateful, Madam Deputy Speaker. Obviously, I agree with your ruling. The point is that I simply said that amendments would be withdrawn—and they have been withdrawn. The issue is that when one seeks——

Mr. Luff rose——

Mr. Soley: I will give way in a moment. The hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) should stop panicking. [Interruption.] I have no need to panic. I am the last hon. Member who needs to panic. When attempts are made to alter a Bill by other methods, that can be applied to my Bill as well. I could make manuscript amendments. Conservative Members have tabled one or two amendments to my Bill which are useful. If they had discussed the matter with me, we could have amended this Bill in precisely the same way. But it is a red herring.

The important point is that Bills such as that of the hon. Member for Exeter are welcome; they should be allowed through. Generally speaking, the Government should stay out of such matters. I am grateful to the Government Whips for telling me that debate on my Bill will start at about 12.30. That is always an indication of some involvement of Government Whips. Given the letters that I have——

Madam Deputy Speaker: What does this have to do with the Third Reading of this Bill? I think that the answer is nothing at all.

Mr. Soley: I submit that it is marginally relevant. But I will leave it to one side and simply say that it is an advantage to be able to debate Bills properly. That is what we should do on all private Member's Bills, so that they have the considered and appropriate response, with genuine amendments of the sort that they may need from time to time. We should not bring the House into disrepute by using it in a way that people outside do not understand.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I have great pleasure in speaking in the Third Reading debate on this excellent Bill. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) on the way in which he has taken it through the House. He answered debates with great clarity, conciseness and knowledge and he introduced a constructive Bill. We all know that over 20 years he has built up a substantial reputation for helping those with disabilities. During the passage of the Bill, he has reaffirmed in the most effective way his commitment to that excellent cause, so he deserves all our congratulations and our thanks.

I am delighted to confirm that the Government wholeheartedly support the Bill. I am glad that it has all-party support. We have had an excellent debate today. I am only sorry that the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) came in at a late stage with some rather carping remarks which must cast doubt on his judgment in other matters.

I thank the hon. Members who have taken part in the debate today. We all know the record of my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) as a progressive and effective roads Minister. He is always too modest about his achievements. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) has also worked long and effectively on the subject of disabilities. My hon.

Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) gave detailed thought to many of the amendments and I thank him for that.

I also thank my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald), who may not be a radical Turk, but who is certainly capable of clear and precise thinking. My hon. Friends the Members of Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan), for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) and for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) also contributed effectively to the debates, and I thank them for that.

I welcome the Bill because it not only provides employment for those who are disabled—those opportunities should increase as car technology develops—but increases the pool of driving instructors who are able and willing to teach other disabled people. It will give a significant boost to all efforts in that direction.

I am grateful for the interest shown in the Bill, as expressed by the amendments that were tabled. However, I am pleased that the Bill has not been amended today, although I take the point that we must examine the one particular area of specification. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter will do that and that some changes may take place.

In general, the Bill strikes the right balance. It removes an area of discrimination against disabled people. But also, most importantly, it does not threaten road safety interests, in which, of course, I am most interested. When the Bill is enacted, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will be pleased to make the order to bring the legislation into effect and to make the necessary regulations under the legislation, such as those that prescribe the detailed nature of the emergency control assessment.

The emergency control assessment and the certificate that follows it are at the heart of the Bill because they provide the safety aspect and a statement that someone who is disabled is capable of keeping absolute control of the car. In that respect, I, too, pay my respects to the Mobility, Advice and Vehicle Information Service at Crowthorne, where much of the work and help will be undertaken.

We have heard about the mobility roadshow. The next one will take place later this summer. The work done at the roadshow helps to provide advice to disabled people every day of every week of the year. It has some standard production cars fitted with a wide range of equipment and adaptations. Someone who is disabled can go and find out the exact car to meet his or her wishes. Currently MAVIS assesses more than 400 people every year, so it is at the centre of what we seek to achieve. We are all grateful for its work and we congratulate it on its constructive efforts.

In conclusion, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter on his achievement. It is no less than we would expect from a man of his quality, but this is a happy day on which the Bill has every prospect of entering the statute book.

Ms Walley: There is no doubt that far more needs to be done to improve the civil rights of disabled people. Important advances need to be made. None the less, we have here a Bill which will bring about some real and much needed improvements for disabled people. It has been adequately steered through its proceedings so far.

I do not wish to detain the House further. We have other important business before us which desperately needs to be debated, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) has rightly pointed out.

We believe that the Bill offers significant improvements for disabled people who wish to become driving instructors and we look forward to its enactment. I congratulate the hon. Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) on the Bill.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms. Walley) spoke for the House and I support what she said. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) on his part in the long-term coalition of interests that has overcome apathy, ignorance and barriers.

The Bill will not affect many people, but it will set them free and give them a chance to earn a living at what they want to do. That chance is as important as providing such people with more opportunities to park a car, which is the merit of the orange badge scheme. The Bill has the same purpose as the register of the disabled has in providing employment opportunities; more needs to be done, however, to adapt that scheme or to draw more people's attention to it.

The Bill must be judged in the context of the work of the disabled persons transport advisory committee, which was driven forward by Department of Transport's disability unit. It is an alliance of people who are unwilling to tolerate injustice in terms of civil rights or the idea of passing by on the other side.

Mobility is a key part of people's lives. It needs to be a matter for legislation where appropriate and debates on the detail of the legislation can be as important as detailed debates on legislation in other areas.

There is a need for a coherent approach, because journeys on the railways, buses and on foot are just as important as those in cars. As long as the House has Members who can reflect the interests of their constituents and sometimes of their families, I suspect that we can do nearly as much as the other place in carrying forward changes. Some changes are possible because of technological improvements or cost reductions. All are known to MAVIS at Crowthorne.

I endorse what my hon. Friend the Minister said and I pay tribute to him for the work that he has done. The fact that, every year, thousands of people will be able to get information and practical guidance on their capabilities from a central point to enable them to live a better life is a marvellous thing.

We have already mentioned the mobility roadshow and I believe that hon. Members should try to visit similar events in their own constituencies, because disabled drivers are often off on tours around the country. It is remarkable how those people, if given half a chance, take for granted what we take for granted. That is where the coherent approach shows its benefits.

More needs to be done, and the Bill is a step along the way. The House will be grateful to hon. Members of all parties for their help in bringing the Bill to the statute book.

Mr. Peter Atkinson: I, too, offer my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam). The Bill will be warmly welcomed by many disabled people.

We have had a good debate and I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter does not believe that we have been picking over the bones unnecessarily. The Bill has had a swift passage and the Report stage has given us a great opportunity to obtain further clarification on a number of matters of particular concern.

I am glad to note that the Opposition Back Benches are now filling up, because I am sure that the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms Walley) felt rather lonely for most of the debate. I am grateful for her recent contributions because they showed a certain interest in the passage of the Bill, which was lacking before. We have not seen a Liberal Member today—no doubt they are all too busy at Newbury.

I echo what my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) said about the Bill helping to enlarge the freedom of disabled people, which is most important. To enlarge the freedom of a vulnerable section of society makes the Bill worth while, unlike the Freedom and Responsibility of the Press Bill, which we are about to debate, which does just the opposite and is designed to censor the British press.

Mr. Luff: Despite the provocation of the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) I shall restrict my remarks in the interests of making progress with his Bill as well as the one that we are debating.

There are three reasons for welcoming the Bill. First, it takes a pragmatic approach to the problems of disabled people. Secondly, it will enhance the mobility of disabled people who otherwise might not take driving instruction, but will now feel encouraged to do so by the availability of a disabled person as an instructor. The third reason is the simple ground of justice.

As I think my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) would admit, the most important single issue in the sphere of discrimination is the changing of attitudes. In that context, it is important to put on record the healthy and civilised attitude demonstrated by all the professionals involved in driving instruction. I pay tribute to the Motor Schools Association of Great Britain, the Driving Instructors Association and many individual driving schools such as the British School of Motoring and those in my constituency. I had intended to say more about their attitudes but, sadly, and in the interests of making progress with the Bill of the hon. Member for Hammersmith, I am unable to do so.

Mr. Soley: I could be struck by lightning.

Mr. Luff: Do not tempt me. I could say yet more about such schools; I have a lengthy list.

There are two reasons why I am grateful to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for calling me to speak. First, it is important to put on record that disabled people who see the Bill passed through both Houses of Parliament should not rush to set up driving schools. It is a precarious business and, before they set up schools, they should ensure that there is a market in the district where they are thinking of establishing one. Schools are opening and closing with alarming regularity in my constituency.

I have a serious point to make to the Minister. I have been alarmed at the number of occasions on which general practitioners do not seem properly to have understood the implications of a disability on the qualification of an individual to hold an ordinary driving licence. I want to alert the Minister of the possibility of him and his officials in the relevant agency using disabled qualified driving instructors to provide a second opinion to the general practitioners' opinion for all those people who wish to drive but are disabled and need medical proof of their ability to drive before they can obtain a licence.

I commend the Bill to the House and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter on everything that he has done to enable it to come before us.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Freedom and Responsibility of the Press Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

EDITORIAL GUIDELINES

'.—(1) Each newspaper shall make available for public inspection at its registered office a copy of any editorial or journalistic guidance provided for the use of its staff.

(2) Such guidance shall be open to inspection during the normal working hours of the company.'—[Mr. Peter Bottomley.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Early-day motion 1809, tabled by the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), was mentioned earlier. The hon. Gentleman has just entered the Chamber and said that he was distressed as the movers of amendments to his Bill should have spoken to him before. I find that an amazing cheek as he had never mentioned anything to me about tabling his early-day motion, which is full of gross irregularities. The amendment tabled to it in the names of my hon. Friends helps to put the record right. But I have received representations from an enormous number of organisations and it is grossly wrong to suggest that I have been approached only by News International. The hon. Member for Hammersmith knows perfectly well that representations have been made from many organisations. I have offered to show him my files. I have in my hand representations from the Newspaper Publishers Association, which included eight newspaper groups. These groups include Associated Newspapers, Express Newspapers, News International, the Telegraph, the Observer, the Financial Times, the Guardian and Manchester Evening News, Mirror Group Newspapers and Newspaper Publishing.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): How does the hon. Gentleman's point relate to new clause 1, which is the subject of the present debate?

Mr. Thurnham: My point of order relates to the Bill and to the way in which the hon. Member for Hammersmith has tabled an early-day motion regarding my conduct. What it says is grossly wrong. I should like you, Madam Deputy Speaker, to be fully aware of its gross inaccuracies and to make it clear to the House that I do not consider myself to have been used by News International. I have taken advantage of all the representations sent to me. News International is only one of eight newspaper groups that have made representations to me through the Newspaper Publishers Association.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. This is unfair to you, because it is not really a point of order for you; but if you are considering it as a point of order, you will bear in mind the fact that we are allowed to table early-day motions at the Table Office for consideration by the Speaker when hon. Members are named in them. In my EDM I merely regret what the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East has done. There is nothing morally wrong with it, as I have often said. Indeed, I said that in Committee. All that I am doing is regretting the hon. Gentleman's actions. It would be amazing if we did not regret such things.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have heard enough to know that this is not strictly a point of order for me. If hon. Members want to raise the point in the course of the debate when it is germane to the new clause or amendment under discussion, I will allow that, but I shall listen with close attention and jump from a great height on anyone who speaks irrelevantly.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I draw an analogy with "Erskine May", which provides guidance on what is acceptable behaviour in the House. "Erskine May" suggests that an hon. Member who intends to say something critical about another hon. Member gives him notice. I do not suggest that we go quite as far as that with journalism. I do not suggest that newspapers have to inform someone in advance if they intend to criticise him. But it is wise to follow that convention in the House.

If, say, the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) wants to accuse my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) of—to use his own strong word—colluding with a private sector body, I would regard it as right to follow the conventions and to ask my hon. Friend whether he minds and, even if he does mind, whether the statement is accurate. The fact that the hon. Gentleman failed to check the accuracy of his allegation puts him at grave risk of being caught by his own Bill—except that he is not an editor, proprietor or journalist.

It is not for me to criticise the selection of amendments, but I note that my proposal to call this the Press Control Bill was not accepted for discussion. For the purposes of the debate, however, let us call it that——

Mr. Soley: The clearest possible example of the sort of inaccuracy that the hon. Gentleman describes comes in the amendment in which he states that the National Union of Journalists opposes the Bill. It does not. Having considered the Bill more carefully—that is more than the hon. Gentleman has done—the NUJ is now in favour of it. so that inaccuracy can be corrected in precisely the way allowed for by my Bill. Matters of opinion cannot be—that is the difference.

Mr. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman seems to be saying two things at once. Earlier, I said that I was not a good enough politician to face in two directions at once. The hon. Gentleman is going one better.

The press is as important to democracy as is the House of Commons; there is no dispute about that. In the House we have virtually no controls over what hon. Members say. We have virtually unlimited privilege. We can call someone a liar, a thief or a murderer. We can say that he holds unpleasant opinions. This power is seldom abused, for various reasons. A person who goes over the top too often gets disregarded. Some of us may be disregarded without having to do that, but it is an alternative way of reaching the shelf of bypassed Members. We have to face criticism and have our credibility tested.

My argument would be that a newspaper that too often wrongly uses whatever freedom it has will lose credibility, market share and influence. People contribute to newspapers for one of two reasons—they want either to make money or to have influence. Often, what they want and what they get are not the same. Lord Beaverbrook was always after propaganda. I can think of few successful campaigns with which he was associated, but that did not stop him going on for decade after decade, recruiting journalists who were specialists in vituperation. It is a matter of congratulation for Michael Foot that he was recruited on those grounds, not because his views were the same as those of Lord Beaverbrook. In fact, they disagreed on almost everything except the fun of strong argument.

There is no argument in favour of a newspaper going in for inaccuracies. It would be marvellous if they could be as accurate and discriminating in their political and social reporting as they are in their sports reporting. A newspaper that was wrong about who had won the boxing or the football match, or about the ratio of wickets to runs, would soon be laughed out of the news stands. People would no longer buy it. However, it would not look to newspapers to follow the standards set by Members of Parliament because we have had an example this morning —that of the hon. Member for Hammersmith—of an hon. Member returning to the Chamber and telling us what had gone on in his absence. Perhaps he, like me, should have been a journalist.

I should declare one or two interests. I earn occasional sums of money from writing—not normally very much, especially when my editor is Mr. Auberon Waugh. I have had my legal expenses paid by various parts of the media. I am grateful for that, but I hope that they do not make it necessary again. I am prepared to ring up the newspapers and criticise, as I did yesterday with The Sun. I asked to speak to the editor and I was told that Mr. Kelvin McKenzie was away on holiday. I thought that he never went on holiday, but I left my complaint with his secretary.

We can look for examples in large newspapers as well as small ones of articles giving misleading impressions. For example, The Times diary yesterday reproduced part of a story from the BBC staff magazine, which said that Mr. John Birt had a new bathroom at work. However, Ariel gave the explanation for that, which was that the plumbing throughout the building had been changed. For a newspaper to put in the joke element and hold someone up to scorn is fair game, but it would be better if it were to publish a correction. It would also have been better if The Times had bothered to put in a correction when it described Lord Runcie, when Archbishop of Canterbury, as not being able to make up his mind about the Falklands campaign. Lord Runcie was clear at the time, and in written publications afterwards, that he supported throwing the Argentine invasion forces out of the Falklands. In many sectors, one can provide examples where newspapers do not live up to the standards that they have set themselves.

Mr. Soley: I should like the hon. Gentleman to concentrate on more serious examples. Most of the less serious examples get resolved easily and, where they do not, there is no great problem. I am worried about stories like that which appeared in The Sun at the time of the tragic Jamie Bulger murder. The headline said, "Boy, 12 held for Jamie murder". The police said at the time, and it was in the story:

"Nobody in this police station is being held for Jamie's murder."

The story and headline lead to the harassment of the family of that boy, who were in no position to complain. It could have led to wrongful conviction, as it has in the case of many other stories. Can we focus on the more serious aspects? By trying to talk out the Bill, the hon. Gentleman is not only continuing his practice—he has voted against press freedom many times and I can give the examples if he likes—but denying families such as the one involved here the right to have stories corrected. In that case, the boy had never been held for murder.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That was rather a long intervention.

Mr. Bottomley: It is not my purpose to justify mistakes, just as it is not my purpose to justify the mistakes that the hon. Gentleman made earlier. I would criticise the newspaper. If people argue that we must have a system that deals with newspapers in a way that is different from how it deals with others, so that they can never make mistakes, we should have a further debate on that.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for National Heritage (Mr. Robert Key): Is my hon. Friend aware that in the Evening Standard, which I gather is currently on the streets, there is a definitive report of our debate and its outcome? Apparently, we are in the middle of a furious Commons row.

Mr. Bottomley: Well! I think that it is a very good thing that newspaper journalists will not always reveal their sources. I shall not accuse anybody about where that report may have come from. I do not believe that it came from a Member of this House.

Mr. Soley: Before the hon. Gentleman leaves that point and turns to——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Before we turn to anything, may I remind the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) that this is not a Second Reading debate. We are debating a new clause. The hon. Gentleman must address himself strictly to the merits of the new clause.

Mr. Soley: I understand that ruling, Madam Deputy Speaker, and I anticipated it, to some extent, for I felt that we were going a bit wide. Nevertheless, I am all in favour of that. The hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) voted recently in favour of journalists being made to reveal their sources. That is one of the problems with the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 and why Channel 4 Box Productions ended up in court last year. The hon. Gentleman voted for it. He never spoke out against it at any stage.

Mr. Bottomley: I do not dispute that. That was not, I thought, what we were discussing. Can I just make one remark on what we were discussing—the standards that journalists should reach. The hon. Gentleman held up the front page of a small-sized newspaper. My criticism of newspapers, besides the specific point that the hon. Gentleman has fairly made, is that 240 two-year-olds die unnatural deaths each year, most of them predictable, most of them avoidable, and most of the means by which they die being given virtually no attention whatever. If I were to make a criticism of the media, it would be that they report unusual incidents, such as motorway fog crashes.

Under the guidelines, which I believe should be open to inspection and which is the subject of the new clause, the media should be asked to think about their role in trying to understand common incidents which lead to avoidable disadvantage, distress and handicap.

Each year, an average of seven people die in motorway fog crashes. Each day, an average of 14 people die in built-up areas. Which gets the attention? Which gets coverage on television or on the front page? It is the rare motorway fog crash. Which death of a two-year-old gets all the attention? It is the rare occasion, such as we have seen in the north-west, that grabs the headlines. What we do not hear about are the two-year-olds who die in, if I may describe it this way, packets of 16 or 20 each year in predictable ways.

It is not my purpose to stand here and point to all the problems with the media. There are problems with the media, but the House needs to understand that legislation is unlikely to be successful. If that course were pursued and people broke the legislation, there would be a growing demand, as I said when I ended my speech on Second Reading, for barbed wire around the pen.

I am holding the "Index on Censorship" to which the hon. Member for Hammersmith referred, as well as to the prevention of terrorism provisions and other measures. Some of them could be debated on their merits, but the general point that I make in the new clause is that we should ask proprietors, editors and those who control journalists and newspapers to tell us what standards they are after. I would not want such a provision to be incorporated in the Bill, because I do not want the Bill to be passed. My first words on Second Reading were that I did not want the Bill to get through. My aim is not to talk about it, but to destroy it. That follows the line I took when I voted against John Browne's privacy Bill—not because I do not believe in the right to privacy, but because I believe that legislation does not make all people perfect. It does not work.

So we come back to the question of what we would do. In this country, 30 per cent. of males aged 30 have already been convicted of a criminal offence for which they could have gone to gaol for six months or more. That number of people will be added to by journalists, sub-editors, editors, publishers and distributors. It is far better to ask ourselves what it is that we are trying to reduce. We are trying to reduce inaccuracy and unacceptable intrusions into privacy. We also have to decide what our approach will be to the casualties—those who carry the cost of the free press. To some extent, as I said at the TSB Forum on the power of the press yesterday—the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) was also present to hear the distinguished editor of the Financial Times, Richard Lambert, speak—we have to accept that trying to have the press with total accuracy is like trying to have war without casualties: it does not happen. We must ask ourselves how best we can reduce the number of casualties without circumscribing or curtailing the press too much.

I do not agree with all the criticisms that have been made of the new Press Complaints Commission; it has done a far better job than has been suggested. It would work better if we tackled the problem from the point of view of what the proprietor and editor are willing to tolerate and what standards the journalists are trying to maintain.

Let us consider the point of view of the proprietor. It is perfectly reasonable for the BBC to produce guidelines on news, current affairs, documentaries, magazine programmes, features and factual programmes. Newspapers should be encouraged to do the same. I pay tribute to the South East London and Kentish Mercury Group, which regularly prints corrections on page two. It clears up ambiguities and corrects omissions and no one thinks less of it for doing so. I also pay tribute to a journalist, Jerry Green, of the Eltham and Sidcup News Shopper. He is one of few journalists whom I know who has never got a thing wrong. He checks and double checks. His news sense may not always be the same as mine, but he uses information that is true and accurate and makes it clear when he is quoting an opinion. If that standard can be achieved by a journalist in my constituency, it is the standard that others should be aiming for. The disagreement between the hon. Member for Hammersmith and me is that he and the Select Committee on National Heritage believe that it is possible to sew up the process of news gathering, of news tasting and of news editing in such a way as to ensure that mistakes and deliberate actions do not happen. I do not think that it is like that.

Mr. Soley: I should hate the hon. Gentleman to address an argument that does not exist. I agree with him. I have been encouraging newspapers to run correction columns because it is not always possible to get things right. The first article of the code of the Press Complaints Commission calls for accuracy. It tells newspapers that they should make a correction and adjudicates on it. The argument is not whether inaccuracies appear, but how they are corrected and, above all, who adjudicates. Editors adjudicate on themselves: that is an issue which the hon. Gentleman must address.

Mr. Bottomley: I think that, in the main, editors should adjudicate on themselves and that the majority on the Press Complaints Commission should be editors because that would be the best way of exerting the most pressure.

I want to keep the attention of the House for a moment on the benefits of leaving responsibility where it is. I know that I have been affected by the relative success in reducing drinking and driving in Britain. That was socially acceptable; people often knew that it was wrong, but continued to do it or tolerated other people around them doing it. The incidence is still too high, but it has been reduced at the levels where it has the most consequences by more than two thirds in the past 15 years by social change —by what people are willing to accept. If people are willing to discuss the matter explictly and to involve editors, proprietors and journalists—although not particularly the NUJ because any self-respecting journalist would reject the decisions of its executive and most NUJ journalists do not know what is being decided in their name—and if the House can make it clear that the group that will be most concerned to protect the freedoms of the press are Members of Parliament and that the press will be the next keenest group, we shall get a long way further forward. By giving people responsibility and by talking about it openly, we can reduce most of the problems.

Proprietors should have a better reason than I have heard for not having a published code that they want people to follow. Editors should be pretty sure that their staff know, and are reminded of, the standards that the newspaper sets itself. Richard Lambert said that the Financial Times relies on its reputation for accuracy, and the paper gets upset when it gets anything wrong. The Reader's Digest believes in not only accuracy but punctuation and getting everything right. It checks facts twice, which is one of the reasons why it is one of the most read and best selling periodicals in the country, but producing the Reader's Digest is a very different operation from producing a daily newspaper.

I think that the hon. Member for Hammersmith will confirm that the major problem is not with the local or regional press but with the national press. We should be clear that we are talking not only about small newspapers but about the broadsheets which have the same capacity to be inaccurate. Let us agree that we are talking mainly about inaccuracy or severe distortion. I am not concerned about newspapers being partial, biased or propagandist.

Mr. Oliver Heald (Hertfordshire, North): The new clause refers to editorial or journalistic guidance. Prior to the Calcutt report on privacy, the whole debate was occasion by the incident with Gorden Kaye when someone from the Sunday Sport burst into his hospital bedroom and behaved appallingly. The editor later described it as a great old-fashioned scoop. Does the guidance referred to in the new clause include such incidents which are nothing to do with accuracy—I am sure it is accurate to say that a journalist from the paper behaved in that way—but simply involves appalling behaviour?

Mr. Bottomley: The BBC's guidance—I recommend that hon. Members and people outside read it, but not adopt it if they work in the media—makes it clear that there should be good reason, and that the matter should be referred upwards, if someone intends to break the normal guidelines.

There are difficulties in trying to legislate for some related issues because if people are seeking evidence of serious wrong-doing, they often have to work with secret microphones or to film secretly. I do not claim to have sufficient knowledge always to put the dividing line where it should be, but it is like telling the difference between an elephant and a hippopotamus: one can normally distinguish one from the other, and in the same way, one can usually tell whether something is acceptable or not. In matters about which a significant part of the general public disagrees with an editor or a proprietor, having a debate or argument makes sense.

I have twice tried, unsuccessfully, to put three other groups on the same basis as journalists. The first was political parties in respect of their advertising. The Advertising Standards Authority said that it was impossible to determine whether a political party's advertising is capable of being judged right or wrong and it is, therefore, not covered by its standards.

The second group was lawyers in court. With the exception of my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald) and any other lawyers present, I believe that lawyers spend a lot of time putting ideas to people in such a way as to try to get them to agree to something that is not true. They say, "I put it to you . . ." when they know perfectly well that what they are about to say is highly unlikely or a contradiction of the truth, but they say it because they have been instructed to say it or have made it up themselves, and wish to test people's arguments. It is impractical to require lawyers in court always to avoid doing that. It sometimes means substituting their judgment for what they have been instructed, like the journalist who has written the story in the Evening Standard about our proceedings today.

The third group is Members of Parliament. It is not a serious suggestion, but it would be interesting to consider how we could live up to standards that many people require in terms of avoiding privacy disclosures or inaccuracy. How might we allow a member of the general public to say that, on Friday 23 April, Peter Bottomley said something that was ambiguous, damaging or wrong, or a combination of those things? It is not practical, so we come back to what is most likely to have an effect in the medium term.

It can be agreed that legislation will not always work. Even if we had legislation covering the limited question of how to enforce a judgment made by a Press Complaints Commission—let alone an authority—what happens if and when an editor disagrees?

I give as an example a hypothetical case of a journalist who, after someone has been convicted of an IRA murder, says that the person who has been convicted is innocent. That journalist would be flatly contradicting the judgment of the original court, of a jury, of the Court of Appeal and of the House of Lords. The fact that five, 10 or 15 years later it becomes clear that there has been a gross miscarriage of justice does not help anyone trying to make a decision about a complaint that might have been made about that report when it was first published.

We should be very careful about putting legislative requirements on the media. We could debate the many requirements that already exist. I am still waiting for a letter about the existing restrictions on the media. I forget whether it should be from my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for National Heritage, from the Home Office or from my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster who is responsible for the citizens charter. There are probably about 200 restrictions in one form or another——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order I do not see how this relates to the new clause.

Mr. Bottomley: We are talking about whether it is possible for my proposal for having journalistic and editorial guidance to be a substitute for legislation. I do not intend to explain at length what is in my mind. As I understand it, we are discussing a Bill which would introduce legislative and statutory requirements. I propose a substitute for that. In doing so, I may occasionally stray towards the limits of order. I fully understand the guidance, correction and instructions from the Chair. I believe that it is better to concentrate on what proprietors, editors and journalists say are the standards to which they want to live up.

I go one stage further. Part of the instructions should be that when there is a significant ambiguity or inaccuracy, the periodical or newspaper concerned should say so at once. That would reduce any subsequent damages if there were a case for defamation or for libel. I suspect that that could deal with one or two cases that may yet come to court. In the case in which I was involved, if the editor had said straight away, "We did not mean to say that and we now understand that it was wrong", that would have been a standard met by the media which would have got rid of the need to employ lawyers.

The purpose of our debate today is not to reduce the costs of accuracy to newspapers. It is probably to raise the costs to them of accuracy. We are talking about newspapers, unless they are like the Sunday Sport which is losing circulation fast, with 70,000 copies out of circulation during the past year, and which will disappear from news stands relatively soon. We are talking about newspapers that class themselves as newspapers. If we ask how many times The Sun, to pick one example, is being sued for libel now compared with the figure for five or 10 years ago, the answer is very seldom.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): That is no measure.

Mr. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman says that that is no measure. I believe that it is relevant.

Mr. Corbett: I say that it is no measure because many people who feel wronged and damaged by the antics of the sewer Sun cannot meet the legal bills involved in taking the paper on. The Sun well knows that, which is why it abuses its position.

Mr. Bottomley: That is not relevant to my remark that fewer people are suing The Sun. I suspect that if Lord McGregor were speaking in this debate, he would say that the Press Complaints Commission is getting fewer complaints from ordinary people. That is one of the reasonable tests of whether the pressures are working.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): Is my hon. Friend aware that the editor of The Daily Star has said that as a result of peer pressure within the Press Complaints Commission, he has now disciplined his newspaper so that there are fewer complaints than there were before? Self-regulation is taking effect.

Mr. Bottomley: That is the case. I do not want to take up too much time as we lost so much time with points of order from the hon. Member for Hammersmith during our debate on the Road Traffic (Driving Instruction by Disabled Persons) Bill.

If we get rid of the idea that comprehensive legislation will bring a comprehensive solution, we can engage in debate about the standards to which proprietors, editors and journalists hold themselves. I recommend the method of criticising the BBC, for example, and saying, "What you did in the 'Real Lives' programme was not in accordance with your own guidelines." The BBC would then have to say that it did not want to pay attention to its guidelines, that the guidelines were wrong or that it got it wrong. I think that there is a far more effective way of proceeding.

The hon. Member for Hammersmith has rightly raised questions at his own press conferences and hearings, and I congratulate him on that. Some of the cases have come up again in the Select Committee on National Heritage. Where there are problems, they need attention; they do not necessarily need legislation. In so many areas, we have gone from having our awareness raised, to saying, "They should not do it", to legislating. The third stage ought to involve those concerned saying, "I should not do it." The fourth stage should be, "I intend not to do it"; and the last should be, "We don't get things wrong and when we do we are very angry about it; we say so and put it right"—which some editors already can say. That is what we are trying to achieve.

What John Browne proposed was wrong and would not have worked. What the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) proposed in his Right of Reply Bill would not have worked, and the present Bill would not work. My new clause would work, but I do not believe that it needs a Bill to go with it. It should be a requirement that people in the media place upon themselves, and I hope that that is what they will do.

Mr. Soley: I am in some difficulty, because the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) went rather wide. I shall attempt to explain what I think that the hon. Gentleman is trying to do by means of the new clause. I shall address the points he made as briefly as possible to allow other hon. Members to have their say, although I do not think that time should trouble us too much, given that hon. Members took so much time on the previous Bill with the deliberate intention of talking my Bill out.

Mr. Heald: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Soley: Yes, but let me just say that I have that from Conservative Members——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We have gone through all this before. We have had quite enough of it. Perhaps the hon. Member for Hammersmith will address himself to the new clause.

Mr. Soley: I shall be delighted to, Madam Deputy Speaker, but in that case I shall not be able to give way to the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald).

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is under no obligation to give way.

Mr. Soley: In that case, Madam Deputy Speaker, I shall refuse—rather reluctantly, because I always prefer to take interventions.

I will give the hon. Member for Eltham credit on one issue and one issue only: he comes to the debate with a genuine belief in press freedom. I must say, however, that he is one of the most confused speakers on the subject that I have ever heard. I have to say to him, too, that his voting record on press freedom is bad. I have checked how he has voted on press freedom in the past. He voted against the defence of press freedom on a number of critical issues, including the issues that he raised just now when he referred to the ability of journalists to protect their sources. The journalist who was fined £75,000 last year was told in court that, if it happened again—that is, if he protected his sources again—he would face much more serious consequences. The hon. Member for Eltham never spoke out against that; he voted for it. He voted for the Official Secrets Act 1989 and for the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, which allow the police to confiscate journalists' materials. He voted for all those measures, yet he talks about being in favour of press freedom.

Let me make it clear to the hon. Gentleman what the debate is about. It is not about whether the British press needs more regulation. I restate my view, which I have expressed many times, that the British press is over-regulated in the wrong way and for the wrong reasons. We actually inhibit good investigative journalists, yet we allow individuals to be abused. The headline in The Sun— is but one example. I have already made the point that we should be looking not at the trivial cases to which the hon.

[Mr. Soley]

Member for Eltham referred but at those much more critical cases. We are talking about a family whose son was taken to the police station to be questioned as a possible witness. Even The Sun quoted the police correctly as saying,

"We do not hold the murderer in this police station".

However, as hon. Members can see for themselves, the headline was:

"Boy 12 is held for Jamie Murder."

The hon. Member for Eltham claims that it is not a matter of who is doing the best thing, the worst thing or how to improve matters. He is saying that the people concerned, and that 12-year-old, have no rights. I believe that they have rights. We could extend those rights by saying that they could sue for libel. However, we were talking about a family which was in no position to complain effectively——

Lady Olga Maitland: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

1.30 pm

Mr. Soley: If the hon. Lady will give me time to finish, I will give way. It is very important that she hears the argument through.

The family to which I referred was very vulnerable not least because it had no stable accommodation. How is that family supposed to sue for libel when it will not be able to obtain legal aid as it is being moved onto other accommodation? How can that family go to the Press Complaints Commission when the complaint must be put in writing? Can I take the matter up for them? No, I cannot because I am a third party. No one else can take the matter up on their behalf—other than perhaps a lawyer if the family situation is stable enough and it has the necessary income, which it does not.

The amazing thing about the story——

Lady Olga Maitland: Will the hon. Gentleman give way now?

Mr. Soley: I will give way to the hon. Lady when I have completed this point.

According to the new clause, all these issues should be a matter of guidance for editors. There is no problem about that. That is happening now.

Lady Olga Maitland: Give way.

Mr. Soley: I will give way in just a moment. The hon. Lady should be patient. Conservative Members are terribly impatient today.

I am grateful to the people in News International who officially and unofficially have kept me well informed about the views of News International—[Interruption.] Conservative Members would probably like me to be taken to court for not revealing my sources. The hon. Member for Eltham would certainly like that as he supported the legislation to allow that.

In a news release headed

"News International Supports Press Self-Regulation"

News International states that editors

"today made a further commitment to self-regulation of the press by their decision to incorporate, or continue to incorporate the Press Complaints Commission's new code of conduct into the journalists' handbook of each title."

That is something similar to what the hon. Member for Eltham seeks to achieve in the new clause. The news release continues:

"Compliance with the code will be a condition of appointment, and breach of the code will be a disciplinary matter."

That news release is dated 27 January 1993. However, the article to which I referred appeared in The Sun on 17 February. Has the editor been disciplined? Has he been fired? Has he even been told off? Has he put it right? No, he has not. Despite the editor's code, he published the article. However, the family concerned has lost all its rights. The child involved could, as in many of the cases in recent years—and this is one reason why I introduced the Bill—have been wrongfully convicted. We do not have the right to put innocent people in prison in the name of press freedom.

Lady Olga Maitland: The hon. Gentleman appears to be making enormously sweeping statements. With regard to the headline in the newspaper to which the hon. Gentleman referred, how does he know for a fact that the family made a complaint? Does he know for a fact that the family wrote to the Press Complaints Commission?

Mr. Soley: If the hon. Lady considers the family's background she will see that I used my words cautiously. I do not wish to label the family and I would certainly not say about it the kind of things that The Sun said. I am satisfied that the family is not in a position to pursue a complaint.

The issue is very important. If we reach the appropriate point in the debate, I could mention other examples—if I were to quote them now you would rightly rule me out of order Madam Deputy Speaker—of the way in which the Press Complaints Commission is totally inadequate to help people who are not well equipped, for whatever reason, to make formal written complaints of the type required by the PCC, and who do not have the safeguard of a legal person or adviser to help them. Many people are in that position.

If the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) would like to pursue the matter with me afterwards, I will explain the problem in much more detail. However, I repeat: have some sensitivity for the family involved; look at the original story. If the hon. Lady has any sensitivity, she might begin to understand why I am confident that the family could not pursue the matter on its own. That is the point.

Let us be clear about what the hon. Gentleman seeks to do in his amendment:

"Each newspaper will make available for public inspection at its registered office a copy of any editorial or journalistic guidance provided for the use of its staff . . . Such guidance shall be open to inspection during normal working hours of the company."

That is perfectly reasonable. It is right that newspapers should be encouraged to do it. But it should not be a matter for legislation. The hon. Gentleman is determined to put that provision in the Bill. I am not too worried about it. I would not lose any sleep if it were included. But it is not the appropriate way to do it. The hon. Gentleman, in his muddled thinking on the matter, does not understand the dangers in this.

My Bill focuses on accuracy and does not fine newspapers—all the suggestions by the ombudsman, David Calcutt and so on include fining newspapers—because, if we go down that road, we restrict press freedom because the threat of the fine can worry genuine and good investigative journalists. We must make the newspaper put right what it has got wrong.

I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman when he says that newspapers have good practices. As he said, there are many such practices, especially in local newspapers. Newspapers run columns for corrections and outline editorial policy. That is good: it must be encouraged. Indeed, I am pleased that it is happening more often as a result of my campaign. That is part of what I am about. It is one of the reasons why I can say that, win or lose today, the fight will go on. More importantly, it has already achieved a great deal, and I am determined not to let go of it for that reason.

The press will not be allowed to continue getting away with the disgraceful lies which rip away the life of a family, as in the case of the headline I referred to earlier, and at the same time create a situation in which people can face wrongful conviction. Dealing again with the hon. Gentleman's amendment, we must remember that having guidance is not enough. The case of the Taylor sisters is going before the courts on appeal partly on the basis of press reporting.

Unlike the National Union of Journalists which did a U-turn on the matter, the hon. Gentleman has not thought the matter through. We must have something that stops such disgraceful lies being told. The answer is not to fine or punish in some way: it is simply to say that if the newspapers get it wrong, they must put it right. People say to me, as the hon. Gentleman did, that we cannot have accuracy because it is someone else's mind, but I did not invent the idea of adjudicating on accuracy. The editors and proprietors invented it: they put it in the code of the Press Complaints Commission. If they cannot be accurate, they should take it out of the code. But it is there. My only argument then is if they say that it can be done, if they give adjudication the credence of being article 1 in their code —not way down the list—it should be seen to be independent.

The hon. Gentleman should know from his good work in the alcohol and driving field, that it would be unfair if, when he went to court and gave his evidence, the police gave their evidence against him and then took off their helmets, climbed into the judge's box, put on a wig and said that they would now adjudicate. The hon. Gentleman would say that that was unfair. I am simply saying that if the editors adjudicate on their own errors, can we be surprised if people do not have confidence in the system? If the editors had adjudicated on the story I referred to, could we have confidence in it? I have told the editors many times that it does not matter if they give the right ruling: their problem is that they do not have credibility because they are not seen as independent. That is the reason why I want to set up a body which has some independence and, above all, involves working journalists but not so many editors. If such a body is dominated by editors, it is dominated by people who have moved away from the journalistic world into the managerial world. That is important because they then also have an interest in circulation.

The hon. Member for Eltham made the important point that a paper can lose readers if it gets it wrong. That is why—he may already know the explanation, I do not know—local papers tend to be better than national papers. They are much closer to their community. The national papers do not care so much.

The Sun got it badly wrong on Hillsborough and burned its fingers. So no one in Merseyside buys The Sun now. That is the only example of which I am aware of a national paper losing readers. We have a duty to protect the rights of people such as the 12-year-old child and his family to whom I referred and other people like them. Unless Conservative Members address that issue seriously, we shall continue to lose press freedom in Britain. They should remember that we have been warned by the International Press Institute that we are losing press freedom as a result of some of the acts to which I have referred. At the same time, abuses will continue.

Therefore, the argument is not that an amendment such as that be included in my Bill; it is that such an amendment should be included in any code of practice whether drawn up by my body or any other body. But that is not an alternative.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham): The hon. Gentleman said that no one in Merseyside bought The Sun. If I could show him on a future occasion that that was untrue and people in Merseyside bought The Sun, would he publish an apology and correct his statement?

Mr. Soley: The hon. Gentleman makes the mistake of thinking that just because I say something which is not technically 100 per cent. true, we must immediately——

Mr. Peter Atkinson: That is not the point.

Mr. Soley: The hon. Gentleman obviously thinks that. I ask him to hear me through. I have been over the ground many times. There are two answers. First, the hon. Gentleman is technically right. Of course, someone on Merseyside buys The Sun. The difference is that my words do not go through the letterboxes of millions of people. They may go out through the media. I can be challenged on them.

The problem with newspapers is that they stay in print and are referred to and no one can answer them back. No one came forward and said that the 12-year-old to whom I referred was not being held for murder. But the hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) stood up and said, "You are not right." That is what the Bill is about. The argument is not merely between the two sides of the House. One of my hon. Friends could have picked me up on what I said. People can correct us here in the House. Inasmuch as people outside hear what goes on in the House, they can hear the correction if another hon. Member makes it. They cannot hear the correction of what the newspaper said about the 12-year-old child.

I am simply providing a mechanism which operates for people such as the family to which I referred regardless of the fact that they cannot operate the existing system.

Mr. Peter Atkinson: My point may have been trivial but the hon. Gentleman seeks to force on the press precisely such trivial detail. My point illustrates that absolutely.

Mr. Soley: The hon. Gentleman has not thought it through. Accuracy is the first article in the Press Complaints Commission code. I did not put it in. I did not say, "I think I will do accuracy. No one has ever heard of it before, so I shall invent it." I knew that the article was in the code. The Press Complaints Commission adjudicates on it. Am I right? It adjudicates whether the matter is trivial or not. The hon. Gentleman does not deny it.

[Mr. Soley]

If the commission adjudicates, the argument is not whether we can have accuracy or even whether we should want it. It is about who adjudicates. That is what the hon. Gentleman must address. I am offering a method of getting it right. The method has been well tried. The BBC and the independent television and radio companies operate according to such a code. No one goes round the world—the hon. Member for Eltham ought to consider this point—saying that the BBC and the independent television and radio companies do not have a high standard of accuracy. No one says that they do not do good investigative journalism or that they are not fair, decent or good. People have a high regard for the British electronic media. Sadly, and undeservedly for some parts of it, the British press has a poor reputation.

When I go abroad, people say, "We envy you the BBC and ITV, but how on earth have you ended up with the tabloid press? We do not have such a press." They are right.

Lady Olga Maitland: I am not sure that I go along with the hon. Gentleman's interpretation that the electronic media has the same validity and basis as the press. Television stations, unlike newspapers, are governed by a franchise. That discipline is almost written into their being.

1.45 pm

Mr. Soley: It is interesting to note the evidence that was given to my Committee by investigative journalists who were opposed to my Bill, who had worked in television and the press. One was asked why inaccurate reporting was not a problem in the electronic media and he said that there was a culture of accuracy in the BBC. The hon. Lady should note that.

Those in the electronic media tend to check their stories much more carefully than certain sections of the press. The good newspapers do the same, but some newspapers do not. The problem for all newspapers is that they still have not learnt that people have the basic right to expect their news to be reported accurately or, if Conservative Members prefer the language of Baroness Thatcher, that people have customer rights.

When one buys a newspaper it should, perhaps unusually or surprisingly if it is part of the tabloid press, contain some news. If one wants to call a publication something else, that is fine, but a newspaper should contain news, not disinformation. No one is disputing the fact that newspapers can get things wrong sometimes, but there should be a mechanism to put that right. Newspapers should not be fined or closed down, but that is what will happen if we follow Sir David Calcutt's recommendations about ombudsmen and others.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I agree with much of what the hon. Gentleman has said, but television news has fewer problems because it deals with fewer stories and it uses fewer words. Television does not have to compete for attention on the news stand and therefore inaccurate reporting is inherently less of a problem for the electronic media.

Mr. Soley: That is right. I may be asked for my opinion on camera and I am responsible for what I say. That does not mean that the television station has to correct me if I am wrong; it is simply reporting me and if I get it wrong it is my responsibility. The hon. Member for Eltham, however, should not underestimate the culture of accuracy in the electronic media. The difficulty is in creating that same culture in the press. We are trying to do it in the wrong way.

The hon. Member for Eltham, who moved the new clause, will vote for privacy legislation when it comes before the House. We will then be left with yet another restriction on press freedom, which will not work particularly well. That legislation will not protect the rich and the powerful as much as some people fear because there will be a public interest let-out clause. It will protect some people, however, and I am not against the principle behind privacy legislation. I will not, however, vote for legislation of the type that I fear unless it is matched by a freedom of information Act or a press freedom Act. That is what the National Heritage Select Committee has recommended.

I suspect that hon. Members will vote for privacy legislation as blindly as they voted for the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, the prevention of terrorism Acts, the Official Secrets Act 1989 and all the other Acts that have restricted press freedom. They will troop through the Lobby, but they will then ask why we have lost press freedom. We will have done so because they are blind to the problem—too much regulation of the wrong type that does not solve the problems I have highlighted.

If the hon. Member for Eltham agrees with me about that he should rethink his opposition to my Bill so that rights are given to people such as the 12-year-old kid in Liverpool and others who have suffered wrongful conviction—I have many other examples in my files. Hon. Members should consider such serious cases and recognise that I am not arguing about whether one can adjudicate on accuracy; I am simply arguing about who does it and how. That is what the argument should be about and that is why individual members of the Government have said to me, "You are right. This is not about privacy, but about accuracy. That is what matters." The new clause is not very helpful and should not be included in the legislation, but if the House agrees to, I shall not object as it will not detract from the Bill.

Mr. Thurnham: I hope that the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) feels that we are having a useful debate—we certainly did earlier. I am not sure whether it could be described as a furious row, but the temperature has risen a little. One or two Opposition Members are now present. There are no Liberals present and only four or five Labour Members.

I am grateful that the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) is present as it allows me to remind her of what she said in Standing Committee. She quoted some examples and said that she would come back to me with accurate information. I know that we are all busy in the House, but I do not believe that I have received that information. If I have and I have omitted to read it, I apologise, but I do not believe that the hon. Lady has come back with the accurate information that she promised on 3 March, as recorded at column 27 of the report of Standing Committee F.

Ms Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate): I apologise to the hon. Gentleman if I left him with a misunderstanding. I thought that the issue had been adequately covered by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett), when he said that there could be no third-party intervention in the case to which the hon. Gentleman referred. If the hon. Gentleman is anxious for that information I shall make my best efforts and present it to him.

Mr. Thurnham rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Before the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) continues his speech, will he explain how what he has already said relates to new clause 1?

Mr. Thurnham: It relates to new clause 1 and the need for accuracy, a code of conduct and the ability of the public to inspect, at registered offices, a copy of any editorial or journalistic guidance provided for the use of staff. It must have accuracy as its first aim, as the hon. Member for Hammersmith stressed.

I was in two minds about new clause 1 when I saw how it was drafted, because I feel that it is up to each organisation to decide how it wants to run things. Rather than have the sort of Bill that the hon. Gentleman has proposed, I would be happier to settle for the new clause. We now have the Select Committee report, which was not available when we had our debates in Standing Committee. It contains the proposal that there should be an ombudsman who, no doubt, would want to look at the editorial journalistic guidance provided to staff.

The issue at the heart of the new clause is accuracy. The hon. Member for Hammersmith quoted The Sun on the tragedy of the Jamie murder. He was right to say that The Sun was proved to be inaccurate. However, the most important aspect of that tragic murder was that, despite the fact that there were videos of the two children who were involved in the abduction, it was a week before they were identified. The community and the rest of the country were concerned that it took so long for the police to identify the children who have now been arrested. It was the delay of a week that was so serious and it was important that everyone was alerted to the case. Although the headline was proved to be wrong, it was right for the newspaper to highlight the case and the anxieties arising from it. The hon. Member for Hammersmith placed great stress on the fact that the family was wronged. I do not have the advantage of having the article in front of me, but I do not believe that it named the family.

Mr. Soley: It gave the address. The hon. Gentleman seems to be saying that the fact that the article was wrong was a minor point. As I said in my opening comments, the story accurately said that the police were not holding the murderer in their cells. That fact was placed way down at the bottom of the story. The police had tried to head off the story at that stage. The headline, however, was damning. I know that the hon. Gentleman has an affinity for News International, but even he cannot defend that. It is indefensible.

Mr. Thurnham: I was not going to return to the question of alleged collusion. It is, of course, absolute nonsense. I was amazed to hear the hon. Gentleman talking about his links with News International; he said that it had kept him fully informed. So if there has been any collusion it appears to have been on his part.

I think that the hon. Gentleman introduced the Bill for purely political reasons. He thinks that News International puts out a political line not in agreement with his own, so he singles it out for attack. He has singled out The Sun for attack, but it was right to highlight these issues even if it made mistakes. As my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) said, there will be casualties. It is impossible to have news reporting on the scale that we have enjoyed without some errors at some stages of the proceedings.

I commend my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham for allowing me to debate these issues. He himself has been badly wronged by the press. I have complained to the Press Complaints Commission about the way in which he was treated in one national newspaper. He seems to be able to look back on it all with remarkable good humour, but he was badly wronged. I believe that he got some sort of settlement and I hope that there will be no repetition of what happened.

I have had occasion to complain to the paper in question about another issue as well, but it seems to have improved since then. Ultimately, such matters are for the editor's judgment and that of the people who buy the papers——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have been following the hon. Gentleman's argument as best I can. It seems to have become a general debate on the press, whereas it should be about the new clause under consideration.

Mr. Thurnham: I apologise. I was just trying to answer some points made earlier. If I have strayed further than I should have, I am happy to desist and let others make their own points.

I am not entirely sure what is the best way to improve standards in the press, but I am certain that we do not want a statutory so-called independent press authority, as proposed by the hon. Member for Hammersmith. If we had a Bill that consisted solely of new clause 1, that might be the solution. We wait to hear more of the Government's proposals for necessary changes. I hope to hear the Minister comment on the suggested ombudsman. If an ombudsman were in place, new clause 1 could feature prominently in any legislation on this subject.

Lady Olga Maitland: I support new clause 1. As a practising journalist for 25 years I have always believed that self-regulation regulates the press most effectively.

I am a member of the NUJ. I am not employed by News International. I was reared in the great editorial tradition of Beaverbrook on the Sunday Express, under Sir John Junor. He controlled the newspaper with tight discipline and strict standards of the sort reflected in the guidelines proposed in the new clause. In the news room we were almost terrorised by the guidelines that he imposed. We could not quote someone without precisely identifying him; we had to be precise about our sources of information when explaining ourselves to the news editor; we could not fly a kite in the hope that we would get away with it.

Above all, we had to check, check and check again. We should be concerned about the kind of behaviour that has been pointed up. I sympathise with the hon. Member for Hammersmith in his frustration over the way in which the press has got out of control in some sectors. However, the Bill is a knee-jerk reaction, whereas new clause 1 would satisfactorily remedy the defects with which we are faced. The difficulties under which the press is operating—together with the rather tacky sales war between newspapers, which seems to override sober judgment on what it is suitable to print—is not helped by a knee-jerk response to that material. The main point of new clause 1 is that self-regulation would put that situation into order.

2 pm

What would come out of the Bill if it ever received Royal Assent—mercifully, it will not—is a charter to muzzle or gag the press. That fits poorly on a tremendous democratic tradition. We have to take into account not only the desire to punish the wrongdoer, but the importance of ensuring that the press, in the name of democracy, is able to expose wrong, to challenge and, by being unfettered, to speak up without fear or favour to bring wrongs to public light. I am sorry that the press was fettered when it tried to expose Robert Maxwell. It was a scandal and a tragedy that he used all the weapons at his command to gag the press.

Mr. Ken Livingstone (Brent, East): Was the hon. Lady equally disturbed when the press was fettered—in particular, the New Statesman—when it tried to report the Zircon affair and the Government of the day sent in police to smash down the journalist's door and seize all his notes?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. Lady continues, let me make the point that we are not having a general debate on the issue of press freedom or the curtailment of the press. We are looking, precisely, at a new clause.

Lady Olga Maitland: Thank you Madam Deputy Speaker. I shall return to the main point of new clause 1, which would require newspapers to provide guidelines.

Self-regulation would achieve more than would an independent press authority, set up, not as independent in the way suggested by the hon. Member for Hammersmith, but by the Government of the day, who might not be as scrupulous as the Government whom we are used to. As such a press authority would be seriously flawed, I could not possibly accept it. New clause 1 would redress the problems.

A press authority such as the one proposed would be, de facto, judge and jury. It could become an unguided missile. It could wield its powers on the basis of loosely defined duties, rather like a quasi-judicial quango. Should a Government body enforce on newspapers what they should or should not publish? It is up to newspapers to retain the powers that they already have.They are already responding to their peer group and public pressure to get their act in order. It rather reminds me of the dark days of Pravda, the Soviet truth newspaper, which was anything but.

Mr. Livingstone: It had a code of guidance.

Lady Olga Maitland: We are talking not just about accuracy, but about what is truth. Philosophers have been foxed about that since time began. That could give rise to a great deal of work for lawyers. An independent press authority would hardly inspire trust and confidence in newspaper, if it tried to be a conciliator, particularly if the newspaper knew that later the authority would adjudicate upon the complaint.

We would be aiming for the sky if we set up an independent press authority. We should seek the best and the highest standards, but I do not believe that the hon. Member for Hammersmith is going the right way about trying to impose accuracy. The IPA would become a draconian body——

Mr. Oliver Heald (Hertfordshire, North): Does my hon. Friend believe that the words of the new clause

"any editorial or journalistic guidance"

cover issues relating just to accuracy, or does she believe that they go wider and cover what happened in the Gorden Kaye case or in the Lady Green case, who was confronted with a prostitute in order that there could be a gimmicky story? Would that, in my hon. Friend's view, also be covered?

Lady Olga Maitland: I agree with my hon. Friend that those words should go wider than just editorial guidance on content and should include behaviour. Behaviour includes intrusion, invasiveness, snooping, photography and the bugging of telephone lines. None of those matters, regrettably, is covered by the proposed IPA.

Mr. Livingstone: Would the hon. Lady extend the code so that if a paper were approached with false information about a public figure, in order to get into circulation a damaging story about that person, it would refer the details of the attempted smear to the police? I think of the instance in 1983 when an official from Conservative central office took the Sunday Mirror journalist, Trudie Practor, out to lunch and assured her that I had been at a party where I had been sodomised by six men in succession. There was no truth in that, but it suggests a link between the Tory party and some of the worst excesses of the gutter press.

Lady Olga Maitland: I believe that all complaints should be addressed to the Press Complaints Commission. The hon. Gentleman's case would have been no better served had he been able to go to the independent press authority.

The IPA would place emphasis on factual accuracy. The guidelines in new clause 1 are capable of dealing with that. Interestingly, Donald Trelford said that he could perfectly well put his house in order. He also made the point to the National Heritage Select Committee that it would be undesirable for people appointed by the Government to decide what is true.

I recall that on Second Reading the distinguished hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell)—not someone with whom I agree in general—asked how one can define accuracy and said that one person's perception of fact is very different from another's. In this regard, some of us believe that the hon. Gentleman's Bill would provide a lucrative income for lawyers and that it would be a nightmare for editors. There is no evidence that the IPA would resolve any of the difficulties. That is why I return to new clause 1 which, I believe, would serve the public far better. The hon. Member for Linlithgow also asked whether we are going down the road of state-appointed press policemen. That is an important point.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. It may be important, but I am not sure that it is relevant to this new clause.

Lady Olga Maitland: I am referring to the fact that the IPA is a substitute for what I call the guidance in new clause 1. It is suggested that the IPA could deal with propaganda, but there is no evidence that it could deal with propaganda any more effectively than new clause 1.

On accuracy, will politicians be able to use the IPA to beat each other? They would be quite capable of seeking phoney corrections if the opportunities presented themselves. How would the IPA deal with a psychopath such as Saddam Hussein, or one of the Serb warlords who, hand on heart, claim that they have been misinterpreted? There is no evidence that the IPA would do anything other than try to muzzle on the one hand and to make instant adjudications and decisions on the other, which would not improve the standards of the press. I do not believe that the IPA is any closer to searching for the real truth.

Taken to the extreme, the IPA could become a nightmare body for vexatious or trivial complaints. I know that the hon. Member for Hammersmith is trying to address that in the Bill, but the reality is that human nature will leap on the bandwagon and turn the IPA into a nightmare of no benefit to the public—a bottomless pit of investigation, setting one party against another.

One man's accuracy is another man's opinion. I agree that sloppy reporting must be tackled, but we must be careful. In any case, sloppy reporting could be dealt with under the guidelines proposed by new clause 1. It does not need the kind of authority that has been suggested.

Mr. Corbett: The hon. Lady said that accuracy is virtually impossible to define. Why did the journalists and distinguished former journalists who make up the bulk of the membership of the Press Complaints Commission go to so much trouble to include that obligation of accuracy at the start of the code of practice?

Lady Olga Maitland: Because it is extremely important. I do not see what is so surprising about that. One difficulty that new clause 1 has to face is interpretation. I am worried that the IPA could reach an instant decision, against which there is no appeal by any newspaper editor, who is then forced to publish an apology. That would lead to muzzling and gagging, which is unworthy of the great traditions of the country. Outside bodies of the nature that is proposed are unnecessary when a perfectly satisfactory framework already exists. The Press Complaints Commission may sometimes be criticised for being a rather toothless lion, but that toothless lion is well aware of the criticism. It should be beefed up. Legislation and more ideas will be proposed to achieve that.

But there is already a framework and sometimes such over-reaction does not serve us well. The IPA tries to please all and in the end pleases nobody at all. High standards, ethics and professionalism are important, but the mechanics are already present in new clause 1 satisfactorily to serve the public without the draconian elements that are being proposed by the hon. Member for Hammersmith.

Mr. Key: I am grateful for a few minutes in which to try to persuade my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) to withdraw his new clause 1. It requires that newspapers should make available to the public copies of any editorial or journalistic guidance issued to its staff. New clause 1 would be acceptable only if it were amended to make it clear that editorial or journalistic guidance was limited to guidance on the observing of ethical and professional standards by journalists. It is not at all clear —to me, at least—what editorial or journalistic guidance means.

Our approach to press regulation takes as its starting point public concern over the years about irresponsible behaviour by the press and the efforts that the press has made to regulate itself. We considered whether those efforts have been successful. Our response has generally been to accept the conclusions of the 1990 privacy committee and of the 1993 review of press self-regulation by Sir David Calcutt that the Press Council and its successor body, the Press Complaints Commission, have not been effective regulators of the press. They have not been effective, especially in the critical matter of protecting people from unwarranted intrusion into their privacy.

We are also considering carefully the wide-ranging recommendations of the Select Committee on National Heritage in its report on privacy and media intrusion, a valuable although complex contribution. The recommendations include, of course, proposals for a statutory press ombudsman and a protection of privacy Bill as well as a range of other proposals on matters beyond the responsibilities of my Department.

2.15 pm

No doubt the newspaper industry will be paying careful attention to the many recommendations for improved self-regulation which the Committee made to it. We shall make our response to the Select Committee in the usual way. We hope at the same time to announce our final views on Sir David Calcutt's recommendation for a tribunal as well as to report progress on the Calcutt recommendations for protection of privacy, which we have already accepted.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have a suspicion that the Minister's speech is not likely to be one of the longer ones, so I should like to ask a question. He says that things are not right, but does he agree that they are less bad than they were, or does he believe that there is as much offensive misbehaviour and misreporting by the press as there was, say, four or five years ago?

Mr. Key: I take the long view. Rather than looking back only three or four years, I take as my starting point the 17th century, and I shall explain why in a moment. It is true that anyone in political or public life cannot begin to correct all the inaccuracies affecting our everyday working life. If we did, we should spend all our working life writing letters to editors rather than getting on with the job. I think that my hon. Friend and I both accept that. I suspect that there has been a cooling of the temperature in the past month or two, no doubt as the press realises that it is under the microscope.

As I said, we shall make our responses known. We have made known our objections to the Bill from the outset and have made it clear that we do not wish it to progress without radical amendment. The Bill would introduce statutory control of newspaper content for the first time in peace time since the 17th century. It cannot be passed without the most detailed consideration of the intended and unintended effects of its various provisions.

Mr. Soley: I must correct the Minister because what he says is not so. Many laws already restrict the content of newspapers: there are court restrictions on reporting and restrictions on local authority matters. Indeed, in some cases, permissive measures control on a statutory basis what the press can do. There are many such examples dating from about the 1880s.

Mr. Key: Having read carefully the history of press freedom in this country, I stand by my statement that there has not been an attempt such as this in many hundreds of years so it is essential that we probe the matter carefully.

Some of the amendments go some way to curing the defects in the Bill but, even if all the amendments were adopted, it would still be very different from anything that the Government would wish to put before the House. I hope that the House will not proceed with the Bill, but will instead give the Government time to make and implement proposals that we consider necessary to ensure the proper balance between press freedom and the rights of the individual.

The new clause would be acceptable only if it were amended to make it very clear that editorial or journalistic guidance was limited to guidance on the observing of professional and ethical standards by journalists. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) is convinced that he should withdraw the new clause.

Mr. Corbett: There is no need for the new clause moved by the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley). As members of the National Union of Journalists, the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) and I are, by virtue of our membership, bound by that union's code of ethics. In the absence of anything else on a professional basis, as practitioners of the black art of journalism from time to time we have a duty laid on us through that membership to keep to the code of ethics, irrespective of what view an editor or a proprietor takes towards it.

We have the Press Complaints Commission. As the Minister has just made clear, it is a fairly friendless little animal. No one, including members of the commission, believes that it has done an effective job. After that, we begin to get into the area of disagreements. None the less, the commission is there. It has a code which it drew up after reviewing the practices put in place by the Press Council which it followed. I find it impossible to think of circumstances in which a newspaper—or its staff—needs to do any more than to subscribe to the terms of the code. I have quarrels with some of the language of the code, but that is not the point. It is there and it obliges proprietors, editors and journalists to adhere to its terms. The new clause is redundant.

The Minister said that the Bill was about control over the content of newspapers. The Bill proposes nothing of the sort. There is a whole raft of legal and other constraints on what newspapers may print. It is worse than that. I know that some of my hon. Friends have taken a great deal of interest in a little body called the D-notice committee. That committee is worse than censorship because it is self-censorship. It is editors volunteering to gag themselves. When some retired admiral up the road gets wind of the fact that a newspaper has got hold of a particular story, he phones up the editor and says, "Look here, old boy, if you run that, we shall clap you in irons. Come and have a gin and tonic." Even now, there is a review of the way in which the D-notice committee works. Part of the case put by my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley)—I am wholly with him on this—is that if we are looking to the current breed of newspaper owners and editors properly to safeguard press freedom, we are wasting our time.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Colchester, South and Maldon): I attended the Second Reading debate and I have read carefully through the report of the Committee stage, although this is my first opportunity to speak on the Bill. I agree that the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) has identified matters that are of great public concern at present. If this debate has achieved anything, it has given Ministers a chance to hear the views of hon. Members. However, that is the only respect in which I welcome the Bill. I voted against it on Second Reading and I continue to oppose it.

My disagreement stems from almost the first word of the title. The Bill is supposed to promote press freedom, yet it is opposed by almost every newspaper in the country, and by organisations including the Guild of British Newspaper Editors, the Newspaper Society and the Newspaper Publishers Association. All my local editors and their journalists have been on to me to say that they are bitterly opposed to the Bill. The Bill is closer to the title "Press Control Bill" proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley).

I accept that there are many occasions on which the press has behaved very badly. The hon. Member for Hammersmith has identified cases in Committee and today in which I would not seek to defend the behaviour of the press. I go further and accept that the press requires regulation. For extreme cases, the libel laws exist, but that is not sufficient. There will be cases in which people cannot afford to take legal action and they need a body to which they can go to make their complaint.

Mr. Soley: The hon. Gentleman is getting confused. The libel laws restrict press freedom. That is why Maxwell could not be investigated. [HON. MEMBERS: "Come on."] It is one of the major reasons. Maxwell used the libel laws to try to prevent investigative journalism and, to some considerable extent—one can argue to what extent—he was successful. I am saying that the libel laws need to be restricted, not expanded. We need to ensure that people can get things corrected without the threat of large libel settlements against the press—a threat which does not encourage press freedom.

Mr. Whittingdale: I agree with the hon. Gentleman to some extent, although I do not want to become involved in a great discussion about the libel laws——

Madam Deputy Speaker: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not, because we are debating new clause 1, not the whole Bill.

Mr. Whittingdale: I accept your ruling, Madam Deputy Speaker.

New clause 1—and most of the Bill—is about accuracy. The libel laws prevent people from printing things that are not true. I accept that there needs to be another body. But I differ with the hon. Member for Hammersmith over the nature of that body. I will never support a body that is appointed by the Government to control what the press can print. I know that the hon. Gentleman made some amendments in Committee and that that body would not now be directly appointed. Nevertheless, if the body that appointed the members of the independent press authority were appointed by a member of the Cabinet, as proposed in the Bill, the authority would still be, in essence, a Government-appointed body.

I support the new clause because it would marginally improve the Bill, which I continue to believe is a very bad Bill. It seems to me to be only common sense that editors should make widely available the code of conduct and guidelines that they give their journalists to follow in practising their skills. I welcome the fact that some newspapers have already incorporated the Press Complaints Commission code of conduct into their journalists' contracts.

I should like newspapers to go further still. When I was a parliamentary candidate, I had a piece written about me in one of my local newspapers. I was pleasantly surprised to receive from that newspaper, about 10 days later, a questionnaire asking me whether I was satisfied with the article, whether I felt that it had covered all of the points fully, whether it contained any inaccurate statements and whether the headline sufficiently covered the gist of the story. [HON. MEMBERS: "What was the paper?"] It was the Colchester Evening Gazette, produced by Essex County Newspapers, to which I pay tribute for following that practice. I asked the editor whether it was his usual practice and he said yes—that the questionnaire was sent to anyone about whom his journalists wrote.

That is exactly the kind of approach that we should be encouraging. It is self-regulation at its best. I understand that other local newspapers in my area do exactly the same. I hope that more newspapers will follow that example because I am convinced that self-regulation is the way to proceed.

The hon. Member for Hammersmith has commented that the Press Complaints Commission has few friends. I have my own criticism of the Press Complaints Commission. I note the hon. Gentleman's comments about the 12-year-old child whose family was not able to complain to the commission. I suspect that the hon. Gentleman has identified an area in which the commission needs to look again at people's ability to complain to it. I do not, for instance, believe that it is necessarily right that third parties should be prevented from complaining to the commission, and I hope that the commission will consider ways in which it can tighten up the arrangements. I repeat that I cannot accept that a statutory body appointed by the Government is the right way to proceed.

Mr. Peter Atkinson: Like my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Whittingdale), I attended the Second Reading debate but was not called —perhaps because the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) spoke for so long. I have a couple of minutes now in which to add my objections to those voiced about the Bill.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not the purpose of this debate.

Mr. Soley: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Peter Atkinson: I thought that I might be hauled up for saying that, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Of course I am talking about new clause 1. Given the chance, I would oppose the new clause not because I do not think it is sensible and an acceptable contribution to helping newspapers on the course of self regulation, but because I believe that it is unnecessary and bureaucratic.

Newspapers should be responsible for their own accuracy and self regulation should continue. I was interested in the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland). She referred to the sign that used to hang in the newsroom of the Daily Express and the Sunday Express where I also worked for some time. One big sign read, "make it fast" and the sign below read, "make it accurate." Some wag removed the first "c" of "accurate" to make it read, "a curate". Hon. Members will recall that The Sunday Express had a great penchant for the lives of clergymen.

It being half-past Two o'clock, further consideration of the Bill stood adjourned.

Bill, as amended (in the Standing Committee), to be further considered upon Friday 2 July.

Ms Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Is it acceptable to the House that after seven hours of debate and cross-party support, the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill has been objected to yet again by a Government Whip who entered the Chamber at the end of this morning's debate, on a day when the Bill to enable disabled people to be driving instructors has been passed? That cannot be acceptable to the House and it is certainly not acceptable to the thousands of disabled people who are being denied their civil rights.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is perfectly in order for the Government to object. If the hon. Lady wants to take up the principles behind the objection, perhaps she should take the matter to the Select Committee on Procedure or use some other means.

House of Commons Members' Fund

2.34 pm

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): I beg to move,

That, in pursance of the provisions of section 3 of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1948 and of section 2 of the House of Commons Members' Fund and Parliamentary Pensions Act 1981, the maximum annual amounts of the periodical payments which may be made out of the House of Commons Members' Fund under the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1939, as amended, and the annual rate of any payments made under section 1 of the said Act of 1981 shall be varied as from 1st April 1993, as follows:

(a) for paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 to the said Act of 1939, as amended, there shall be substituted the following paragraph:

'1. The annual amount of any periodical payment made to any person by virtue of his past membership of the House of Commons shall not exceed £3,491 or such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring his income up to £6,419 per annum, whichever is the less:

Provided that if, having regard to length of service and need, the Trustees think fit, they may make a larger payment not exceeding £6,721 or such sum as, in their opinion, will bring his income up to £9,649 per annum, whichever is the less':

(b) for paragraph 2 of that Schedule there shall be substituted the following paragraph:

'2. The annual amount of any periodical payment to any person by virtue of her being a widow of a past Member of the House of Commons shall not exceed £2,182 or such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring her income up to £5,110 per annum, whichever is the less:

Provided that if, having regard to her husband's length of service or to her need, the Trustees think fit, they may make a larger payment not exceeding £4,201 or such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring her income up to £7,129 per annum, whichever is the less':

(c) in paragraph 2A of that Schedule for the words 'the annual amount of any periodical payment' to the end of the paragraph, there shall be substituted the words:

'the annual amount of any periodical payment made to any such widower shall not exceed £2,182 or such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring his income up to £5,110 per annum, whichever is the less:

Provided that if, having regard to his wife's length of service or to his need, the Trustees think fit, they may make a larger payment not exceeding £4,201 or such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring his income up to £7,129 per annum, whichever is the less':

(d) in section 2( ) of the said Act of 1981, for the words from the beginning to the end of paragraph (b) there shall be substituted the words:

'the annual rate of any payments made under section 1 shall be—

(a) £2,033 if the payments are made to a past Member; and

(b) £1,271 if the payments are made to the widow or widower of a past Member.'

The motions on the Order Paper are in the names of right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber who share with me the responsibility, as Managing Trustees, of administering the House of Commons Members' Fund.

There are two motions to consider. The first provides for an increase in the present levels of all grants and payments which may be made under the Members' Fund legislation. These were last revised in April 1992 by approval of the motions I brought to the House in July 1992. We now propose to increase the grants and payments with effect from 1 April 1993 by 3·6 per cent. which is in line with the increases approved for public service and state retirement pensions which took effect recently.

The main beneficiaries of the first motion are elderly former Members or their surviving spouses, the majority of whom, unlike present Members of the House, have no entitlement to benefit under the Parliamentary Contributory Pension Fund. Many of them are now over 80 years of age and some are in their 90s. Last year, the trustees were able, with the approval of the House, to increase the awards payable to surviving spouses from one half to five-eighths of the principal award payable to the former Member.

The provisions for which we seek approval can be briefly summarised. Sub-paragraph (a) deals with the provisions for grants to ex-Members who served in the House for 10 years and whose income is below prescribed limits. It is proposed to increase the basic annual grant to £3,491, subject to an income limit, including the grant, of £6,419. In the case of ex-Members with longer service, the grant may be increased to a maximum of £6,721, subject to an income limit of £9,649 per annum. The widows and widowers of these ex-Members are covered by sub-paragraphs (b) and (c) of the motion. It is proposed to increase their basic annual grant to £2,182, subject to an income limit, including the grant, of £5,110. Similarly, in the case of widows and widowers of ex-Members who had longer service, the grant may be increased to a maximum of £4,201, subject to an income limit of £7,129 per annum.

Sub-paragraph (d) refers to the "as of right" payments from the Members' fund to ex-Members who had 10 years' service before October 1964, and to their widows and widowers; their awards are not subject to any income limits. We propose to increase these annual payments to £2,033 for ex-Members and £1,271 for widows and widowers.

Under the terms of the governing legislation, the House of Commons may by resolution direct that, in any year, the whole or any part of the amount contributed by Members from their salaries shall be appropriated, together with the whole or any part of the Treasury contribution, currently £215,000, for the purpose of providing funds for the Trustees to make discretionary awards to ex-Members and their dependants, having regard to their individual circumstances. The second motion gives effect to this appropriation and will enable the Trustees to continue some 141 discretionary awards to ex-Members and their dependants.

I am most appreciative of the help of right hon. and hon. Members who have brought to the attention of the Managing Trustees information on the needs of the former Members and their dependants over the past year. I hope very much that we shall continue to receive this useful assistance from our parliamentary colleagues in tracing former Members or their surviving dependants who may require help from the fund. As I have said in previous years, Members are likely to find considerable help from members of their constituency parties or associations who have long memories and have kept in contact with the families of those who formerly served the constituency. The cause is worth while and the help we receive is invaluable to the Trustees in making best use of the resources available to us.

I commend the motions to the House and am sure that they will have the support of all right hon. and hon. Members. In doing so, I want again most warmly to thank——

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): I do not want to interrupt the thanks with which we all wish to associate ourselves, but does my right hon. Friend recollect that he expressed the view that it would be wrong if the dependants of deceased Members suffered loss of lump sums or benefits as a result of the freezing of Members' salaries? It was suggested by the Leader of the House that the fund of which my right hon. Friend is chair should step in and close that gap. My right hon. Friend pointed out that the gap was the problem because no one knew what it was. He has asked the Leader of the House whether he could tell him what the notional salary would be, so that he could consider whether he could close the gap between the actual and the notional in benefit terms. Has the Leader of the House of Commons given my right hon. Friend the information that he requires?

Mr. Morris: My right hon. Friend has raised an important point. When I spoke in the debate on the freezing of Members' salaries, I did so, as Chairman of the Managing Trustees of the Parliamentary Contributory Pension Fund, to express my concern about its possible life-long effect for dependants of any Member who might die during the period of the freeze. I was then speaking hypothetically, but now, as my right hon. Friend knows, very sadly we have an actual case following the untimely death of our respected former colleague Judith Chaplin.

It may help my right hon. Friend to know that I have written to the Leader of the House about the action open to the Managing Trustees of the Members' Fund. Of course, before we can use the fund to meet the shortfall in that case, we need to know what the parliamentary salary would now be if the freeze had not been imposed. I have asked the Leader of the House for that information and am awaiting his reply so that the Managing Trustees of the Members' Fund can act as quickly and helpfully as possible.

I want again most warmly to thank Tony Lewis, Michael Fletcher, David Allen, and their colleagues in the Fees Office, for their unfailing care in assisting beneficiaries of the fund. I hear very often how deeply their work is appreciated by the needful people whom the fund exists to help and, as Chairman of the Managing Trustees, I witness the commitment and concern they devote, far beyond the calls of duty, in service to our former colleagues, their widows and other dependants. They deserve the gratitude of this House as a whole.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That, in pursuance of the provisions of section 3 of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1948 and of section 2 of the House of Commons Members' Fund and Parliamentary Pensions Act 1981, the maximum annual amounts of the periodical payments which may be made out of the House of Commons Members' Fund under the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1939, as amended, and the annual rate of any payments made under section 1 of the said Act of 1981 shall be varied as from 1st April 1993, as follows:

(a) for paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 to the said Act of 1939, as amended, there shall be substituted the following paragraph:

'1. The annual amount of any periodical payment made to any person by virtue of his past membership of the House of Commons shall not exceed £3,491 or such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring his income up to £6,419 per annum, whichever is the less:

Provided that if, having regard to length of service and need, the Trustees think fit, they may make a larger payment not exceeding £6,721 or such sum as, in their opinion, will bring his income up to £9,649 per annum, whichever is the less':

(b) for paragraph 2 of that Schedule there shall be substituted the following paragraph:

'2. The annual amount of any periodical payment to any person by virtue of her being a widow of a past Member of the House of Commons shall not exceed £2,182 or such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring her income up to £5,110 per annum, whichever is the less:

Provided that if, having regard to her husband's length of service or to her need, the Trustees think fit, they may make a larger payment not exceeding £4,201 or such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring her income up to £7,129 per annum, whichever is the less':

(c) in paragraph 2A of that Schedule for the words 'the annual amount of any periodical payment' to the end of the paragraph, there shall be substituted the words:

'the annual amount of any periodical payment made to any such widower shall not exceed £2,182 or such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring his income up to £5,110 per annum, whichever is the less:

Provided that if, having regard to his wife's length of service or to his need, the Trustees think fit, they may make a larger payment not exceeding £4,201 or such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring his income up to £7,129 per annum, whichever is the less':

(d) in section 2(1) of the said Act of 1981, for the words from the beginning to the end of paragraph (b) there shall be substituted the words:

'the annual rate of any payments made under section 1 shall be—

(a) £2,033 if the payments are made to a past Member; and

(b) £1,271 if the payments are made to the widow or widower of a past Member.'.

HOUSE OF COMMONS MEMBERS' FUND

Resolved,

That the whole or any part of the sums deducted or set aside in the current year from the salaries of Members of Parliament under section 1 of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1939, and the whole or any part of the contribution determined by the Treasury for the current year under section 1 of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1957, as amended by the House of Commons Members' Fund and Parliamentary Pensions Act 1981, be appropriated for the purposes of section 4 of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1948, as amended by section 12 of the Parliamentary Pensions Etc. Act 1984, and section 7 of the Ministerial and other Pensions and Salaries Act 1991.—[Mr. Alfred Morris.]

NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE

Resolved,

Resolved,

That the Order [31st March], That the National Health Service (District Health Authorities) Order 1993, (S.I., 1993, No. 572) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c., be discharged.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

Resolved,

That the Order [31st March], That the National Health Service (Determination of Districts) Order 1993, (S.I., 1993, No. 574) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c., be discharged.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

Dioxins (Derbyshire)

Motions made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

2.43 pm

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is a great authority on dioxins in Derbyshire, but he is unable to be here because he is attending the funeral of his mother-in-law. Similarly, my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) would be present but for a prior commitment in Copenhagen. Bolsover, Chesterfield and north-east Derbyshire are linked because pollution knows no boundaries and certainly no constituency ones. We share a common problem.

For the people of Staveley the fact that they have pollution problems comes as little surprise. In the past, smoke belching out of factories and old-fashioned muck and dirt produced the problem, but now pollution is often caused by chemicals, new techniques and the unknown. The people of Staveley live with, and often live by, the operations of local industries. They need those industries to continue because their livelihoods depend on them.

Why are we focusing on Derbyshire? It goes back to the Coalite fire at Bolsover in 1968 when the chemical, 245T, was burnt at levels inappropriate for materials that produce dioxins. As a consequence of the fire, the area was subject to investigations by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. Subsequent surveys were conducted on a grid basis by MAFF in the south of Scotland, England and Wales. It later decided that it should study specific areas and it focused on the northern end of Derbyshire where farms, factories and people are in close proximity to each other.

In the 1990-91 MAFF investigation it was discovered that there were unacceptable levels of dioxins in milk produced by two farms and those supplies were prevented from entering the food chain. As a consequence of that decision, further investigations took place within three miles of the Coalite fire. One particular investigation was held on 23 February 1993 and it was discovered that Stanton plc of Staveley was a potential source of a different mixture of dioxin.

What is a dioxin? It is not easy to discover or to explain in layman's terms and perhaps the Minister will say something about it. I understand that it is a core element with two aspects, hence the use of "di" in the first part of the word, one of which is oxygen, which obviously makes up the rest of the word, "oxin". Other chemicals adhere to the combination of carbons and oxygen. The particular make-up of those chemicals decides whether a dioxin is potentially toxic. It is argued that just 17 out of 210 dioxins are a cause for concern, but that does not mean that the others do not need to be investigated.

Dioxins have a particular characteristic; they do not saturate. One part of the element that makes up a dioxin does not help to dissolve another element of it. It therefore takes an exceptionally long time for a dioxin to disappear. If a problem arises with the toxic nature of a dioxin, it is liable to be a long-term one.

Although there are natural or fairly common types of dioxin in advanced society, the source of the problem is often associated with combustion and various chemical processes, which throw dioxins into the air. Subsequently, those dioxins may be washed from the land into rivers, the pollution of which is another problem which needs to be investigated. Experts, technicians and certainly Government officials tend to argue that the problem mainly involves farming and occurs when dioxins move into the food chain, particularly if they get into the grass and herbage eaten by other animals. Dioxins can get into milk in that way.

It is only considered a problem for humans who breathe it in when there are excessively high levels of dioxin such as that unleashed in Vietnam to destroy foliage. A bad case also occurred in Seveso in Italy in 1976. One example that occurred in this country which was not as serious as that in Italy took place at the Coalite factory in Bolsover in 1968. There are fears that excessive levels of dioxin caused skin disease, cancers and problems in human reproduction. Unfortunately, not enough is known about it. The literature in this country tends to show that there is nothing to worry about in the levels of dioxin that occur here. But evidence coming from America and the Environmental Protection Agency there suggests that there could be other considerations. Certainly organisations such as Greenpeace and Friends of the Earth stress the problems and are not convinced by the lack of information.

Due to the discovery of dioxins in soil and herbage, eight farms in Staveley are having their milk tested. In theory, the production could be stopped from entering the human food chain at those eight farms. The Government have currently adopted a polluter-pays policy. I accept that polluters must pay, but the problem is that the aggrieved party has to take action against the polluter. That policy is causing difficulties for the three farmers affected in the Bolsover district, who are acting through the National Farmers Union.

Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution states that Stanton may be the polluter, although—in mitigation—there may be difficulties in fully establishing who is responsible. I am not attacking Stanton, which has introduced new procedures. It is proud of its gas cleaner plant and states that legislation on the stocks will require other companies to adopt some of the techniques that it now uses.

However, Stanton is part of a multinational company. Its headquarters are located at Saint Gobain in France, and there are 338 subsidiary and ancillary companies involved in 30 different countries. Therefore, the NFU faces difficulty in finding the resources needed to take the matter to court. It would be helpful if the law could be changed so that it was the same as that in Holland, where the Government have to pay compensation, then decide who they will take to court as the polluter.

There are other worries besides dioxins in the Staveley district. One of the farmers has reported high levels of sulphur molybdenum and fluoride in the herbage and silage, and 25 per cent. of his calves born since 1971 have had eye defects. I visited his farm last July when a calf was born blind.

I subsequently wrote to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on 10 July 1992, raising the issue of dioxins. The reply was sent on 7 August, by Earl Howe:

"It is not appropriate to draw a parallel with the case of dioxins in the Bolsover area."

Now I discover from a parliamentary answer that a high reading was taken near Hall lane in Staveley in early 1992. The pollution inspectorate took the reading from the soil. That information should have been given to MAFF. The reply that I received last July should have admitted that there was some problem with dioxins in the area that needed looking at.

Now, almost a year later, we have the figures for 1993. I cannot believe that there have been no more readings during the past year, however. Certainly, MAFF and the Department of the Environment have been remiss if they have not carried out other investigations during the period.

The community in the area is also worried. A mass of medical evidence shows, for instance, that the incidence of asthma among young children in the Barrow Hill area is far greater than the expected average would be. So we need an investigation of the whole environment to tidy up the problem of dioxins and other pollutants.

We want industry, communities and farms to be able to live in comfort with each other. That can happen only if the Government apply rigorous standards and if they help firms when problems arise and need dealing with. I should like a full environmental survey of the north-eastern part of Derbyshire, in the areas affected by dioxins and other problems. We need to establish the post of Secretary of State for Environmental Protection, and an environmental protection agency, because a great many threads must be drawn together in this business. The DoE has an obvious interest, as have the pollution inspectorate and farmers. The Department of Health begins to be drawn into the picture; likewise the Department of Trade and Industry, to deal with the conditions of people at work. The National Rivers Authority must be involved because dioxins end up in rivers, as witness the high levels in the Doe Lea river. It runs along the border between north-east Derbyshire and Bolsover. District and county council planning departments, environmental health officers from the Chesterfield borough council, and North-East Derbyshire district council—all these should be involved, too; likewise environmental groups, local and national. Yorkshire Water, which is responsible for sewage, also has an interest.

It would be very difficult for any organisation that was not a central Government body charged with this particular task to draw all these threads together.

I am alarmed by the fact that the problem was dropped on the environmental health inspector from Chesterfield borough council, following only 24 hours' notice that an answer was to appear to a planted question in the House. I was not informed, although I did find out about it. I thought that it was about dioxins in Bolsover, because it never mentioned Staveley. Until its publication I knew nothing about dioxins in Staveley beyond the guesses that I had made based on the letter sent in July 1992.

The environmental protection legislation that we have places a great onus on borough or district councils, but I think that a Secretary of State should have far greater responsibility for these matters, not just a general overview.

In this connection, Staveley, Bolsover, north-eastern Derbyshire, is not a unique area. In many other parts of the country there is the combination of factories, incinerators, chemical works, population and farms. The problem is liable to exist on a much wider basis. It is almost an historic accident, to do with the Coalite problem of 1968, that the problem has been discovered in north-eastern Derbyshire.

We also require a public inquiry. Many of the authorities in the area have called for one, as has my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover. There is no reason why the inquiry should not be combined, with different groups and bodies drawn together. People in the area have organised a call for one. I have here more than 2,000 signed letters asking that such action be taken, and there will be a petition to Parliament later, involving far more people within the Staveley area. The letter says:

"I the undersigned demand that John Major and the Tory Government undertake a public inquiry following the discovery of Dioxin in the Barrow Hill and Hollingwood areas. We further demand that the Department of Health undertake an extensive medical survey of the local residents."

The problem goes wider than the Barrow Hill and Hollingwood areas, although there is serious concentration there. Those actions—environmental protection inquiries, public inquiries and automatic compensation for the farmers from Government—need to be taken on board.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Robin Squire): As is customary, I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes) on securing the Adjournment debate. In the time available to me, I shall try to answer his points. As he would expect me to say, I will write to him on those points with which I cannot deal in the time available. I also recognise, as will the House, that unfortunate circumstances have deprived us of both the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) and the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). I join the hon. Gentleman in sending our condolences to the hon. Member for Bolsover on his family loss.

I have noted the past interest of the House on the question of dioxins in Derbyshire and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for providing me with the opportunity to underline the continued concern of Her Majesty's Government to protect the health of our people and the state of the environment in the country, and in Derbyshire in particular, as highlighted in this debate.

Before I speak in some detail about the problems that have occurred in Derbyshire, to which the hon. Gentleman has drawn our attention, it may be helpful to describe the nature of dioxins, how they are formed, their transport through the environment and pathways for human exposure.

Dioxins is the generic name given to a number of closely related organic chemicals containing chlorine. They have no known uses and are not produced intentionally. They are, however, produced as unwanted by-products in some manufacturing processes and during incineration of chemicals and other wastes. The mechanisms by which dioxins are formed are not completely understood, but, in the case of combustion processes, important factors are believed to include the combustion conditions, the chlorine content of the material being burnt and the presence of suitable catalytic surfaces. Industrial processes known to have a significant potential for dioxin emissions are subject to strict control—notably under the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

Emission to air is the principal route for release of dioxins resulting in deposition on to soil, water and plants. Because of their physical properties, dioxins bind strongly to soil and since they are chemically stable, this makes them persistent in the environment. Dioxins are widely distributed in the environment, although at extremely low levels.

The main route by which the general population is exposed to dioxins is through food, largely milk, other dairy products and meat. Vegetables contribute much smaller amounts because uptake of dioxins through the roots of plants is almost negligible under normal circumstances. Grazing cattle take up dioxins from the soil and grass and because those substances are metabolised slowly, they are stored in the tissues and concentrated in the milk that cattle produce. For that reason, the most reliable means of assessing whether a health risk may be posed by food from a particular area is through milk sampling and I will describe in a moment the extensive testing that has been carried out on milk.

The Department of Health's advisory committee on the toxicity of chemicals in food, consumer products and the environment has endorsed a tolerable daily intake set by the World Health Organisation. For a person weighing 60 kg this level would be 600 picograms per day. A picogram is one millionth of one millionth of a gram—a very small quantity indeed.

The average dietary intake of dioxins in this country is estimated to be 125 picograms per day, which is very clearly safely below the accepted level. It is comparable with the esimated dietary intakes for other industrialised countries.

Let me now turn to the events in Derbyshire.

Mr. Barnes: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Squire: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to make some progress; if there is time, I will give way later.

My Department published a pollution paper on "Dioxins in the Environment" on 22 June 1989. The Government believed that it was the appropriate action to take, given the concern at that time about dioxins both in this country and overseas. The publication showed that while dioxins were found everywhere in the United Kingdom environment, the levels were very low and gave no cause for concern.

However, as the report concluded that food is the major exposure route for most people, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food carried out an extensive survey on dioxins in food to estimate the average daily intake. That provided us with the figures I mentioned earlier. As part of the survey, samples of milk were collected from both urban and rural areas of the United Kingdom, including 11 farms in Derbyshire. In March 1991, as the hon. Gentleman pointed out, two farms situated close to the Coalite chemicals plant near Bolsover were identified as producing milk with elevated levels of dioxin. Further investigations revealed that levels in meat from a third farm were considered unacceptably high. As a precautionary measure, an order was made under the Food and Environmental Protection Act 1985 to restrict movement of all products from the latter farm.

MAFF continued its investigations in the Bolsover area, including a comprehensive survey of milk from individual farms, and concluded, in published reports, that dioxin concentrations in milk and herbage were lower in the summer of 1992 than were levels during the same period in 1991, although there was no significant change in soil concentrations. By the autumn of 1992, concentrations of dioxins in milk and meat had fallen to levels which again made these foods safe for consumption. After publication of those results it was possible for MAFF to lift the Food and Environmental Protection Act order which had been put in place to restrict the activities of the farm closest to the Coalite chemicals incinerator. I will come to the incinerator in a moment. The milk marketing board was also reassured about the acceptability of milk produced on the other two affected farms and has confirmed that it is willing to accept milk from them.

At the same time as MAFF was undertaking its further investigations in the Bolsover area, work was being carried out by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution to try to identify the source of the dioxins. The Coalite chemicals works at Bolsover was known to incinerate chemicals containing chlorine. This works is subject to air pollution control by HMIP which, in August 1991, carried out a study on the incinerator and nearby smokeless fuels plant at the works.

The results, published in December 1991, showed the presence of dioxins in the emissions from the plants, particularly from the incinerator. The report recommended that an environmental survey should be carried out to obtain further information. In the meantime, Coalite closed down the incinerator for major refurbishment. Coalite has applied to HMIP for authorisation under the Environmental Protection Act 1990 to operate an incinerator on the site. The plant will be newly constructed and therefore fully subject to the Act's requirement to use best available techniques not entailing excessive cost. Following extensive public consultation, HMIP is carefully considering the application and, after incorporating appropriate conditions, is likely to issue an authorisation in May. Construction of the incinerator will not begin until an authorisation is granted, so start-up of the new plant is unlikely before the end of the year.

In February 1992, HMIP started a soil survey in the Bolsover area, covering relatively undisturbed land up to 5 km from the Coalite works. Data collected during that survey are currently being assessed within HMIP and a report describing the work and showing the extent, distribution and magnitude of dioxin contamination in surface soils in the area will be published as soon as that complex task has been completed. In November 1992, HMIP started a programme of air and rain water monitoring for dioxins in the Bolsover area, which will also be published and will provide a baseline for any future operation of the incinerator.

I mentioned that the soil survey extended up to 5 km around Bolsover. Elevated levels of dioxins were found in samples taken 4 km north-west of the Coalite plant near Staveley. Because soils vary and analysis of dioxins is difficult, investigations were started as soon as possible into the reliability of these findings. Samples of herbage were taken close to the original soil sampling point, which confirmed the anomalous finding. Because of the difference in dioxins between the samples from Staveley and those from the earlier Bolsover survey, the results of MAFF's 1991 milk sampling campaign were re-examined. Some samples from the Staveley area also showed this different pattern, while confirming that for the samples in question dioxin levels were within the normal 1991 background range found for dioxins in milk from farms in urban and industrial areas. Thus, the Staveley samples had not attracted any particular attention in 1991.

Those findings suggested that the dioxins with the different pattern had probably originated from another source near Staveley other than Bolsover. Further investigations by my Department detected dioxins in the cupola—a scrap melting device—of a local foundry, suggesting that it might be a possible source. The management of the foundry, which is owned by Stanton plc, has given the Department its full co-operation during the studies.

Foundries such as that at Staveley are required under the Environmental Protection Act 1990 to have an authorisation from the local authority to operate. All authorisations issued will contain conditions aimed at ensuring use of the best available techniques not entailing excessive cost to prevent emissions to air of specified substances—including dioxins—or, where this is not practicable, to minimise and render harmless such emissions. An application for authorisation has been received by the local authority, Chesterfield borough council. My Department informed the council as soon as the evidence of elevated dioxin levels was substantiated and the possible source identified. Close co-operation between my Department and the borough council has been maintained.

If the council believes that the foundry is giving rise to emissions of dioxins, it can be expected to include conditions in the authorisation aimed at tackling it. I cannot comment on the detail, because any views that I expressed might prejudice my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State's decision should the company appeal to him against these conditions under the provisions of Environmental Protection Act.

Samples taken from the cupola at another foundry operated by Stantons at Stanton-by-Dale near Ilkeston, which for technical reasons associated with the detail of the process is subject to pollution control legislation administered by HMIP, showed that they also contain dioxins. Erewash district, the local council, and Stantons have been informed of the situation and HMIP and MAFF are urgently investigating the finding.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has just written to the right hon. Member for Chesterfield and to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) inviting local councillors to meet representatives from HMIP to discuss the issues surrounding dioxins in the Bolsover and Staveley areas.

During the investigations, the Department has been working closely with officials from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Department of Health. We have treated the matter very seriously and I can fully understand the real concerns that have been expressed by the local community about dioxin levels in its area. However, the results of surveys have revealed levels in milk which are only marginally greater than background. Recently, further milk samples have been taken in the Staveley area as a precautionary measure although there is no reason to believe that foodstuffs——

Oral Answers to Questions

SOCIAL SECURITY

Family Credit

1. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are now receiving family credit.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Alistair Burt): At the end of October 1992, 450,000 families were receiving family credit.

Mr. Marshall: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. Does he accept that it is probably now time for another publicity campaign on the merits of family credit? Does he agree that it is much better to help the low paid through family credit than to legislate for their unemployment through a national minimum wage, as the Labour party wishes to do?

Mr. Burt: Yes, I think that my hon. Friend is right on both counts. We take quite a lot of notice of the effect of advertising campaigns and some of those that we have run have been very successful. That is one of the reasons why the numbers have been boosted to their present level of 450,000.

On my hon. Friend's second point, I believe that family credit is a better scheme than the minimum wage. It is better targeted on those who need it most and there is no evidence to suggest that it costs jobs. Indeed, even under the Labour party's scheme as announced before the general election, family credit would still have been necessary with the minimum wage.

Mr. Olner: Does the Minister not realise that people want not low wages but proper wages for proper jobs? Does he not realise that family credit will have to be considerably extended when the Government bring into law the abolition of wages councils, which is a great time bomb ticking away for the low paid?

Mr. Burt: No, I do not accept that at all. There is no evidence to suggest that low wages are connected with family credit, which is available to workers who have a family and is, therefore, better directed. It is not aimed at all wage earners. Nor do I accept the hon. Gentleman's point about wages councils. The amount of money needed for family credit depends on the number of people in the family rather more than it depends on wages.

Mr. Spring: Will my hon. Friend confirm that in order to qualify for family credit the number of hours worked per week was recently reduced from 24 to 16? Does he agree that that will have the beneficial effect of spreading the benefit more widely to many more families?

Mr. Burt: Yes, I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. The hours were reduced from 24 to 16, which has enabled a large number of extra people to obtain family credit. We estimate that some 60,000 people have now obtained family credit for that reason in the past year or so. That further emphasises our determination to help the low waged with an in-work benefit, because it is far better for people to be in work than not.

Pensions

2. Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security at what age retirement pensions are paid to men and women in each of the 12 Community countries.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Miss Ann Widdecombe): State retirement pension ages are as follows: in Denmark, from age 67 for men and women; in Spain, the Netherlands, Ireland and Luxembourg, from 65 for men and women, as it is also to be in Germany; in Portugal, from age 65 for men and 62 for women; and in Greece, from age 65 for men and 60 for women. In France and Belgium, the retirement pension may be paid from age 60 for men and women. In Italy, the ages are to be increased by five years to 65 for men and 60 for women. In the United Kingdom, the state retirement pension is paid from age 65 for men and 60 for women.

Mr. Taylor: Since the doctrine of infallibility has recently been accepted by some, will the Minister assure the House that it does not extend to her Department and that there is an open mind on the issue of pensions? Following the high-level review that took place at the weekend, and in view of her reply confirming that eight of the 12 Community countries now provide pensions at the same age for men and women, when will that be the basis on which pensions are paid to men and women in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Skinner: Where's your hat?

Miss Widdecombe: The hon. Gentleman, from the penitential and sedentary position of his fourth term in opposition, calls out a rather irrelevant remark.

Decisions in respect of state pension age will be announced in due course. No decision has so far been reached, and we have at present no plans whatever to change the basis on which the pension is paid.

Mrs. Angela Knight: But does my hon. Friend agree that as the number of people drawing pensions is likely to increase substantially very soon, while the number of those of working age who support them is likely to decrease, it makes sense to look at the possibility of equalising the pension age at 65? Does she further agree that many women would prefer to work until age 65, as I propose to do, rather than putting increasing financial burdens on their children, as would happen if we kept the retirement age for women at 60?

Miss Widdecombe: My hon. Friend is right about demographic trends. At the moment, there are some 3·4 people of working age for every one pensioner in Britain. Assuming that no changes were made, that ratio would have decreased to 2·4 per pensioner by the year 2030. We shall obviously take that into account, as we shall take into account trends elsewhere in Europe and the world and potential costs or savings. Of course, women have different preferences and different plans for their retirement, and some would be happy to work for longer. All that I can say is that, as yet, no decision has been taken on the subject.

Mr. Winnick: Is the Minister aware of the growing concern—which has been increased by what happened at the weekend seminar—that the state retirement pension is no longer safe with the Government? Is it not the case that, to a large extent, what was decided at the seminar was war on the existing welfare state?

Miss Widdecombe: If there is one thing that I find disturbing about the Labour party, it is its willingness to play with the minds and the fears of the vulnerable and elderly. We made a clear statement in our manifesto, and we have made clear statements at the Dispatch Box time after time, that we have no plans—absolutely no plans—to abolish, to freeze or to means-test the pension. We have stood by that. The only plans to means-test the pension are those coming from the Opposition Benches. Not only do Opposition Members want to means-test the pension: they want to do it at the same time as discouraging the only alternative, which is private provision. The hon. Gentleman also has a considerable amount of penance to do for scaring the elderly totally unnecessarily.

Sir Donald Thompson: Will my hon. Friend consider reducing the pension age for men by one year every two or three years over the next 10 or 15 years and at the same time give men a chance to bolster the private part of their pension?

Miss Widdecombe: All options will be taken into account in considering what to do with state pensions. The Government have continually encouraged the provision of pension other than the state pension. As a result of that, 70 per cent. of people now retiring have an addition to their state pension—either from an occupational pension or from savings. That is a proud record to which the Opposition could never aspire and on which, what is more, they pour scorn: they want to keep people dependent on the state and do not want to encourage them to try for security in their retirement.

3. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to link the state retirement pension to average earnings; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Peter Lilley): We have no plans to link the basic pension to average earnings.

Mr. Corbyn: Is the Secretary of State aware that in 1980 the Government broke the link between average earnings and the state old-age pension and established instead a link with a rejigged retail prices index, and that that has cost every pensioner more than £17 a week and has taken from pensioners more than £25 billion in the past 13 years? Will the right hon. Gentleman now come clean and stop ripping off pensioners? Can we now return to the system whereby the link was either with the RPI or with average earnings—whichever represented the larger increase—and will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that pensioners in our society, who pay for their old-age pension through taxation and national insurance, can be assured of a decent income in retirement and not have to depend on income support or be forced to take out private pension schemes, some of which are very unreliable indeed?

Mr. Lilley: The hon. Gentleman should address his questions to the Opposition Front Bench and not to me. In the first place, the Labour Government broke the link with earnings when they were in power. More recently, the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman on the subject said that even to hold the link between pensions and earnings at its present level would be very costly and would do nothing to tackle the problem of poverty among the elderly. For once, he is quite right: it would cost £8½ billion to do what the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) suggests and that would cost every working person in this country nearly £6 per week in increased contributions.

Mr. Congdon: Does my right hon. Friend agree that since many pensioners now retire with generous occupational pensions, it is better to target resources on those in greatest need than to spread them across the board?

Mr. Lilley: That is absolutely right and is, indeed, what we have been doing. My hon. Friend will know that over the past year we have been able to confirm an extra £500 million to poorer pensioners, largely through the increase in the pensioners' premium last October by £2 per week for a single person and £3 for a couple, over and above the increase in inflation. On top of that, pensioners have seen their purchasing power increase this month by an equivalent of a further £2·90 a week on top of inflation because of the extra £750 million that we have pumped into income-related benefits by not requiring anyone on those benefits to make the 20 per cent. contribution to local government taxation.

Dr. Reid: Will the Minister confirm that the figure of £8½ billion that he mentioned as the figure necessary to restore the link between pensions and earnings or prices—whichever is the higher—for every pensioner, for 365 days a year, is slightly less than what the Government spent on one day, on black Wednesday, as a result of their own economic folly? Is the Minister not ashamed of the fact that the most vulnerable section of the community—the people who created the wealth that he and his colleagues on the Conservative Benches are now ripping off—have been deprived of £17 a week by the Government? Will he now answer the question put to him by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn)?

Mr. Lilley: The figure that I quoted related directly to the point made by the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) and would be the cost of the proposal that he was advocating. It has nothing to do with the cost in relation to 16 September which, of course, would have been infinitely greater had we followed the advice of the Labour party and remained in the exchange rate mechanism.

Benefits

4. Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to carry out a review of the scope for the replacement of all universal benefits by selective benefits.

Mr. Lilley: We are reviewing all aspects of social security expenditure.

Mr. Pickles: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that it is appropriate for some benefits, such as pensions, to remain universal? Will he confirm that since 1979, spending on pensions now totals about £35 billion? Does he recognise that if we change the way in which pensions are funded, as Opposition Members are advocating, the cost would be so prohibitive as to hasten the day when means tests are placed on pensioners, as the Opposition have also advocated? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that we have no intention of means testing the basic state pension?

Mr. Lilley: I can reassure my hon. Friend that we made a clear pledge at the election that we intend to keep the basic pension as the keystone of our policy for retired people and we have no intention of deviating from that pledge. However, my hon. Friend is quite right. Any Government committed—as were the previous Labour Government and as is the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn)—to uprating pensions in line with earnings would very soon find that they had no money to pump into increased benefits for the least well-off pensioners, as we have done, and they would be forced to means-test pensions as Labour implicitly recognised when it set up the Social Justice Commission and said that it was to examine means-testing all universal benefits.

Mr. Kirkwood: Does the Secretary of State agree that it is inadvisable to hold weekend ministerial reviews entirely in secret as they lead to comment, some of which is wrong and some of which is speculative? Would he be prepared to place in the Library of the House the working documents used at the weekend, if not the ministerial advice? Would he also help to ease some of the confusion and concern that have surrounded the weekend meeting by saying clearly that the purpose of any ministerial review would be to make savings—not savings that would be taken out of the social security budget and returned to the Treasury, but savings that could be redeployed and used within the social security system in other ways?

Mr. Lilley: The Liberal party may try to formulate its policies by inviting the press to sit in on the discussions, but I do not think that that would be a sensible way to proceed. More publicity should be given to some of the Liberal party's policies, not least its clear policy to impose value added tax on heating—either on top of a carbon tax or unilaterally if it cannot get a carbon tax. The Liberal policy document, which is interestingly called, "Costing the Earth"—a fairly apt description of Liberal policy—makes it equally clear that the additional costs of heating for elderly people "must not be achieved through granting exemptions to particular target groups; everyone must face the same incentives to use less and cleaner energy."

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Does my right hon. Friend accept that child benefit is a universal benefit, and perhaps the most popular universal benefit in this country? While it may well go to a number of people who are very comfortably off, does he accept that overall it goes to the mother who benefits immensely, as does her child? Even if we were prepared to tax that benefit, therefore, its universality should not be ended.

Mr. Lilley: Again, my hon. Friend will know that there is a pledge in our manifesto—I am glad to know that it is one that he supports—that we would maintain the payment of child benefit normally to the mother and uprate it in line with inflation. Again, we have no intention of reneging on our pledges and I am sure that he will welcome that.

Mr. Dewar: Does the Secretary of State accept that there has been a lot of press briefing about what happened at Chevening at the weekend and that it would be helpful if he said a little about that? Is it true, for example, that a decision has been taken in principle that people on middle incomes and above are to be asked to opt out of the basic retirement pension and, ultimately, from sickness and unemployment benefit? As the Government are committed to increasing national insurance contributions by 1 per cent. next year, is it not true that if the Treasury loses the contributions of people who opt out of the basic state retirement pension but still has the responsibility of paying pensions to those in retirement, that is a recipe for further increased taxation? If those policies are in contemplation —never mind the working papers—will the Secretary of State at least guarantee that he will make an early statement and produce a consultation document so that people know what is in store for them?

Mr. Lilley: We have given no press briefing, as the hon. Member suggests, on what was discussed at Chevening. He underestimates the media's imaginative capacities, as they are able to comment without such briefing, using their imagination. Such comments largely tell us what the people who make them are thinking. If the hon. Member is thinking such thoughts, I congratulate him on his courage and suggest that he should feed them to his Social Justice Commission. In the course of our long-term review, we shall consider all the options that will meet the objectives that I spelt out to the Select Committee on Social Security, one of which is to focus benefits increasingly on those in need. However, we also want to ensure that people have greater control over their resources and greater ability to tailor their provision to their needs, and that is alien to the whole Labour party tradition.

Pensions

5. Mr. Brandreth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the current state pension age in (a) Sweden and (b) the United Kingdom.

Miss Widdecombe: A rise in state pension age in Sweden, to 66 from the current 65 for both men and women, will be phased in rapidly by 1998. State pension age in the United Kingdom is currently 65 for men and 60 for women.

Mr. Brandreth: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Will she confirm that the position in Sweden is typical of that in most European countries? Does she agree that for the United Kingdom to fall into line we would be well advised to equalise pension ages in this country over a period of time?

Miss Widdecombe: As I said in reply to an earlier question, many countries in Europe are now following the path of either raising the state pension age or examining their pension system. I cannot say what our final decision will be on this score, but I will, as my hon. Friend suggests, take into account both European and world trends in reaching it.

Mr. Skinner: Will the Minister confirm that about two months ago I sent her a couple of letters from constituents of mine? Both letters were from women who were in work. To the one who had a year left to work, the reply was, "Don't worry—we will not introduce a 65 or 67 retiring age for women". To the one who had four years left to work, the answer was a little more ambiguous. It is fairly clear that it is part of the Government's agenda to raise the retirement age for women to either 65 or 67. That is a scandal at a time when the Government are spending £27 billion to keep 3 million people out of work, and they have just handed back more than £20 billion to the richest 1 per cent. of tax payers. Instead of attacking pensioners, they should be attacking the wealthy in Britain. What does the Minister have against women?

Miss Widdecombe: Unfortunately for the hon. Gentleman, my memory of the two letters in question is good. To the first lady, I said that she could be completely reassured; to the second lady, I also said that she could be reassured. Therefore, I did not make any difference between the two ladies.

As for what I have against women, the answer is nothing at all: I want to see them well protected and well looked after, which is why I am so happy that more women than ever before are taking advantage of occupational pensions and thus advancing their situation in retirement. If the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) wants to quote letters to his constituents from me, I suggest that he reads them first.

6. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what comparative study has been made of the principal factors underlying the setting of the level of pensions in EC countries.

Miss Widdecombe: A number of studies comparing levels of pensions in EC countries have been carried out. One recent comparative exercise based on data provided by Watsons independent actuaries looked at the incomes of pensioners in six EC countries. It is available in the Library.

Mr. Taylor: Is my hon. Friend aware that the United Kingdom spends 8·4 per cent. of gross domestic product on pensions, which is third in the European Community, beaten only by Denmark and France? Given that the cost of living in the United Kingdom compares favourably with those countries, pensioners here do very well. Will my hon. Friend go further and examine closely the trends in the Community? Earnings-related pensions paid by the state do not make sense, given that they penalise those on the lowest earnings. What we need in the Community are portable pensions, occupational pensions and more encouragement to the private sector to help individuals to protect themselves, given the burden that will depend heavily on those of working age with the demographic trend and the increase in the number of people over 80.

Miss Widdecombe: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I am becoming tired of wholly fallacious comparisons between pensions in the United Kingdom and the rest of Europe which take no account of the fact that in some countries the pensions are earnings related and not basic pensions at all and that many citizens in those countries are drawing a pension below the figures quoted.

I am also always amazed that the figures quoted are at exchange rates, rather than taking into account the cost of living. For example, I often hear about the wonderful pensions in Denmark and Sweden, completely ignoring the fact that people have to be 67 and 66 to get them and that the basket of goods costs 40 per cent. more and 55 per cent. more respectively.

Mr. Redmond: Will the Minister have urgent discussions with the President of the Board of Trade in view of the underlying threat to pensions if she allows him to get away with putting his sticky fingers on the pension funds, which would have grave implications for her Department?

Miss Widdecombe: The President of the Board of Trade has his sticky fingers on nothing whatever. There is no proposal that would mean that pensioners in pension funds transferring from the public to the private sector would not have their interests fully taken care of. That has been made clear by a number of Departments involved. Once again, I must say with regret—as I said earlier to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick)—that the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond) is scaremongering and the people whom he is frightening are vulnerable.

Fraud

7. Mr. Trend: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what further action his Department is taking to reduce fraud.

Mr. Lilley: In this financial year, I am introducing financial incentives to encourage local authorities to fight housing benefit and council tax benefit fraud. I am also allocating additional resources to allow the Benefits Agency to deploy more specially trained investigators and to make greater use of new information technology to identify false claims.

Mr. Trend: Does my right hon. Friend agree that every pound lost to fraud means less for those in real need? Does he agree that the Government have a moral commitment to pursue vigorously fraud and abuse, which hurts the very people whom the social security system is designed to help?

Mr. Lilley: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. It is important that we strive as much as possible to prevent fraud. That is why I set a target last year for the Benefits Agency to identify and stop some £500 million of fraud. I am glad to say that provisional figures suggest that we shall have exceeded that target. In the current year, for both the Benefits Agency and local councils handling housing and council tax benefit, we are setting a combined target of identifying and stopping almost £1 billion of fraud. It is no surprise that, as a result, I was able to confirm an extra £1 billion for those on the lowest incomes through the income-related benefits. If we do not take tough action on fraud, we cannot ensure that the money is channelled back to the people to whom Parliament intended it to go.

Mr. Frank Field: As one of the Members who have pressurised this lethargic Government to take action against fraud, may I ask the Secretary of State to accept that there are two abuses of the social security system? There are those who claim benefits to which they are not entitled and there is the even greater number of people who do not claim benefits to which they are entitled. Does the Secretary of State give equal time to those who are eligible but do not claim? Will he outline to the House which major new initiatives he has taken to ensure that some of the poorest in our society claim the benefits that are due to them?

Mr. Lilley: I have to acknowledge that the hon. Gentleman takes an even-handed view and recognises the importance of tackling fraud and I pay tribute to him for that. But I agree that we must also ensure that those who are entitled to benefits and are ignorant of their entitlement get to know about them. In the next few days I shall make a further announcement about measures that we are taking, especially on family credit, which is one of the most important benefits in helping people off permanent reliance on benefit and into work. We shall encourage people to claim family credit and improve the advertising so that they do so.

Mr. Streeter: Does my right hon. Friend agree that far too much taxpayers' money is spent not only on those who claim fraudulently, but on supporting people who lead grossly irresponsible lives and do not deserve to be supported by the rest of us? Is his Department also examining that aspect?

Mr. Lilley: I recognise that people feel that benefit has a moral dimension and are reluctant to see some of the payments that we make. But, above all, we have to give priority to children. That sometimes means helping children in family circumstances of which hon. Members may not approve. The rights of the child have to come first, even though we naturally want to ensure that we do nothing to undermine the strength of the family, the right to which is, of course, the greatest right that a child has.

Students

8. Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he has any plans to alter the regulations covering entitlement to benefits of students and their parents.

Mr. Burt: No. We believe that students should look to the education system, not the social security system, for their maintenance.

Mr. Hain: May I remind the Minister of the case of Miss Kerry Rees of Neath, whose parents are on invalidity benefit and lost more than £33 in child benefit and income support when she turned 19 a few weeks ago? Is the Minister proud of the fact that Kerry has had to abandon her two-year course at Neath college, just three months before she was due to complete it, and sign on the dole because her parents could not afford to maintain her? It is disgraceful. It is no good passing the buck to the education authority and saying that it should pay a discretionary award, because the Government have cut West Glamorgan education authority's budget by more than £6 million. Surely the Government should abandon such oppressive regulations and allow many thousands of lower-income students like Kerry to claim benefit and continue in higher and further education.

Mr. Burt: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me notice of this particular case, on which we have corresponded. When I wrote to him I mentioned that two possible sources of funds might have helped his constituent, one being the local authority, which has no limit placed on the discretionary amount that it can spend on a particular award and which could have covered this case from the resources it might have. Secondly, the hon. Gentleman's constituent could have had access to further education access fund, which are specifically available to help those who might in other circumstances have their access to education removed.

Value Added Tax (Fuel)

9. Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received on the impact on benefit claimants arising from the imposition of VAT on domestic fuel and power; and if he will make a statement.

11. Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much he estimates it will cost his Department in the relevant upratings of benefits to take account of the incremental imposition of VAT on domestic fuel.

The Minister for Social Security and Disabled People (Mr. Nicholas Scott): We have received a number of representations from a range of organisations and individuals, including hon. Members. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in his speech that extra help will be given to poorer pensioners and others on low incomes. We will be announcing the precise details and costs of this help in the autumn.

Mr. Welsh: Does the Minister understand the anger felt at the imposition of VAT on domestic fuel bills and on the standing charges for gas and electricity, especially by people in Scotland, where, by definition, the colder climate means higher fuel bills? It has been estimated that the VAT will place an extra financial burden of £133 on families in Scotland. Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that such taxation on domestic fuel will hit the poorest in our society, especially pensioners and those receiving social security benefits? Has he demanded that the Chancellor should abolish this measure? If not, why not?

Mr. Scott: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has explained why he felt it necessary to introduce this measure. It is now common internationally for indirect taxes to be levied on the cost of fuel. The most important thing for the House to bear in mind is that both my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor have undertaken that the poorer people in our society will be protected from the impact of the increases.

Mr. O'Hara: Is the Minister aware that many pensioners, including those who frequently come to my advice surgeries in despair, receive electricity bills in which the standing charge is the most significant item on the bill? A bill of £24 may be made up, half and half, of the standing charge and the units consumed and it is very common to receive a bill of £36, of which £24 is for the fuel consumed. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the imposition of 17·5 per cent. VAT on such bills represents an increase of between 25 and 35 per cent. in the cost of actual fuel consumed? Those pensioners are frightened to consume that fuel. Can the right hon. Gentleman assure those pensioners that they will be adequately protected by the uprating of benefits that he will announce shortly?

Mr. Scott: The price of fuel has been falling in recent years. The Government have already given substantial amounts of extra help to poorer pensioners and others on low income. As I have already said, the Government have a clear commitment to ensure that those on lower incomes will be protected from the introduction of VAT on fuel.

Mr. Sims: But is my right hon. Friend aware that there is concern about this tax among some of my constituents, who find that income from the modest savings that they have made during their working lives, when added to their pension, brings them just above the income support level? They still find it difficult to make ends meet and their sense of grievance is added to when others in similar circumstances, but who made no such special provision, are entitled to income support and a number of other benefits which flow from that. Is my right hon. Friend really satisfied with the present level at which one becomes eligible for income support and the structure of benefits associated with it?

Mr. Scott: This is not the first time that we have heard about the problem faced by the group that my hon. Friend has identified. One reason why we will consider carefully between now and the autumn the precise form of protection to be introduced is to determine which groups, either on income support or any income-related benefit, should be protected as a result of the introduction of VAT on fuel.

Mr. Bradley: May I press the Minister a little further on the extra compensation that the Government are considering? Will he guarantee today that the extra compensation will not be limited to those on means-tested benefits? He will be aware that many of those on means-tested benefits will not claim such compensation and so will get no extra help with the VAT imposition. Many people on non-means-tested benefits, such as elderly people on retirement pensions, disabled people, people with carers, the unemployed and those on low incomes, will get no extra help with the imposition of VAT unless the compensation scheme extends to non-means-tested benefits. Will the Minister give that guarantee today or, better still, will he urge the Chancellor of the Exchequer to scrap the plans altogether?

Mr. Scott: I say no to both points made by the hon. Gentleman at the end of his remarks. Full details of the extra help to be made available will be given in the autumn, based on the latest information then available to the Government and to the House. We shall announce then a coherent and integrated set of measures rather than a one-off, isolated measure. I reiterate the commitment made by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that the extra help will be given to those who need it most.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Obscene Publications

29. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Attorney-General what recent discussions the Crown prosecution service has had with the obscene publications squad of the Metropolitan police on its prosecutions policy in relation to the Obscene Publications Act 1959 and related legislation.

The Attorney-General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): The obscene publications squad of the Metropolitan police works closely with the Crown prosecution service. They have discussed many specific cases in recent months.

Mr. Winterton: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for that response. He was one of the 300 Members of Parliament who attended the recent exhibition in the Palace at which the vile and offensive material was displayed for all to see. My right hon. and learned Friend has implied that the Crown prosecution service is unlikely to be successful in prosecuting those who make that material available. Will he agree with me and, I think, with the House that at present our law is wholly inadequate? It is a charter for such offensive material. Will he take steps to amend the law as soon as possible to prevent this vile, offensive and disgraceful material from being made available?

The Attorney-General: I recognise my hon. Friend's frustration in respect of one or two categories of this material, especially computer-created child pornography. However, he will not overlook the fact that, for example, in 1991, the latest year for which I have figures, the Metropolitan police seized no fewer than 19,000 items and brought cases on 363 occasions under the Obscene Publications Act 1959, 40 occasions under the Protection of Children Act 1978 and 53 occasions under the Criminal Justice Act 1988.

Mr. Fraser: The Attorney-General may know that I also went to the exhibition organised by the hon. Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton). Although I take a fairly relaxed view about many of these matters, I was shocked by the use of new technology, of satellite broadcasting and of computer design to create a new, high-tech and obnoxious market in exploitation, especially of children and women. Much of that material is in the public domain; it is not for private consumption. I know that this is not the direct responsibility of the Attorney-General, but I wonder whether his advice to the Home Secretary will be that the law on these matters needs to be brought up to date in accordance with technology. There is clearly a deficiency in the powers to arrest people found in possession of documents and pictures in relation to the distribution of child pornography.

The Attorney-General: I well understand the hon. Gentleman's points and I will refer them to the Home Secretary. The computerised matters with which he dealt are under close scrutiny.

Information Technology

30. Mr. Congdon: To ask the Attorney-General what contribution has been made by the Crown prosecution service and the Serious Fraud Office through the use of information technology for the better presentation of cases to juries.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Derek Spencer): Information technology has been used in a number of factually complex fraud cases to speed up the presentation of evidence and to illustrate it in a clearer and more understandable form.

Mr. Congdon: I thank my hon. and learned Friend for that helpful reply. Do the initial findings show that juries have found this information technology useful?

The Solicitor-General: Independent consultants who have been spoken to by the Crown prosecution service confirm that juries have found information technology of great assistance in following the details of cases. It has been used with success in the Barlow Clowes and Eagle Trust cases and it is currently being used in the Nissan prosecution. Its graphics are very good and it is good for showing invoice and payment trails and information of that sort.

Mr. Miller: I am sure that the whole House will welcome any improvements in the Crown prosecution service, given the difficulties that it faces. Can the Minister confirm whether information technology is being used by the CPS more locally to investigate whether there are connections between complaints raised with the service, even though those complaints may seem small—because collectively they may amount to a large complaint about a person or organisation? I am being careful in my choice of words because I am referring to a particular case, but is the Minister aware of such use of information technology; if not, will he encourage the service to use it?

The Solicitor-General: Yes, information technology is used in out-of-court inquiries as well as in the presentation of evidence in court. When pursuing inquiries it is useful to bring together a wide range of information to see what factors there are in common.

Right to Silence

31. Mr. Bennett: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a further statement about the right to silence.

The Attorney-General: The report of the royal commission is expected within a few months. The ability of the court to draw inferences from silence will no doubt form part of its careful scrutiny.

Mr. Bennett: Does the Attorney-General accept that this is extremely dangerous? The royal commission was set up because of the misuse of confessions and how they are extracted and to increase the pressure on defendants to say something could be extremely dangerous. Would not it be far better to take up the evidence in today's report that the police should be much better trained in the questions that they ask, so as to ensure that we get justice, than to remove the right to silence?

The Attorney-General: I do not think that the one is exclusive of the other. Today's report, which is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, has its merits. Many of us have heard senior policemen say much the same.

In respect of the right to silence, I would just add that there is a widespread feeling that it is right not only that the prosecution should clarify the issues at the outset of the case, but that the defence should do so, too. If that is what is required and the defence fails to do so, there has to be some comment. The fair and balanced way in which this was achieved in the recent case of Murray, showing how any inroads into the so-called rights of silence should be treated, may provide a useful model.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that it is quite intolerable, when children have been abused or even murdered, that both persons responsible should get off scot free by remaining silent?

The Attorney-General: I certainly accept, understand and share my hon. Friend's frustration when a lack of evidence causes that to happen. It is partly a question of investigation, but it is essential in the most horrible and serious cases not merely that people be brought to justice, but that, if they are, we can be satisfied that we really have the guilty person.

Mr. Maclennan: Does the Attorney-General accept that the lack of a right of silence would contradict the presumption of innocence that is the bedrock of our criminal justice system? Although I do not expect him to comment in full on the research report No. 16 published by the royal commission today, will he at least draw attention to the quite unexpected finding in it—that the right to silence needs to be strengthened to protect those who are charged?

The Attorney-General: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, I think that there is some confusion in his question. When we talk about the so-called right to silence, we are really discussing whether there should be a right to comment in the event that someone, after due warning, has chosen not to speak. That is entirely different from reversing the burden of proof.

Sir Thomas Arnold: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that there is a particular problem in respect of fraud cases with section 2 of the Criminal Justice Act 1987?

The Attorney-General: Society has decided through Parliament that in relation to very serious frauds people should be asked questions and should be criminally liable if they refuse to answer them. From the experience of recent years, I am quite satisfied that that is an important right which society should give to the investigator, and it has played an important part in ensuring that guilty fraudsters are brought to justice.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Non-governmental Organisations

36. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what co-operation is undertaken between the ODA and British non-governmental organisations operating in developing countries.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Mark Lennox-Boyd): The main forms of co-operation undertaken between the ODA and British non-governmental organisations are in long-term development, disaster and refugee relief, food aid, and the volunteer programme. In 1991-92, the ODA spent over £123 million in support of these activities.

Mr. Thurnham: Will my hon. Friend join me in congratulating Oxfam and many other British charities on their excellent work overseas? Will he confirm that the Government will continue to work with those charities in supporting their emergency and long-term development work?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Yes. I recognise that the NGOs play a critical role in emergency relief and in the development process. The ODA's confidence in that role is reflected by the fact that in about two years provision has doubled from £65 million to the £123 million that I mentioned.

Dr. Kim Howells: Will the Minister ensure that money given by the Government to workers in the field gets directly to them and does not disappear into the various sinks of corruption which all too often constitute central government in some of the countries that receive the aid?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: One of the advantages of disbursement through NGOs is that they can monitor the situation. We find that that is an immensely successful way of disbursing aid effectively.

British Goods

38. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to ensure that where British aid is used by a foreign country for the purchase of imported goods, those contracts are placed with British companies.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Goods imported under British bilateral aid are for the most part supplied from Britain.

Mr. Winterton: Does my hon. Friend accept that many companies that support the objectives of the Manufacturing and Construction Industries Alliance, which has been formed by hon. Members from all parties, industrialists and trade unionists, have greatly benefited from what I would describe as aid-linked export projects? Does he also accept that the more that British industry, whether consultants, manufacturing or construction, benefits from the money that the United Kingdom gives to overseas aid, the more overseas aid will be supported because people will realise that there is a continuing benefit to the United Kingdom from the aid that my hon. Friend's Department gives to needy countries?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I agree with my hon. Friend. The more that British people appreciate the benefits that accrue to British industry, the more generous they will be with aid. In multilateral aid terms, the latest estimate is that for every £1 in United Kingdom contributions we gain £1·20 in orders. We do extremely well because of the reasons that my hon. Friend has given. About 70 per cent. of our bilateral aid is tied.

European Commission

39. Mr. Enright: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions are currently in progress between the Council of Ministers and the European Commission on the reorganisation of the Commission's services for dealing with aid matters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The reorganisation of the Commission's services dealing with aid matters is an internal matter for the European Commission.

Mr. Enright: The Minister will, nevertheless, be aware that the renovation of buildings and the integration of services have had an effect on the morale of some staff working for the Commission. It is crucial that the Council of Ministers, as well as Parliament, monitors what is happening to make sure that it is effective and, above all, integrated properly. Will he give us an assurance that that will happen?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I am aware of what the hon. Gentleman is speaking about and I know that he speaks with expertise, having worked for the European Community in those sectors. I appreciate that directorates general I and VIII are under the same Commissioner's responsibility and I agree that it is appropriate that the Council of Ministers, Members of this Parliament and other national Parliaments and Members of the European Parliament should monitor the acts of the European Commission in its expenditure.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Is the Minister aware that the Commission's aid policy must be governed by foreign policy? Is he also aware of the desperate need for humanitarian aid in Angola and that the delivery of such aid has been frustrated by the incapacity and unwillingness of Mr. Savimbi of UNITA to accept the Bicesse accords and the writ of the United Nations?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's point. Sometimes it is impossible to deliver aid to areas in great humanitarian need, because of the political problems and the failure of political leaders, who could influence the situation, to take appropriate action.

Mr. Lidington: Will my hon. Friend assure the House that Her Majesty's Government will continue to criticise constructively the Commission's aid programme, to make sure that both donor and recipient countries get the best possible value for every pound or ecu that is spent?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Yes. During the British presidency, important work was undertaken on development co-operation in the European Community. In particular, the Development Council adopted a declaration on aspects of development co-operation policy to the year 2000 and established work programmes to examine our existing policy and to improve the effectiveness of European Community expenditure money through better co-ordination between nation states and the Commission.

Mr. Worthington: The Minister should be more forthright. Is not he aware that there is widespread criticism of the policy of the existing Development Commissioner, who is losing the confidence of Europe over the distribution of aid? Should not the Minister be making it clear, as more and more of our aid is being distributed through Europe, that we expect the same quality of distribution of aid by the EC as we would expect from our own Departments?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: It would not be right for me to endorse the hon. Gentleman's remarks in public, but we take every opportunity to press the European Community on where we feel that improvements in policy could be made. For example, we have expressed our concern about the European Community humanitarian office and we have debated the matter. We are concerned that it has a narrow definition of emergency relief and we are concerned about several aspects of its implementation.

Western Sahara

41. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what aid has been given to refugees from the western Sahara; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has a $3·5 million programme for Saharawi refugees in Algeria; food aid is provided additionally by the World Food Programme at a cost of $2·5 million.

Mr. Corbyn: Is not it a tragedy that the Saharawi people have had to spend nearly 20 years living in refugee camps in exile in Algeria? Is not it high time that a referendum was held so that the people of western Sahara can decide their own future? Will the Minister undertake to put pressure on the Government of Morocco to persuade them to cease their silly games over the make-up of the electoral roll under which the referendum can be held, so that the United Nations can supervise a referendum that can decide on the peaceful future of western Sahara and allow those poor unfortunate people stuck in refugee camps to return to their homes?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the Government have adopted a policy of strict neutrality between all the parties. However, I very much agree that the referendum is the way forward and, therefore, essential. As the hon. Gentleman will also be aware, Security Council resolution 809, which was adopted unanimously on 2 March, invited the Secretary-General to intensify efforts to resolve the problems of, in particular, voter eligibility, so that the referendum could take place. It must take place.

Sir David Steel: Can the Minister give the House an undertaking that British personnel who are assisting United Nations operations in the western Sahara will not be withdrawn pending the forthcoming visit of the United Nations special representative?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The position with MINURSO—the United Nations mission for the referendum—to which we have attached 15 military observers at a cost of £4·75 million annually, is that we have agreed to extend current deployment until September.

Points of Order

3.30 pm

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Have you had a request to allow a Government statement to the House on the apparent change of Government policy as enunciated by the Prime Minister—that this House has sovereignty over the four areas of the United Kingdom—to that which appears in a German magazine and attributed to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, which suggests there will be a change of sovereignty in Northern Ireland? What message does that contain for the murderers of David Martin and the bombers of Bishopsgate?

Madam Speaker: I have not had a request from a Minister to make a statement today.

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Is it not an insult to this House that, in debating overseas development and asking questions of Ministers, we have but 10 minutes occasionally and then get only an understudy, not the real thing? Have the Government proposed to do something about that?

Madam Speaker: Any Minister from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is welcome here to answer questions on overseas development. If the hon. Gentleman wants further time for questions, he must pursue that with his own party through the usual channels and the Leader of the House.

Statutory Instruments, &c

Madam Speaker: With permission, I shall put together the motions relating to statutory instruments.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(3) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

JUDGES

That the draft Maximum Number of Judges (No. 2) Order 1993 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

MARINE POLLUTION

That the draft Merchant Shipping (Prevention of Pollution by Garbage) (Amendment) Order 1993 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Merchant Shipping (Prevention of Oil Pollution) (Amendment) Order 1993 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

FOREIGN SATELLITE BROADCASTING

That the Foreign Satellite Service Proscription Order 1993 (S.I., 1993, No. 1024) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

FURNITURE AND FURNISHINGS (FIRE SAFETY)

That the Furniture and Furnishings (Fire) (Safety) (Amendment) Regulations 1993 (S.I., 1993, No. 207) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

Question agreed to.

Orders of the Day

Finance (No. 2) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Madam Speaker: Before I call the Minister, I ask right hon. and hon. Members for short speeches. There is a great deal of interest in the debate, but I simply appeal for voluntary restraint on the length of speeches.

3.32 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Michael Portillo): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I welcome this opportunity to commend the Finance Bill to the House. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor's Budget judgment this year was exceptionally difficult. He had to avoid putting the recovery in jeopardy; he needed to tackle the level of Government borrowing; and, above all, he had to frame a Budget that would promote confidence. He made exactly the right judgment, and the measures in the Bill achieve those aims.

Business optimism since the Budget has been demonstrated to be at the highest level since April 1988—so says the Confederation of British Industry, and so says 3i in a survey published today. Activity is rising in all sectors, according to Dun and Bradstreet and also the Association of British Chambers of Commerce.

Retail sales in the first three months of this year were up 3·3 per cent. on a year earlier; they are now at record levels. Car production is up 8 per cent. in a year and car registrations up 12·75 per cent. Production in our factories is rising, while industrial production in Japan, Germany and France is falling. Output across the whole economy in Britain is up 0·6 per cent. on last year, and in the non-oil economy up 0·6 per cent. in the first quarter. The economy has now been growing for three successive quarters.

Business surveys now show better export prospects and improved competitiveness in the home market. Exports to non-EC countries are up 12 per cent. on last year. The level of the pound may be part of that, but the real key to competitiveness lies elsewhere. During the recession, companies have improved their productivity through better management and by getting to grips with quality control.

The Labour party would have us believe that British manufacturing industry is dead. Far from it. Last year, it exported £87 billion-worth of goods—more than £1,500 for every man, woman and child in this country, which is higher than the figure for Japan.

Manufacturing exports are at record levels, and manufactured export volumes are forecast to grow 7½ per cent. in the year ahead, in 1993. That will give Britain a rising share of world trade in manufactures, after years in which that level fell.

Unit wage costs recently rose sharply in Germany and Japan, by about 9 per cent. in each case—but in the United Kingdom they are down 2 per cent. on a year ago, which is the biggest fall since records began. This country now has that genuine competitive edge. It has nothing to do with the currency, but is an underlying improvement in our competitiveness vis-a-vis the performance of other countries.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Like my right hon. Friend, I warmly welcome the improvement in the economic indicators, but will he direct his attention to the huge and growing deficit in United Kingdom manufactures? What do the Government intend to do about that, because manufacturing industry produces the only form of non-inflationary growth in this country? Will my right hon. Friend also confirm that the Government have no intention of returning to the exchange rate mechanism in the foreseeable future?

Mr. Portillo: My hon. Friend intervenes at the very point in my speech that will deal with his question. British industry's competitiveness is most important—for example, in the energy supplies that it buys. I hope that we will have my hon. Friend's support when we do things that may be difficult and unpopular, but which are absolutely essential in maintaining competitive energy supplies to our manufacturing industry. That point is not one on which we have always had my hon. Friend's support.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): If everything in the garden is rosy, as the Minister says, will he give an assurance that unemployment will fall below 3 million at the end of this calendar year?

Mr. Portillo: Only Labour's spokesman is foolish enough to try to make predictions about unemployment. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) makes such predictions and falls flat on his face. I shall point out how he has done so recently. The Government do not make forecasts of unemployment, but we are very pleased at the recent figures recorded. I shall come to a possible explanation.

Manufacturing output is at its highest level for more than two years, and manufacturing productivity is at its highest level ever, and is growing faster than at any time in six years. Manufacturing is not only alive and well but performing vigorously.

Sustaining our competitive advantage will depend on controlling costs, and on controlling wage costs in particular. It is good news that earnings growth is at its lowest level for a quarter of a century. Wage restraint will help our businesses to compete. It will assist the creation of new jobs too, and it may be no coincidence—here I take up the question asked by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner)—that lower earnings growth has been followed by two months of falling unemployment.

The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) is always calling on the Government for a jobs package. She ought to call on her trade union friends to work towards achieving higher employment and not just higher wages, as they so often do. I give the hon. Lady marks over and above the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East, because, in the light of increasingly good economic news, that hon. Gentleman has been swerving like a weathercock in a stiff breeze—from lugubrious and grudging through to churlish, and finally coming to rest at despondent. The hon. Gentleman cannot see a good economic indicator without wishing to talk it down. Perhaps he has a good future in air traffic control—"Labour control to the British economy: change your indicators, you are coming in too high." That is the attitude of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East.

We know that some economic indicators tend to lag behind the economy; we know that housing and unemployment are the last indicators that tend to turn—they are known in the jargon as "lagging indicators"—but the last thing of all that turns is the despondency of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East. He is the economy's most lagging indicator of all. His motto is "A sound bite a day keeps confidence at bay."

The hon. Gentleman's last effort was a real gem. Last week, he could not wait for the unemployment figures to be announced. He put out a press release in advance, crossed his fingers and hoped for the worst. He said that the news would herald a summer jobs crisis. The good news on unemployment, when it came through, must have been a crushing disappointment for him.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer recently said that his song was Edith Piaf's "I have no regrets." I think the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East's song should be Ricky Nelson's "Fools rush in, where wise men fear to tread."

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East is going to face a summer jobs crisis, because he is under threat from the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair)—the man with the golden smile. It is not the golden smile that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East has to watch out for; it is the golden elbow—and I think that that is coming very soon.

I want to be fair to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East, because he is not the only one in the Labour party who is a member of the posse of gloom merchants.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): There is more than one?

Mr. Portillo: There is more than one. There are also the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) with his long, lugubrious face, and the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith). They are the four horsemen of the apocalypse: death, disease, disaster and Dunfermline.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): This is a repetition of exactly what happened last month, when the whole centre page of one of our local papers, the Lancashire Evening Post contained a statement from local trade unionists heralding disastrous job figures when they had improved vastly. The article was published before the figures.

Mr. Portillo: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Mr. Bill Jordan, the leader of the Amalgamated Engineering and Electrical Union, has now put matters right. He said that a poll of his members had shown that eight out of 10 firms have full order books and that only one in five companies are still making redundancies. So the trade unions have spoken, even if the Labour party finds it difficult to admit what conditions we are now operating in.

The Labour party insists on talking Britain down, but I am pleased to report that no one out there is listening to the Labour party. Britain remains a very attractive location for inward investment. The United Kingdom attracts one third of all the investment that comes into the European Community; that is twice the amount that goes to France, and France is our nearest rival.

The Budget and the Finance Bill are designed to protect incentives. We retain the lowest corporation tax of any developed country and a top rate of income tax of 40 per cent., which is much lower than in Italy, Germany, France and even the United States. That is one of the things that make us such an attractive place for investment.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): Will the Chief Secretary give way?

Mr. Portillo: No, I want to finish.

The Bill removes obstacles to inward investment by tackling some of the problems that foreign companies have faced with advance corporation tax, by reforming the taxation of foreign exchange gains and losses, and by putting in place the biggest ever deregulatory package for small businesses. Remember that the social chapter will apply to others, but not to us. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said that they can have the social chapter; we will have the jobs.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Given all these things, what is it that has happened since the Red Book, which was published before the general election, that explains the Government's growth forecast being so much lower for the next four years than it was when forecasts were made before the general election? Before the general election, we had forecasts of 3·25 and 3·75 per cent. growth over the next couple of years. All the forecasts are now below 2 per cent. What has happened to make the situation so much worse?

Mr. Portillo: The right hon. Gentleman knows that, across the world, the recession has gone on for longer than people hoped. The right hon. Gentleman also knows that, every time we have a meeting of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development or G7 Ministers, we are all in the business of revising down the forecasts that had been made collectively across the world of the rate at which recovery would occur, so there is no mystery about this, particularly for the right hon. Gentleman, who follows these matters closely.

Mr. Hain: We have had a list of sound bites from the Chief Secretary and a Pinocchio impression, but could we have some serious economics? I put it to him that, if any of the factors that he has quoted approvingly are valid, they are due to the 18 per cent. devaluation since last September. Why, therefore, are the Government deliberately encouraging an appreciation of the pound by about 5 per cent.? Surely the policy and the priority should be low interest rates, but interest rates are still very high in real terms, and are crippling prospects of long-term sustainable industrial recovery.

Mr. Portillo: Pinocchio's nose grew with telling untruths. We have had a lot of untruths from the Labour party and the Liberal Democrats. I shall be coming to them shortly. In framing his joke, the hon. Gentleman has not been listening carefully to my speech. All right, we have a lower exchange rate, which is helpful to competitiveness in the short run, but I have been pointing to an underlying change in the competitiveness of this country. I have been talking about a change in our unit wages costs vis-a-vis other countries. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman needs a moment longer to reflect upon what I know is an unfamiliar concept, but one which, when he has absorbed it, he will realise is extremely important in explaining our recovery.

Two of the foundations for recovery have been in place for some time. They are low inflation and low interest rates, but after this recession what Britain needs is rising confidence, and rising confidence has been enhanced by the Chancellor's clear medium-term economic policies. He has set all his policies in a medium-term framework.

First, the Chancellor set out a clear monetary policy—a target for underlying inflation of 1 to 4 per cent., and a set of indicators that he will consider when deciding on interest rate policy. Secondly, in the autumn statement, he established a public spending policy for the medium term. Over time, the Government's spending will grow less than the trend growth in the economy. We have published fixed spending ceilings, above which we will not go. Thirdly, the Budget set out a strategy for tackling the deficit in the coming years.

The form that this Finance Bill takes underlines the Government's medium-term strategy for the economy, because, unusually, this Bill sets out tax rates not just for this year but for the years ahead. Contrast these clear statements with what we have heard from the Opposition. Before the election, they had a policy for everything, and usually two policies for everything. Since the election, they have entered a policy void. The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould)—remember him? I might say, my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham—puts it very well. Of the Labour party, he says:

> "We appear not to have an independent view on the level of public spending or borrowing, or where interest rates should be, or the importance or otherwise of monetary policy, or how the exchange rate should be managed."

What a condemnation of the Labour party. I want to make it clear that this is not something I picked up from the hon. Member for Dagenham over lunch in the Churchill Room. This is something that he has stated publicly—writing in The Mail on Sunday, no less.

The hon. Member for Peckham is shadow Chief Secretary. She has held her job almost as long as I have held mine. I have to badger Ministers all the time about controlling spending. That does not make me a very popular chap. It is probably for that reason that I have to look to people on the other side of the House to have lunch with. But what about the hon. Member for Peckham, who is in the equivalent position?

I cannot remember a single subject upon which the hon. Lady has called for restraint. All her comments have been to the effect that more money is needed for health, education, overseas aid and everything under the sun. Like the other megastar whom she most closely resembles—I am of course referring to Miss Joan Collins—she likes to have the most expensive of everything and, like so many of Joan Collins' screen roles, she just cannot say no. On the subject of what our tunes are today, I suggest that her tune is "I'm Just a Girl Who Can't Say No", from the musical "Oklahoma".

If public spending is too high, it weighs on the country's wealth-creating sector. We lose sight of that fact at our peril. This year, general Government expenditure is planned to be more than 45 per cent. of GDP. Government spending is likely to rise by 19·5 per cent. in real terms between 1988-89 and 1993-94. Central Government debt interest payments are projected to rise by nearly 9 per cent.

a year in real terms between now and 1996-97. On their own, they will add nearly 1 per cent. to the proportion of national income which is taken by public spending.

On 8 February, I announced to the House a programme of fundamental public expenditure reviews. During this Parliament, that process will consider every Government programme, reassessing spending commitments against the needs of the 1990s and the century ahead. I have agreed demanding agendas with the Secretaries of State for Social Security, for Health and for Education, and with the Home Secretary, and work is now under way on that. We have chosen those programmes because they are among the biggest. What is loose change in those programmes is, or can be, more than the entire budget for some other programmes.

Social security is a prime example. It accounts for £80 billion a year, one third of all public spending. Every working person in this country contributes £10 daily to cover the costs of social security. Every year, the amount we spend on social security increases. Since 1978-79, leaving aside unemployment, the programme has grown by more than 3 per cent. a year in real terms. In last year's public spending round, we added £3·9 billion to the DSS programme—that is what we added for one year—and it is a striking thought that that increase in social security spending is nearly twice the total annual investment in national roads, even though investment in national roads is at a record level.

Looking to the future, the prospects are also very difficult. Demographic pressures are against us, and they will add £250 million a year on their own. Items which a few years ago were insignificant have swollen to massive proportions. Back in 1978-79, help with mortgage interest rates through income support was £10 million. Today it is more than £1 billion. The number of people claiming invalidity benefit has doubled over the last year, while the nation has become healthier over the past 10 years. The number of single parents has also doubled. There are now 1,300,000 single parents bringing up more than 2 million children. All too many of those families depend on income support, and the numbers seem set to keep rising.

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North-West) rose——

Mr. Portillo: Let me say a little more.

The Opposition recognise the problems, and the fact that great difficulties are posed by some of the trends. The Opposition have set up a social justice commission to put some of the issues in the spotlight while apparently leaving the shadow Chief Secretary in the dark.

"We must be prepared to examine in an open-minded way some of the fundamental features of our approach. What is the right balance between universal and selective benefits?" That question, those words and those sentiments are not mine; they are the words and the question of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East.

Mr. Wicks: The Minister said that 70 per cent. of one-parent families in Britain depended on state social security. Does he recognise that, in Sweden, for example, 70 or 80 per cent. of single parents are in employment and standing on their own two feet? Does that not imply that what is needed is a package consisting of jobs, training, education and child care to enable one-parent families to be independent, which is good for the economy and good for those families? Will the right hon. Gentleman draw on those lessons for the United Kingdom?

Mr. Portillo: I note that the Swedish economy had been in tremendous difficulty recently, and that Swedish interest rates have made ours look like a Sunday picnic. Our own rate of employment is second in the EC after Denmark. The participation of our labour force in employment is very high. I recognise the hon. Gentleman's argument, but there are clearly counter-arguments to be advanced.

Public expenditure control is necessary and is in place but, in present circumstances, our commitment to sound public finances requires us to raise revenue, too. We shall do so in the way that least affects the recovery or incentives, in a way that spreads the burden fairly and in ways that accord with our long-established principles. Over time, we have shifted the tax burden away from direct taxes, which blunt incentives, to indirect taxes, which do not. We also prefer to broaden the tax base rather than increase rates of tax.

The Prime Minister signed the Rio convention on climate change last June. We are determined to meet our environmental commitments, along with others, and return carbon dioxide emissions to 1990 levels by the year 2000. If we sign up to commitments, we mean it and we meet them. VAT on domestic fuel and power will contribute significantly to the achievement of our Rio target. The Opposition parties argued last year that the Rio convention did not go far enough, yet now they are unwilling to face up to the consequences of curbing pollution. Their reaction has been as predictable as it is depressing.

It is quite clear that the Labour party was itself planning such a change. It has issued statements about green taxes and has written policy documents about taxing fuel. It has omitted any reference to fuel and power when talking about our zero rates, and has quite explicitly said that VAT should be increased on things that damage the environment. One does not need to be Inspector Morse to work out that that means VAT on domestic fuel and power.

Today, however, I want to take issue with the Liberal Democrats in particular. In the Newbury by-election campaign, they have pledged themselves to scrapping the extension of VAT, and have sought to make that the centrepiece of their campaign. The right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) tells us that he believes in a new kind of politics. In what he has called the "Newbury declaration"—if anyone can imagine anything so pompous—he explained that politicians should look to "long-term gain" not "short-term calculation", and that politics "ought to be about telling people the truth".

So have the Liberal Democrats been telling people the truth? Listen to what they said in "Costing the Earth", a federal green paper issued in 1991:

"Liberal Democrats advocate as a first priority the imposition of a tax on energy . . . the UK is unusual amongst EC Members in not applying even standard rates of VAT onto domestic fuels . . . if it proved completely impossible to persuade our international partners to adopt energy taxes . . . we would nevertheless press forward . . . for example, by ending the anomalous zero rate of VAT on fuel."

Mr. Beith: Will the Chief Secretary give way?

Mr. Portillo: I will give the right hon. Gentleman his moment.

The "Newbury declaration" of the right hon. Member for Yeovil is not only pompous: it is sanctimonious humbug. Liberal Democrats are wedded to short-term calculation and do not give a damn about "long-term gains". So far from believing that politics ought to be about telling people the truth, for a few extra by-election votes the Liberal Democrats would sell their grannies.

Mr. Beith: The Minister will acknowledge that that green paper did not become party policy. Instead, we took up the suggestion, which the Minister is resisting, that energy taxes should be related to pollution and resource depletion effects like a European carbon tax. That is the sensible way to proceed: not to visit a tax at the same level on wind power as is visited on nuclear power.

Mr. Portillo: The right hon. Gentleman's integrity and that of his party are not improved by wriggling. It is perfectly clear what the Liberal Democrats were saying then and it is perfectly clear what they are saying now, and it is perfectly clear that there is a huge gap between the two.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): Now that Inspector Clouseau has had his fun with the Liberal party, perhaps the Minister can tell us why, if the VAT on domestic fuel was related to Rio and global warming, the total sum generated is not going into energy conservation in the home?

Mr. Portillo: The hon. Gentleman misses the point. Putting VAT on domestic fuel and power will reduce our carbon dioxide emissions by 3·5 per cent. and, with our other measures, that takes us two thirds of the way towards fulfilling our Rio convention commitment. That is how it operates, and it achieves exactly that effect. The hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) knows perfectly well that we are talking about a Budget in which revenue has to be generated. We have the honesty to talk about generating revenue, while the Labour party does not.

In contrast to what we have heard from the Liberal Democrats, the truth is that independent experts, such as the Institute for Fiscal Studies, have confirmed that this Budget will impose a roughly equivalent extra financial burden on those in all income brackets in our society.

The action that we propose on the married couple's allowance, on dividends and on car taxation ensure that the better-off pay their fair share. The truth is that any increase in domestic energy prices feeds through automatically in the normal uprating of all benefits, including retirement pensions, and we have promised to provide extra help on top of that for people who will face the most difficulty in meeting their higher fuel bills. That special assistance to those on income support and other income-related benefits will be available before the new bills come in.

The truth is that the Government can be proud of their record of help for the neediest people. Last October, we boosted the weekly income support rates for pensioners by £2 for a single pensioner and by £3 for a pensioner couple. This month, everyone on income support has benefited by between £1·40 and £2·80 per week because they no longer have to make any contribution to local taxation. What is more, this month all major benefits—not just income-related benefits—have risen by 3·6 per cent., which is nearly twice the current rate of inflation.

Mrs. Barbara Roche (Hornsey and Wood Green): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Portillo: No, I will not.

Following privatisation, everyone has benefited from falling fuel prices. Domestic gas prices have dropped by 9 per cent. in real terms over the past five years, and domestic electricity prices are actually being cut in price terms this year.

Under the previous Labour Government, electricity prices rose by 30 per cent. in real terms. No special help was given to people on low incomes then. What is more, Conservative Members remember that the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) was an Energy Minister in that Labour Government.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): With regard to pensioners, does my right hon. Friend recall the position in 1976, when the International Monetary Fund had to be called in, the Christmas bonus could not be paid and Barbara Castle had to change the pension payment date—from April to April, to November to November—in order to lose 10 months of inflation and rob the pensioners? Is it not the Labour party which always has its stiletto knife in pensioners' backs?

Mr. Portillo: My hon. Friend is right in his recollection of history. In every election since 1979, the Labour party has made grandiose promises to pensioners, but pensioners have not believed them, because they remember that the Labour party tricked them when Labour was last in office, and they know that, when the Labour party offers them policies, they do not add up, and they have no expectation of those promises being fulfilled in future.

In recent weeks we have seen a string of very good economic figures. They have forced the hon. Member for Peckham to change her tune and to recognise that recovery may be under way. However, not being able to bear such good news, like all great stars she has taken out her handkerchief and spoken in tragic tones. Her performance has been very moving. She now directs our attention to the need for sustained recovery and for tackling the underlying weaknesses of the economy.

On the Government side of the House, Members have always been interested in sustained recovery and in building up the underlying strengths of our economy. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer strengthened the car industry by abolishing car tax; it has responded with the best monthly production figures for 19 years.

The Chancellor gave unparalleled help to exporters in the Budget; exports to non-European Community 24countries are up 12 per cent. on last year. He took steps to help the housing market; prices are beginning to stabilise and even to rise a little.

The Opposition are not really interested in building up the underlying strengths of this economy. They oppose every policy that offers Britain a stronger future; they opposed every privatisation that turned loss-making corporations into profit-making businesses; they have fought every trade union law reform which has given us the best industrial relations record for 100 years; and they have let their union friends boycott every major training initiative. Now they refuse to condemn the teachers' boycott of testing in our schools, even though it is damaging our education and our economic prospects.

The British people will contrast that record of the Labour party with the courage shown by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. His tenacity has brought down inflation to its lowest level for a generation.

The evidence of economic recovery is growing, confidence is returning, Britain is on track. This Finance Bill will keep Britain on track, and I commend it to the House.

Ms Harriet Harman (Peckham): The Bill arises from a Budget which breaks promises, hits hardest at the people who can least afford it and fails to do what is necessary to deal with the fundamental weakness of the economy and to set the country on course for sustainable economic growth.

At the heart of the Bill lies a fraud on the electorate. The Tory election campaign was centred on the pledge to cut taxes. The Prime Minister promised specifically and repeatedly that the Government would not put value added tax on gas and electricity—they would not and they had no need to—yet they are putting before the House a Finance Bill which means that for every £1 paid on heating bills they will take another 17·5p in tax, which will affect everyone. It will hit hardest at the poorest, as they spend a larger share of their incomes on heating bills, and the Government know it. It will hit hardest at the elderly, who spend more time at home and need to use more gas and electricity to stay warm, and the Government know that, too.

Not only have the Government broken their election promises, not only are they hitting the poor and the elderly hardest, but they add insult to injury by trying to justify the measure by claiming that it is environmental. When the Chief Secretary spoke in the Budget debate, he was slightly more honest, saying:

"Before the election we said that we had no plans to raise VAT, and that was the plain truth [Interruption.] Yes, it was. Last year, we were looking at a level of Government borrowing far lower than that we are facing today. We must take action to deal with the changed position."—[Official Report, 17 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 300.]

So which is it? Is it what the Chief Secretary said on 17 March—that the Government have gone into the red—or is it a green measure, as he is trying to pretend today? We know that this is not a measure for the environment; it is intended to raise money. It is a measure not from a Government who have gone green but from a Government who have gone into the red.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Can the hon. Lady tell us what the Labour party did to help the elderly? When Labour was last in power, electricity prices rose by 30 per cent., and I do not recollect her protecting them at that time.

Ms Harman: Since the Conservative Government have been in power, our pensioners have fallen behind those in the rest of Europe. They have found that residential care services, domiciliary care services, home help and meals on wheels have been cut. They have found that the public transport services that they need to get round have been cut. I should like to know whether the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) told those people whom he asked to vote for him at the general election that he would vote to increase VAT on their gas and electricity. I will give way for him to say what he put in his election address.

Mr. Butterfill: Will the hon. Lady answer my question?

Ms Harman: I have answered the hon. Gentleman's question. Not only will VAT be put on the cost of the fuel that is used; it will also be put on the standing charge. How on earth can it be an environmental measure to put VAT on a standing charge that, by definition, does not vary with the amount of fuel used? The Government came up with the answer that to have VAT on gas and electricity but not on the standing charge would lead to tax avoidance. Do Conservative Members really believe that, or is it simply another thing that they have taken to saying without even caring or knowing whether anyone believes them any more?

Mr. Stephen Milligan (Eastleigh): Can the hon. Lady tell us clearly what a Labour Government would do, in the remote possibility that they came to power? Would they repeal the tax? If so, how would they find the additional revenue?

Ms Harman: We will vote against the measure tonight. We will vote against putting VAT on gas and electricity. I challenge the hon. Gentleman: when he asked his constituents to vote for him, did he say that he would put 17·5 per cent. on their gas and electricity bills? Our principles are to be fair to pensioners and ensure that a Labour Government do not clobber them with the same economic mistakes as this Government have.

In the last general election, the candidate for Enfield, Southgate, Michael Portillo, said:

"Conservatives want to cut your taxes."

Can that be the same Michael Portillo who now, as the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, asks for £17 billion extra in taxes? Curiously, the Cabinet that has decided to put taxes up is full of right hon. Members who told their voters that they would put taxes down.

The Tory candidate for Rushcliffe, Kenneth Clarke, said in his election address:

"Only the Conservatives believe in keeping taxes down."

Did he mention that when the Cabinet considered the Budget? The Tory candidate for Edinburgh, Pentlands said:

"six reasons for voting conservative this time . . . (3) to stop your taxes going up".

Did he mention that in the Cabinet? The Tory candidate for Wirral, West, David Hunt, said:

"Ten reasons to vote Conservative . . . (1) keep taxes low".

Did he mention that when the Budget was considered by the Cabinet? The pledge was echoed by Tory candidates throughout the country.

Perhaps I can remind some of the hon. Members who will be voting tonight of what they said to their voters. The Conservative candidate for Richmond, Yorks said:

"Only the Conservatives can keep taxes down . . . A Conservative Government means lower taxation."

A Conservative Government has not meant lower taxation. The Tory candidate for Chichester, Anthony Nelson, said:

"A Conservative Government means lower taxation. I want to see taxation reduced further."

Those Tory Members and all the others who made the same promises now face a choice. They can either keep the clear promises they made to their voters or follow the discredited Ministers through the Lobby to put up taxes as the Government's panic response to the damage that they have done to the economy. If they vote with the Government, their constituents will know that they can never be trusted again. [Interruption.] Perhaps the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) can tell us what he said about keeping taxes down.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton): The Labour junior Treasury spokesman in the other place said that VAT should be extended to all zero-rated goods. Does the hon. Lady agree with her Front-Bench spokesman in the other place?

Ms Harman: We are opposed to putting VAT on gas and electricity. The Government promised that they would not put VAT on gas and electricity—but they are doing exactly that.

The Finance Bill not only breaks election promises but fails to set the economy on course for sustained economic recovery. The Chief Secretary joked about that, but many people in Britain believe that the situation remains serious. Of course everyone hopes that there will be a recovery. Every sign of improvement is welcome, because the price that the country has paid for the Government's economic incompetence is high. During this recession, 1,347,000 more people lost their jobs. During this recession, 420,000 more young people joined the dole queue. Some 149,000 more businesses have failed and 188,000 more families have lost their homes through mortgage default.

Having failed to accept responsibility for the recession, the Government now try to take credit for the recovery. Every increase in unemployment is due, of course, to factors outside the Government's control. Every drop in unemployment is due to the Government's economic policies. Every business failure is due to factors outside the Government's control. But any increase in business confidence is due to the Government's economic policies.

The fall in retail sales was due to factors outside the Government's control. The increase in retail sales is now directly due to the Government's economic policy. No one who lost his job can blame the Government, but everyone who finds a job has the Government to thank. This is a Government who take credit for anything, but accept responsibility for nothing.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): The hon. Lady referred a moment ago to the recovery. Does she accept that a recovery is under way?

Ms Harman: I very much hope that a recovery is under way. I very much hope that this unnecessarily long recession, caused by the Government's economic failures, is ending. But I want to be sure, and people in the country want to be sure, that never again do so many lose their jobs and so many businesses fail because the Government think that the economy is nothing to do with them.

The economy remains scarred by recession. Still 2,940,000 people have no job. Still more than 1·5 million people live in homes worth less than their mortgage.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): If the hon. Lady agrees that, indeed, the recession appears to be ending and recovery is under way, how much of the start of that recovery does she put down to our coming out of the exchange rate mechanism? Is it her party's policy to return to the ERM in due course?

Ms Harman: We want to see stability for business in Britain as part of economic recovery. One of the things that business has lacked on exchange rates, interest rates or any other issue is certainty for the future. We believe that management and co-operation on exchange rates are part of that. But one of the problems with the ERM that the Government have failed to address is why our economy was so fundamentally weak that we had no chance of surviving at the rate at which we entered.

The economy has become seriously weakened. We have fallen behind the countries with which we have to compete. There was no recognition of that in the Chief Secretary's speech. British investment per manufacturing worker is half that of Germany and America and only one third that of Japan.

We have fallen behind on skills. Skill levels are 40 per cent. below those of our leading rivals. The skills gap is particularly serious in engineering, in which Germany and France continue to produce twice as many qualified people as we do. Our failure to invest in skills and industry shows in our failure to match our competitors on productivity. British productivity is now 30 per cent. below the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development average.

The Government's lack of attention to those economic fundamentals is reflected in a growing balance of payments problem. Despite the recession, we continue to import more than we export. The manufacturing deficit is set to rise. The balance of payments deficit will worsen in the next two years. The volume of imports is set to rise faster than exports. Government forecasts show that they expect consumer spending to lead the economy out of recession. But that will make the already serious balance of payments problems worse unless it is matched by investment in industry and skills.

Only the Government fail to recognise the deep problems that remain, problems which are evident to those who look at Britain from home and abroad, even if they are apparently undetectable to those who survey the scene from either No. 10 or No. 11 Downing street.

The Government must address the skills gap and the investment gap which are at the heart of our growing trade gap. Before the Government sound the trumpet to celebrate the end of the recession they should notice that the trumpet, too, is now made in Japan by Yamaha. That is why it remains vital that the Government should adopt the measures that the Labour party is proposing not only for an urgent employment programme, but for a boost to investment, starting with the phased release of the accumulated receipts from the sale of council houses.

The Government have been borrowing, and the cost of the recession and the weakening of our industries is revealed by public finances. They have borrowed not to train people or to equip them with new skills, but to keep them idle. For the first time since the systematic collection of statistics began, more public money is being borrowed than invested. The Government's approach to public spending is like running the bath taps with the plug out.

When the Prime Minister was Chief Secretary, he said that we would have a zero PSBR; he then said that he would not accept a PSBR of £25 billion, but now the Government forecast, and they hope to be able to keep to, a PSBR of double that at £50 billion.

Despite the £115 billion in oil revenues and the £62 billion in privatisation receipts, the Tories are set to push public borrowing to a record high. The quest to press on with privatisation has now become a sick joke. Group 4 may need to change its name to Group 8 in recognition of the number of prisoners who have escaped. The Chief Secretary will remember that Margaret Thatcher promised that her plans for privatisation would set the people free. Group 4 has given a new and fresh meaning to that election slogan.

The privatisation receipts, in common with the oil receipts have not gone on investing in skills, industry and our social and economic fabric, but on financing the growing dole queue. The country has enormous strengths, but the Government's economic policy is eroding them systematically. It is not that the Government have an economic problem, but that the economy has a Government problem. It is not the Labour party which is talking Britain down, but the Conservatives who are holding it back.

At a time when unemployment remains at around 3 million, it is extraordinary that the Finance Bill contains a measure for the taxation of oil which, on the Chancellor's own assessment, will result in at least 10,000 job losses. The oil industry and independent forecasters estimate that the proposal will cause nearer 30,000 job losses. The change in the tax regime for North sea oil will result in a fall in exploration, and will therefore affect the future of the oil industry. The Government have introduced this change at a time when many other areas of the world have substantial oil reserves, sometimes greater than those in the North sea. The loss of incentives to continued exploration in United Kingdom waters may be highly damaging.

The measure in the Bill will benefit some operators in the oil industry, especially if they cut the amount of exploration they undertake, which many, faced with the proposed change, now plan to do. Operators in the mature fields will benefit from the reduction in, and eventual abolition of, the petroleum revenue tax. There is a real risk, however, that those operators, instead of investing their new profits in the North sea, will invest that money in other parts of the world. This may be an issue for Scotland and the oil industry, but it is also an important issue for the country. It poses a significant risk to the United Kingdom, not just in terms of immediate jobs losses, but in terms of the future of our energy resources.

As the economy struggles out of one of the deepest and longest recessions for 50 years, confidence may return to the high street, but public confidence will not return to the Chancellor and his Ministers. The Tories will not address the question of how to build a strong economy because, quite simply, they do not believe that that is an issue for government. They think that it can all be left to the market and that the economy has an inherent capacity to grow.

It is simply no longer possible to place any trust in what the Tories say either about the economy or about their plans for the economy. The Conservatives failed to forecast the recession and they denied its existence when it started. They underestimated its severity and length, and they overestimated how soon a recovery would begin. Every official forecast made by the Prime Minister and by the Chancellor has had to be revised downwards—except for the forecast for the PSBR, which has had to be doubled. The Chief Secretary has just said——

Several hon. Members rose——

Ms Harman: I have given way half a dozen times. I am not prepared to give way now, because many hon. Members want to speak in the debate.

The Chief Secretary said in a moment of seriousness that, when the Government signed up for commitments, they kept them. I thought that he must be about to make a joke, but I realised that he was trying to be serious. The Government said that they would maintain the value of the pound, but they devalued it. They said that the recession was ending in April 1992; it had another year to go. They said that they would not put VAT on gas and electricity. It is set to go up by 17·5 per cent. They said that they would not have a PSBR of more than £25 billion. It is to be double that. They said that they would cut taxes, but they are to raise them by £17 billion.

The Chief Secretary said that there would be £1·75 billion in extra investment for councils from the release of receipts from the sale of council houses and from other capital receipts. In the autumn statement debate, I challenged that figure, because councils told me that they expected not an increase but a drop in receipts, because they could no longer sell council houses. Yet the Chief Secretary and the Chancellor, when they clearly knew that councils would not have £1·75 billion to invest and to spend, kept giving that figure.

The Institute of Housing has carried out a survey which supports my findings. It concludes:

"Local authority building will be zero and only 400 additional homes will be built through housing associations. A modest increase in investment in 1993 will be paid for by cuts in 1994 and 1995."

Will the Chief Secretary now admit to the House that there was no £1·75 billion-worth of capital receipts available for council investment and that that figure was and is bogus? I shall give way to the Chief Secretary if he wants to admit that that figure is bogus. I see that he is staying in his seat.

The Government are now set to chop the welfare state. The increase in unemployment and the fall in receipts are used as the excuse not only to increase taxes, but to cut services. The election promises to protect services and benefits have also been forgotten. No Tory candidates and no Tory Members warned constituents that to vote Tory would mean chopping benefits and services. Of course, cutting the welfare state is not just an expedient caused by the Government's economic incompetence, but is the hidden agenda of the Tory right wing. It sees the increase in borrowing as a chance to take the axe to services in which it has never believed and to benefits on which it has never had to rely.

The Institute of Managers reports that, even at the bottom of the recession, directors have managed to award themselves a pay increase of 5·5 per cent., yet the Chief Secretary tells us—he told us this again today—that the key to a successful economy is low wages, not for directors, of course, but starting with a cut in the living standards of people working in the public sector.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Harman: I have given way about six times and I intend to press on.

As the Government cut the welfare state and push up fuel costs for the elderly, more people will turn to charities for help.

Mrs. Browning: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Harman: I give way on condition that the hon. Lady tells the Chief Secretary to clean up his jokes about me.

Mrs. Browning: I thank the hon. Lady for giving way, and if I can help her in the matter of the Joan Collins jokes I will be pleased to discuss that in private with her after the debate.

I should like to take up the hon. Lady's point about pay increases. We are all aware of the need for pay restraint right across the public and private sectors, but the hon. Lady will recall that the House voted on Members' pay and that many hon. Members, particularly Conservative Members, voted for a zero increase. The same cannot be said for all her Back-Bench colleagues.

Ms Harman: The trouble is that the Conservative Members who voted for no pay increase for Members of Parliament did not vote for their pay as directors or as consultants to be frozen. The difference between us and the Conservatives is that we believe in a highly skilled, high technology, high investment economy—and high wages will be part of that. We do not think that we should have a low skill, low technology, low wage economy and then try to compete with the third world.

As the Government cut the welfare state and push up fuel costs for the elderly, more people will turn to charities for help. Last year the Cancer Relief Macmillan Fund gave out more than £3 million in patient grants, of which by far the largest category were grants for heating costs. But the charities to which the elderly and the ill turn will in future be less able to respond because the Government plan to take money off them by making them pay VAT on gas and electricity for the first time.

The Imperial Cancer Research Fund calculates that VAT on gas and electricity will mean that it has to pay extra tax of £170,000 a year; and the Charities Reform Group calculates that 11 national charities will have to give the Government more than £1 million more.

The measures in the Finance Bill to encourage more payroll giving and gift aid will go nowhere towards making up for the millions of pounds that the Government will take off the charities through VAT on fuel or to make up for the fall in private charitable giving that has been caused by the recession.

The Government cannot even get their alibi right. The Chancellor claims that the rosy 1992 Budget forecast for growth was blown off course because of problems in the world economy. The Red Book, however, shows that the one figure that the Government got right in 1992 was that for growth in the world economy, as Dr. John Wells of Cambridge university has pointed out. The problem had everything to do with misleading the electorate about the country's immediate economic prospects and the possibility that taxes would be raised.

The Government did not tell voters at the last election that they planned to put up taxes and put VAT on gas and electricity, because they knew that, if they told them, they would not be re-elected. Although most Tories are happy to cheat the people who elected them, some, at least, have a conscience. I was glad to see that the Conservative group on Dundee council was prepared to second a motion from the Labour leadership of that council. Although he had a heavy heart in doing so, the Tory leader of Dundee council said that he had come to the conclusion that to oppose the motion condemning the Government for putting VAT on gas and electricity would be to try to "defend the indefensible"; and that "to impose it for environmental reasons, for controlling pollution, was to stand logic on its head."

Conservative candidates are asking for votes in the May council elections throughout England and Wales, but, before voting, people are entitled to know where those candidates stand. Do the Tory candidates, for instance, support the proposal to put VAT on gas and electricity? Perhaps the Chief Secretary can tell us, to help the voters of Newbury, whether, if the Tory candidate there were elected, he would vote for VAT on gas and electricity. Will Julian Davidson vote for that if he is elected? Can the Chief Secretary tell us? It would be very odd if he did not know whether a by-election candidate for his own party would vote with him on this matter if he were elected.

The Chief Secretary is not prepared to tell us whether his candidate in that by-election supports that key measure in the Budget. It is clear why he will not. If the candidate pledges to vote for the VAT extension, he has no chance of being elected, so he will refuse to say. The people of Newbury will know two things about him—that he plans to vote for VAT on gas and electricity and to conceal that fact from those he is asking to vote for him. In that respect, he is like other Tory Members. If any Tory Members have any integrity left, they will join us in the Lobby to vote against the Finance Bill and to keep their promises.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. What is the position about Second Reading of the Bill? Am I right in thinking that it is exempted business? Many hon. Members are rising to speak, and if it is exempted, the vote does not need to be at 10 o'clock but can be at whatever hour the House decides.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): The hon. Gentleman is quite right on both points.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Do the rules of the House contain any guidance about how we are expected to deal with a shadow Chief Secretary to the Treasury who apparently aspires to the job, yet suggests that public expenditure is to be increased and taxation is to be resisted?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a matter for the Chair, as the hon. Gentleman well knows. His point is a sheer waste of the House's time.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) attacked the level of the borrowing requirement and some of the Budget measures that are designed to reduce it. In particular, she attacked VAT on domestic energy but did not mention her party's proposal to impose a levy on the profits of energy utilities and how that would assist consumers. She did not say whether, despite that levy, energy utilities would continue to pass to consumers the benefits from the lower costs that they have enjoyed in recent years.

The hon. Lady gave a grudging welcome to the encouraging signs of economic growth that have emerged in recent weeks, but criticised the Government for, she claimed, acknowledging the recovery too soon. She said that the Government had claimed that it had started last summer, and that we had had to wait a year for it. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary explained that the GDP had grown in three quarters. I am a simple accountant and my mathematical ability may not be equal to that of the hon. Lady. However, it is clear that three quarters before the end of the last quarter would take us back to the beginning of the summer of last year. If recovery started last June, it is churlish of the hon. Lady to criticise the Government for a claim which, on her calculation, was perhaps three months premature.

Mr. Geoffrey Hoon (Ashfield): The hon. Gentleman is the Chairman of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service. Why did that Committee roundly condemn the Budget?

Mr. Watts: It would take me a long time to deal in detail with every part of the report that was published today. The hon. Gentleman is referring to the fourth-form abuse in the earlier paragraphs of the report. I understand the irresistible temptation that faced the Liberal and Labour members of the Committee to insert a few abusive and rude comments about the Chancellor, but they did little to enhance the work of the Committee, and they were not an intelligent commentary on the development of the economy. When I have dealt with another matter that has arisen in the debate, I shall deal with the central feature of that report and the matters that the Government will have to deal with in the years ahead.

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): It would have helped the Select Committee even more if the Conservative Members who should have been there were actually there.

Mr. Watts: I plead not guilty, as I was there. As I have said on a number of occasions, I do not consider myself to be either a wet nurse or a Whip for one part of the Committee. My role as Chairman is to serve the whole Committee.

My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary referred to a number of measures taken to assist the further development of industry and to a Liberal declaration in Newbury about VAT. In both references, he missed out one important measure in the Budget. He made no reference to the improvement in the VAT treatment of the racing industry, which is a feature of the Budget for an industry that is of importance to many parts of the country. I link it to the Liberal declaration in Newbury, because I have seen reported a scurrilous allegation from the Liberal candidate that the measure was designed for the by-election and for no other purpose.

It is important that the record is set straight. The last time that I saw our late colleague, Judith Chaplin, was when she and I went to see my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in the course of pre-Budget consultations. The matter that she discussed with the Chancellor, as she had done often before, was the need for some reform of VAT on the racing industry. Therefore, it cannot be true, and is not true, that the measure is included in the Budget as a by-election bribe. It is there, if anything, as a tribute to the assiduous way in which our late hon. Friend served the interests of her constituency with such vigour.

Mr. Portillo: My hon. Friend is right. Does he agree that, if it had been a by-election ploy, during the course of my speech I would have made quite a lot of that historically helpful measure?

Mr. Watts: My right hon. Friend makes his own point in a most powerful way. I thought it appropriate to mention the matter in order to put the record straight and, in particular to draw attention to the role of our late, lamented friend.

The Bill implements the revenue-raising side of the Chancellor's fiscal judgment. It is clear that the difficult judgment, as my right hon. Friend described it, that the Chancellor took was the right one. He was right to avoid premature increases in the burden of taxation, which might have jeopardised the recovery that we are all so glad to see is shown by recent evidence, even though the consequence is a £50 billion public sector borrowing requirement for the coming year. He was equally right, sensible and wise to recognise that the deficit is not a problem that can be ignored and neglected throughout the economic cycle. It poses a potential problem in the development of the economy in the years ahead.

Table 2B.5 of the Red Book shows that, in 1997-98, the PSBR is projected at £30 billion or 3·75 per cent. of GDP, based on the central growth assumption in the forecast. On a low growth assumption, that deficit could be as high as 5·25 per cent. of GDP and, even on the assumption of a high assumed level of growth in the forecast, it would still be 2·5 per cent. The Bill contains revenue-raising measures to take effect next year. Had they not been in place, all those forecast levels of deficit would have been another 1·5 per cent. worse. That underlines the importance of those measures in the Bill.

I am reminded of the comments of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor that the Budget cannot be an à la carte menu. We must look to the revenues that are needed to balance our national accounts. Even on the most favourable assumption that can be contained in the official forecasts, the deficit does not end at the end of the present economic cycle. It is clear that, unless recovery is both substantially stronger than expected, and sustained, further reductions in public expenditure or increases in taxes will be necessary.

Naturally, my clear preference is for reductions in spending so that we can have the opportunity of further reductions in the level of taxation. The Conservative party is the only party, in the House or outside it, committed to lower taxation as a policy objective. The records of the Labour party in office and, if one looks back far enough, of the Liberal party in office and in support of a minority Labour Government prove that to be the case. Therefore, I urge my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to proceed with vigour with the fundamental review of public expenditure that he has been charged to undertake. No part of public expenditure can be considered to be out of bounds.

We have to address a medium to long-term problem. Therefore, we should not be seeking short-term cuts of the sort that Labour Governments took in the mid to late-1970s, involving slashing the Government's capital programme and imposing cuts in pensioners' incomes—a fact to which my hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) referred earlier—and imposing on workers in the public service not merely pay restraints but reductions in real pay. We must not look for such a menu to meet our requirements. We must look at rather more fundamental changes, both in the scope of expenditure and in the structure of the public sector.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, when he calls for cuts in public expenditure, he is calling for a continuing downward spiral of low or slashed levels of public investment, leading to nothing happening about the unemployed and to continuing high levels of public expenditure on unemployment? Would it not be far better to invest in the economy, do something about the unemployed and help to cut the PSBR so that we would not have to continue to spend millions on maintaining a standing army of the unemployed?

Mr. Watts: I am grateful for the hon. Lady's support. I am sure that, had she been a Labour Member of Parliament in the 1970s, she would have opposed the slashing of the capital programme for roads, hospitals and schools which the Labour Government of the day undertook. That is what I had in mind when I referred to short-term measures almost always being the wrong decisions.

It would be surprising if my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, having taken such pains in his autumn statment to protect the major parts of the Government's capital expenditure programme, were to reverse that decision and make such short-term and ill-considered reductions in beneficial expenditure, rather than having the fundamental review of the role of the public sector that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary is undertaking.

It will build on the initiative announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, which is aimed at a substantial transfer of both responsibilities and risks from the public sector to the private sector. That will have beneficial effects on public finances. We are not looking for cosmetic changes, but if there is a permanent shrinkage in the public sector and if risks that are borne in the public sector are taken on in the private sector, that is not cosmetic but a fundamental change in the role and the scope of the public sector.

Higher taxation is never my preferred option. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will review the progress of the economy in the run-up to his next Budget in November. While the recent growth in consumer expenditure is welcome to get the economy on the move, if that consumer spending growth is excessive and appears detrimental to the current account and the balance of payments because of a high propensity to buy imports, there may be a need to consider some increases in indirect taxation in that Budget. That would ameliorate the growth of consumer spending, if such a growth is becoming a problem, and would contribute usefully, in the short and medium term, to a reduction in the size of the deficit.

My preference is not for an increased burden of taxation as an objective of policy, but for a combination of lower spending and more rapid growth in the economy. That would be preferable and may well happen, especially if our major trading partners—in particular on the continent of Europe—get their economic acts together. Such a combination could present my right hon. Friend the Chancellor with real options in the later years of the medium-term financial strategy, one of which might be more rapid progress in implementing the Government's policy objective of a lower rate of direct taxation—a 20p basic rate of income tax. That objective is not shared by the other political parties.

No doubt many aspects of individual taxes will come under close scrutiny in Committee, both on the Floor of the House and upstairs, but there is only one specific tax measure to which I wish to refer today, and it is the petroleum revenue tax. In view of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's need to raise revenue to reduce the deficit, it is not surprising that he should consider a tax that had begun to appear almost optional and no longer yielded the revenue that he could once have expected. Perhaps the previous tax regime was over-generous in its relief for exploration and appraisal expenditure. However, I hope that my right hon. Friend will think again about the proposed transitional relief.

As I understand it, many oil companies are committed through their licensing obligations to incurring expenditure. They entered into those commitments when the goalposts were such that they could expect E and A expenditure to be set against their PRT tax liabilities. However, such expenditure will no longer qualify for that relief and nor is it covered by transitional relief. Where expenditure is unavoidable and decisions have been made in the expectation of relief, transitional relief should provide for that.

The second matter——

Mr. Robert Hughes: Before the hon. Gentleman leaves the question of petroleum revenue tax, does he agree that it is ominous and sinister that the Chief Secretary, during his opening speech, said not a single word about PRT?

Mr. Watts: I find that neither ominous nor sinister. There are many matters to which my right hon. Friend could refer, but he cannot refer to them all.

In fact, my second point was not moving away from PRT. I wonder whether there are other ways in which the yield from PRT could be increased without entirely removing relief for E and A expenditure. One possibility would be to retain a higher rate of PRT and restrict the amount of expenditure that qualifies for relief in any one year. I understand from some oil companies that have been in touch with me that, typically, their E and A expenditure might be about 80 per cent. of their PRT liability. My right hon. Friend's understandable desire to increase the flow of revenue could be achieved by setting a cap of 50 or 60 per cent. on the amount of PRT that can be offset by E and A expenditure. That would increase the flow of revenue to the Exchequer, but would not entirely remove the fiscal incentive to continue exploration for valuable hidden natural resources.

I fear that, in swinging the pendulum from one extreme to the other, the Budget's proposals may have gone too far. I hope that my right hon. Friend will look again at the matter and with an open mind. It may not be until the November Budget that consideration can be given a different long-term regime for oil taxation, but transitional relief——

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): The hon. Gentleman was recruiting some support on these Benches until his final point, when he suggested that any change could wait until November. Does not the hon. Gentleman understand that, by November, thousands of people—some estimate tens of thousands—in the oil industry will be out of work? Would it not be better to make the appropriate change during the Committee stage of this Bill? Will the hon. Gentleman revise his thoughts about the timetable for sensibly adjusting PRT?

Mr. Watts: The hon. Gentleman intervened a little too early. I said that it might take time for a different long-term tax regime to be devised to meet the objective of a strong flow of revenue, while leaving some incentive for exploration to ensure that important national assets are fully exploited. As the hon. Gentleman intervened, I was saying that the issue of transitional relief was more urgent and needed to be dealt with in this Bill. If it is dealt with satisfactorily, those tens of thousands of people to whom he referred will still be in work, because the licensing obligations for companies relate to work that is to be carried out over a significant number of years. Therefore, there is time for the fundamentals of the long-term regime to be dealt with later in the year if it proves impossible to deal with them satisfactorily in this Bill.

I am conscious of Madam Speaker's request that all hon. Members be economical in their use of time. I intend to follow her stricture and conclude simply by saying that, overall, it is a good Budget based on sound judgment, and that it includes sensible measures to underpin sustained recovery.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): The hon. Member for Slough (Mr. Watts), who is Chairman of the Treasury Select Committee, is, with the greatest respect, deluding himself if he thinks that in public accounts a clear line can be drawn between capital spending and revenue spending. I am sure that the Chief Secretary would confirm that. If a hospital cannot afford to pay its nurses, there is not much point in having capital, and vice versa. It is not such an easy solution as the hon. Gentleman, perhaps inadvertently, suggested.

The Chief Secretary made a Cambridge Union-style knockabout speech. I do not blame him for that, because he is a man with a problem, and the Red Book shows where it lies. There is a public sector borrowing requirement of £50 billion—8 per cent. of gross domestic product. As the hon. Member for Slough said, even on the best estimates that figure is not likely to come down by much over the next few years. The Government have signed up to the figures in the Maastricht treaty—apparently, we must get the PSBR down to 3 per cent. of GDP. Therefore, the Chief Secretary has a problem. It is in the lap of the gods whether he is still Chief Secretary if and when that 3 per cent. is achieved.

There is also a balance of payments deficit. Based on the Treasury's estimates, the Red Book says that this coming year the deficit will be £17·5 billion. Within that, the figures are even more horrendous. As my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) said, the manufacturing deficit is estimated at £13 billion. In addition, under the column headed "Other", there is another figure of, believe it or not, £9·5 billion.

I do not understand why the Treasury does not break down that "Other" figure. It is fairly large, at £9·5 billion. Most of it is probably accounted for by food imports. It is estimated that this country will be in deficit to the extent of £13 billion in the manufacturing sector and close to £8 billion or £9 billion in food. We are importing far more manufactures than we are making, and that is true of food as well. We can no longer pay for our food imports by exporting manufactured goods. We are in the appalling position of suffering major deficits in respect of manufacturing and food consumption.

Elsewhere in the table, a figure of £2 billion is shown in respect of oil, although no figure is given for energy. I am not an expert on oil taxation, but if half of what I hear is correct, that £2 billion deficit will probably disappear before long if no changes are made to the Bill. What about all the pit closures? I do not know where all the gas will come from—perhaps Norway or somewhere else. It will not be long before this country has an oil deficit also.

Invisibles account for £3 billion or £4 billion, but that figure fluctuates. This country has massive deficits in production and food that we cannot cover with anything else. The Chief Secretary is right to make a knockabout speech, because he is an intelligent man and I am sure that he is extremely worried about the situation.

It is said that we are now at the heart of Europe. Our gross domestic product per head is 90 per cent. of the rest of Europe. I do not care to talk about first and second divisions, but in terms of the economy—I mean no disrespect to these countries—we are down with Spain, Portugal, Ireland and Greece. Perhaps the figure will increase 1 per cent. in the coming year with the recession in Germany, but it will take a long time for our GDP to come even close to the EC average. Far from being at the heart of Europe, geographically we shall always be on its periphery, and it seems that we shall be so economically as well. There may be some correlation between the two.

Despite all that, the Prime Minister is a happy man. He does not worry about those things. He watches cricket, drinks warm beer, fills in his pools coupon, and gently strokes his favourite pit bull terrier. That is the Prime Minister for you. He is quite happy and thinks no more about it—the Committee stage of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill is over.

Mr. Hain: The Prime Minister can watch Neath beat Llanelli.

Mr. Davies: I do not think that is any more likely to happen than the Government coming near to meeting their Maastricht PSBR targets.

Progressive taxation went out of fashion in the 1980s. Adam Smith believed in it, thinking that progressive taxation was a good thing. Karl Marx probably thought the same thing, because he spoke of each according to his needs. With the Reagan and Thatcher revolution of the 1980s, progressive taxation ceased to be fashionable. I am not sure that it is fashionable now among my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench.

Our income tax and value added tax systems are extremely unprogressive, if that is a good and right word to describe them. I approve of the lower rate of income tax of 20 per cent. I am old enough to remember one and sixpence and six shillings and thruppence, and whatever else Roy Jenkins abolished in 1969—which may have lost us an election. I would argue for a rate even lower than 20 per cent.

The current banding is 20 per cent., 25 per cent. and 40 per cent.—but it stops there, with a jump from 25 per cent. to 40 per cent. when the individual's income reaches £23,000. If one considers allowances and the way the system is constructed, the individual must earn slightly more than a Member of Parliament to come within the 40 per cent. bracket—a salary of £31,000 or £32,000. Every pound after that is taxed at 40 per cent.

I believe that 40 per cent. is too high in some cases. In the late 1970s, there was talk of the middle manager. He is still there. The middle manager in the engineering industry does not earn that much. He may earn £40,000, or £50,000 in a medium-sized firm—although probably not during a recession. To tax that individual at 40 per cent. on everything he earns above £30,000 is wrong, unjust, and counter-productive. The Chief Secretary is gesticulating. I will give way if he wants to intervene.

Mr. Portillo: I was just thinking that the right hon. Gentleman's tax policies sound so similar to Conservative policies that he ought to come and sit on this side of the House.

Mr. Davies: The right hon. Gentleman has not heard it all yet, so he had better wait.

I mentioned Adam Smith and progressive taxation because I believe that there should be percentages. In Britain, the highest earnings are enjoyed not by those who work in manufacturing but by those in the financial sector, and by partners in firms of solicitors and accountants. I mean no disrespect, because they perform a useful function in society. High salaries are paid also to property developers in times of growth, and to people working in the media. Those are where the rewards are greatest.

Unfortunately, in the kind of society and economic system that we have in Britain, manufacturing comes lower down. The jump in taxation from 25 per cent. to 40 per cent. at an income of £31,000 or £32,000 militates against manufacturing. Young people consider such factors more than our generation did, and they note the kinds of employment which offer high earnings and lower tax rates. Partners in City accountants and solicitors firms think nothing of earning £250,000 a year and more. They pay 40 per cent. tax, as does a man making machine tools who is paid £45,000 or £50,000.

My scheme of progressive taxation is where I part company with the Chief Secretary. I would begin with tax at 10 per cent.—the right hon. Gentleman might agree—increasing in bands of 10 per cent. to perhaps 60 per cent. or 70 per cent. for the highest earners. That would be a much fairer system, which would lighten the burden on those in middle management who are working in the productive part of the economy, and it would tax more heavily those earning the highest incomes.

That view may be an unfashionable, and I can understand people arguing, "That would be terrible; there would be no investment," but it would be a more sensible system.

No one has jumped up and asked, "What will you do about capital gains tax?" It is most curious that capital gains tax under a Conservative Government is 40 per cent., which is the same as the maximum income tax rate for individuals. I accept that there is indexation, but in reality the figure is unlikely to be 25 per cent., even if the capital gain is not very large.

As to individual taxation, Conservatives do not recognise any difference between capital gains tax and income tax. That is most strange. When I first entered the House, splendid speeches were made by Conservative Members about acorns, oak trees, seeds, and the tree and the fruit. Nobody cared very much about all that in the 1980s. Investment did not mean anything. A buck was a buck, as a Canadian royal commission said years ago, when it recommended abolishing different forms of taxation or capital and income.

The Government tax capital gains at 40 per cent., which is too high. I do not believe that capital gains should be taxed at 40 per cent. I believe that the corporation tax is 33 per cent., capital and income. Obviously if one is going to change the system and have a progressive system of income taxation, one must consider capital taxation. I think that 30 per cent. is about right. I believe in the distinction between capital and income in a society that needs and wants to invest, and believes that investment and long-term growth are good things for the benefit of that society.

Value added tax is a terrible tax. Only someone from the common market would invent something called VAT. It is a dreadful bureaucratic tax, with thousands of civil servants sitting in their tower in Southend, churning out circulars. The tax is not to be found in the statute book; it changes every day as the commissioners of Inland Revenue put out press releases and circulars. One cannot find out or read about it. It is a terrible tax.

The Japanese and Americans at one time thought of introducing VAT. The Japanese are clever people and they decided they did not want to go down that road. When I was at the Treasury there was a proposal to send the permanent secretary to Japan and persuade them to have the tax and stop the Japanese economic miracle in its tracks. But the Japanese are very clever and decided not to have anything to do with this silly tax. However, we have got it, it is there, and we cannot change it.

Mr. Butterfill: The hon. Gentleman mentioned America. Perhaps he is not aware that America has a sales tax in almost every state, which funds most of the state expenditure.

Mr. Davies: I am aware of that. Years ago, in the state of Illinois, I can remember people going down to Indiana and coming back with the boots of their cars filled with television sets because Indiana had a lower sales tax. I do not understand the point that the hon. Gentleman is trying to make.

Mr. Butterfill: The hon. Gentleman was saying that this form of taxation was not popular anywhere else in the world. I was pointing out that in the largest single market in the world a sales tax, of one form or another, is very popular. The fact that people can move down the road to another state is fine. That tends to create a free market and make people average their taxes.

Mr. Davies: It is quite easy to pay it at the cash till. There is no bureaucracy; it is just added to the bill. It is very simple, very easy, and does not need 10,000 civil servants, circulars from the board of Customs and Excise, huge law reports and accountants making vast sums of money.

I seem to be arguing the case for the Conservatives. I think small business men especially would be delighted to get rid of VAT and have a simple sales tax as they have in Indiana, Illinois and other states in the United States; but we have got VAT. The Tories cannot cope with VAT: when Baroness Thatcher formed her first Administration, the first thing that happened was that they abolished the 8 per cent. rate and put VAT up to 15 per cent. To some extent that contributed to the surge in inflation which took place in 1979 and 1980 after the Conservatives got in. They did away with the 8 per cent. rate and imposed a 15 per cent. rate.

The 15 per cent. rate adversely affected many people. The Chief Secretary mentioned a VAT rate of 17·5 per cent. eventually on domestic heating and fuel; the relevant clause also mentions charities in that class. The same applies to construction, chapels and churches. I remember, as a Treasury Minister, receiving letters from ministers of chapels and churches which had to have their roofs repaired and had to pay 8 per cent. even then. Now 17·5 per cent. will be charged for construction and also for heating bills.

It does not make sense to have such a high, single positive rate when there is no lower rate at all. If it were 10 or 12 per cent., it would be just about defensible; I do not believe it is defensible to have a rate of 17·5 per cent. without a lower rate which can take into account cases such as churches, chapels and the disabled. I remember VAT being imposed on sanitary products for women, and women's groups quite rightly complained. Now it is 17·5 per cent.

My proposal—which again is entirely unfashionable; it is progressive, but unfashionable—is for a 5 or 6 per cent. VAT rate on fuel. This rate would also be imposed on —horror of horrors—manufactured food, if I may call it that. Much of our import bill for food is for manufactured food, and the profits made by the leading supermarkets come from manufactured food. I am sure it would be possible to devise a 5 or 6 per cent. tax on fuel and no tax on the other items.

That is my attempt at rewriting the whole of the tax system. I am sure that it falls on stony ground so far as the Chief Secretary is concerned, and I do not really know about my hon. Friends. It is not fashionable these days to attack or say anything about the mammon of finance and taxation. It is something that politicians on the Front Benches are not allowed to touch, but we on the Back Benches are responsible fellows and allowed to be radical —and that is how I would like to see our taxation system.

5.15 pm

Mr. Andrew Bowden (Brighton, Kemptown): During the past 15 years, we have seen the general trend of taxation move from direct to indirect taxation. I would not argue with that principle or trend—because it increases personal choice and is no disincentive to earners—but, if they pursue that path, the Government have a responsibility to certain sections of our community. If the Government impose that amount of VAT upon domestic fuel, some sections of our community will be hit particularly hard. Therefore, in furthering this trend of indirect taxation—with my support—the Government should look carefully at one or two groups who are on the lowest incomes.

No one likes paying taxes; no one supports any increases because it is going to make them popular—it is going to do the opposite—but it is hypocritical for any politician or political party to continually demand more and more expenditure without saying where the Government of the day are to find the money to meet those bills.

A group whom I feel the Government must consider very carefully in relation to VAT on domestic fuel are the retired people of this nation, some 10 million to 11 million pensioners. Within that group there are two sections of special concern. There are some 700,000 pensioners who could be drawing income support but, for one reason or another, are not. They really are living—indeed existing —on the very lowest of low incomes. There are also about 2·5 million people who have very small incomes, only slightly over and above the income support rate. They are not eligible for income support and they too will face significant hardship as a result of VAT on domestic fuel.

I know that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his colleagues are still considering the best way in which to help pensioners. I would like to make one or two practical suggestions to them—but first, perhaps, I should give a little more background.

Single pensioners spend between £8 and £9 per week on fuel and heating. Married couples spend between £10 and £11 a week on fuel. In the context of VAT at 8 per cent., that represents approximately 70p a week for a single pensioner and 85p a week for a married pensioner.

Those figures will seem very small to a very large number of people throughout the country. To many people, less than £1 a week is neither here nor there, but it is very much an item for the 700,000 pensioners who do not draw income support but who could do so and for the 2 million to 3 million pensioners who have a very small income over and above support rates.

We should also consider this section of the community from a different angle. We are talking about first world war and second world war pensioners, men and women, who were unable to earn large salaries or wages and who found it very difficult to save any money, but often did so. We are talking about a generation of people who are self reliant and responsible and who think in terms of service to others, not just of themselves all the time. Most of them adhere to standards and principles—loyalty, integrity and duty—which to some may seem a bit out of fashion. We owe a very great debt to that group of people, who saw this country through those two enormous conflicts.

My right hon. Friend may say that he understands the points that I am making but that there are a considerable number of pensioners who can pay VAT on fuel without any great hardship. I accept that. There are pensioners —an increasing number—who pay 40 per cent. tax and a significant number who pay 25 or 20 per cent. tax, but we have to balance that number against the two groups I mentioned earlier—the 700,000 who could claim income support but who do not and the 2 million to 3 million who have only a few pounds a week over and above income support level.

Therefore, I ask my right hon. Friend and his colleagues to think hard, when they review pensions expenditure and look at the figures for uprating the basic pension, to be announced in October or November, about increasing the basic pension uprating to meet entirely the cost of VAT on fuel. There would be a considerable clawback through the tax system. It would be efficient and effective to operate, and the administrative cost would be limited; the uprating would be part of the overall increase in pensions which will come about anyhow because of the increase in the retail prices index.

I have done some research into this, and I know that the difference in cost between compensating pensioners through income-related benefits—which the Government have already clearly said that they are thinking about and that they will do, although they have not yet announced the exact details—or through the state pension would be only about £150 million. I can almost hear some of my colleagues say, "Only £150 million!" I remind the House that this is a section of the community to whom the nation owes a great debt. Therefore, I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench to think long and hard about the pensioners of our country.

Mrs. Roche: I sympathise with many of the points made by the hon. Gentleman. Does he agree that one of the other difficulties that face those pensioners is that many of them may, through no fault of their own, have inefficient methods of heating their homes, and that many studies also show that the homes of many pensioner households are not well insulated? I should be grateful for the hon. Gentleman's comments.

Mr. Bowden: During the past 10 years there has been a considerable number of schemes—certainly in my Brighton constituency, where there are about 20,000 retired people, many of them on low incomes—to help people to insulate roofs and double-glaze windows. One wants money to be found for that work to carry on. Although a great deal has been done, I agree that much more needs to be done in the years ahead.

To return to the debt that we owe this group of people, as the vast majority have only limited savings and were often unable to buy their own homes, they face the worst of all worlds. There can be no doubt that a significant section of retired people have not shared in the increase, proportionately, in the standard of living that the vast majority of us have enjoyed during the past 10 to 15 years. All of them moved forward, to a point, but it was this section of our community that benefited the least. I ask my right hon. Friend to consider that point.

I am conscious that many hon. Members in all parts of the House wish to speak, but before I sit down I shall say a word about petroleum revenue tax, an issue that has already been referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts). When making these changes, we have to be careful not to build in a disincentive to explore even further the potential health of the North sea. There is strong evidence that it is only the very large oil companies that will gain from and welcome the changes and that the amount of revenue that they will produce for my right hon. Friend and his Treasury colleagues will be limited.

My worry is that the proposals will kill the incentive for medium-sized and small companies to follow a programme of aggressive, continuing exploration. We know that there is still a considerable amount of oil to be obtained from the North sea, not least on the basis of existing estimates. I do not claim to be an oil industry expert, but it is amazing that we have found over the years that, as fast as the world uses up oil, estimated oil reserves continue to increase rather than decrease, so it must be to our advantage, as a nation, to obtain every barrel of oil that we can from the North sea.

There is a serious danger that investment in the United Kingdom oil industry will be reduced by the proposed changes and that there will be loss of jobs and damage to the economy. Reduced investment could even bring about the premature demise of activities in the North sea.

I hope that my right hon. Friend does not think that I have been too negative. In conclusion, therefore, I shall say that, on the whole, I believe that the Budget is fundamentally sound. It will have my support. It is stimulating the recovery, and it will increase confidence. The nation will see the benefits of this Budget in the years to come.

5.29 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I hope that the Chief Secretary and his colleagues have listened to and will heed what the hon. Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Mr. Bowden) said about the impact of value added tax on pensioners, and his practical suggestions about an alternative way of solving the difficulty that the Government have created. I will deal with those suggestions later.

The debate has at least broken new ground. It is the first occasion that I can recall of a Minister addressing the House while holding his nose. It is usually a signal used when the person speaking wishes to express his distaste for what he has to say. It is the sort of thing that our former colleague Mr. Alan Clark used to manage to convey without actually holding his nose when reading out passages of Government policy that were distasteful to him. I think that there were parts of the Chief Secretary's speech that he could have read out while holding his nose for the same reason, rather than that which led him to do so on this occasion.

I do not suppose that I could persuade the Chief Secretary to feel real distaste for some of the policy decisions in the Budget and the Finance Bill, which I shall criticise later, but he might at least have held his nose when he said that the Government had a clear monetary policy and a clear medium-term financial strategy. Those two statements cannot conceivably stand up, and I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman must recognise that in his more serious moments.

We have had some welcome signs of recovery today, and one or two others in recent weeks. That has led Ministers into the sort of enthusiasm that might usually have been reserved for their own birthdays when they were much younger. There are signs that we are clambering out of the hole into which the Government pushed us, only to be greeted as we clamber out by the Prime Minister and the Chancellor standing with folded arms, saying, "Well, haven't we done well to get you out of that hole?" It is not very encouraging.

The signs mean that we should now apply ourselves to ensuring that we have a sustainable recovery—there is as yet no evidence that we have a sustainable recovery on hand—and that we do not return to some of the problems which got us so deep into recession in the first place. An appropriate corrective to an excess of enthusiasm is to be found in what I refer to as the "agreed parts" of the Treasury Select Committee's report published today.

There are some good parts at the beginning and the end of the report, which benefited from being especially heavily influenced by the Labour and Liberal Democrat members of the Committee, but which, unfortunately, did not command the support of the Conservatives. They are part of the report, they won the vote and they are a sound critique of the dishonest character of the Conservative's strategy at the election. In the agreed parts—those supported by all members or, in one case, by all but one—there are several issues of which the Government should take particular note.

The Select Committee warns of the continuing problem of high unemployment, which is likely to remain high, and of our very serious balance of payments position, which is almost inexplicably high for a country which has been in recession for such a long time. It also warns of the dangers of the public sector borrowing requirement which will still be £30 billion in four years' time, even if we have 2 per cent. growth, which not everybody believes. When Ministers rush to claim that 0·6 per cent. growth is wonderful news, they should bear in mind the fact that we have to achieve 2 per cent. growth to keep the PSBR at £30 billion. That is frightening.

The same report warns of the problem of not having a clear and satisfactory long-term policy to control inflation. It also points out that, if we are to have a genuine option to join European monetary union, we must prepare for it in advance. With the exception of one member of the Select Committee who was clearly not in favour of EMU, the Committee argued that we need to make progress on that and to have a regular review of progress if Britain is to have the genuine option of taking part in EMU. If it happens and we are out of it, that will be to our detriment.

It is also worth noting that the Finance Bill is an enormous document, certainly one of the largest that I have seen in many years of dealing with Finance Bills. It conjures up horrific prospects for our new procedure when we shall be considering the Finance Bill and Government expenditure in the autumn and shall probably have only the Christmas period for the country and the affected parts of the community to digest another probably quite large Bill. It should cause us to consider more carefully how we handle finance legislation, especially because some parts of it are wholly unexpected and cover aspects about which it would have been possible to consult widely before they appeared in the Bill. Again, I shall deal with some of them in a moment.

The Bill has 211 clauses and 23 schedules, which implement the largest every peacetime tax increase, proposed by a Government elected on a boast of record tax cuts and a promise of low taxes. I am entitled to say that, because I am speaking on behalf of a party which said that it might, in some circumstances, increase taxes. Indeed, we said that, given the opportunity, we would increase the tax on petrol, but we set out precisely how we would do it and what needed to be done with the money.

We said that if there were to be significant increases in the tax on petrol—and our proposals were lower than those which the Government are now introducing—there would have to be expenditure on public transport and compensation mechanisms for people in rural areas who are more dependent on motor cars. The party that said that our proposals were outrageous and that no one should vote for a candidate who would contemplate increasing the petrol tax has now suggested larger increases, without the compensation that we believe would be necessary. The tax will bear heavily on people in rural areas who are more dependent on the car, but they will receive no compensatory benefit.

Nor has there been any progress on one idea with which the Government were toying—road pricing in urban areas—which might have allowed a more effective transfer of costs and use of the fiscal system to discourage the use of the motor car where it can be avoided and where it is most environmentally damaging.

Domestic fuel is another instance of an issue on which the Conservatives purported to be against any increases. They ridiculed our proposals for an energy tax, which were directed at distinguishing between that which pollutes and that which does not. One of my criticisms of the use of VAT as an allegedly environmental measure is that it draws no distinction between the generation of electricity by oil, coal and nuclear power on the one hand and generation by wind or tidal power on the other. The same rate of tax is to be applied on all methods of generation.

The measure takes no account of the fact that poorer households spend a large portion of their income on fuel. The 1991 family expenditure survey showed that the poorest 20 per cent. spent 11 per cent. of their total income on fuel, whereas the average figure was only 5 per cent., and that the richest portion of the population spent only 3 per cent. of their income on fuel. The measure bears most heavily on the poorest, on pensioners, on tenants whose housing energy efficiency is not under their control, on families with children, on people with chronic sickness and disability, and on those in the colder parts of the country, such as Scotland and the north. It will also affect charities especially badly.

The proposal is not a sensible way of meeting the Government's alleged objective of using the tax system for environmental purposes. In practice, that is not what the Government were about. As the Treasury Select Committee concluded in its report, it was primarily a revenue-raising measure, and that is what the Chancellor said when he explained it to the Committee. He said that he first had to bear in mind the need to raise revenue. Indeed, if it were a more effective energy efficiency measure, and if it bore on the more elastic section of energy demand, it would not have the revenue-producing value which the Government derive from the measure.

It is because the measure is targeted at people who have the least choice about energy use that the Government hope it will produce large amounts of revenue, as it appears likely to do. It is not a genuine environmental tax and is not accompanied by adequate compensation or other measures to help those most affected. The hon. Member for Kemptown spoke of the particular problems of the large group of people just above the benefit level. Very often, they have saved a little, but certainly not enough to enable them to compensate for the effects of the new tax.

Income tax is another case of the Government raising taxation having said that they would not do so. One will look through the Bill in vain for a direct mention of an income tax increase. It is hidden away in a national insurance increase which is the worst, sneakiest and least fair way of increasing income tax. It hits directly those on the lowest incomes, but does not affect higher levels of income, perks or investment income. It has no effect at all on a whole range of income.

Mr. Butterfill: I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will not have overlooked the fact that the freezing of thresholds and the disallowance of certain reliefs, as well as the reduction of relief to a 20 per cent. rate, will bear disproportionately heavily on those paying higher rate tax.

Mr. Beith: Yes, but although I am in favour of some of the adjustments of relief, they offer no compensation to people on lower incomes who bear the burden of disproportionately high rates of tax. That applies particularly to those who are being targeted because the increase is a national insurance increase. The increase has taken the form of a national insurance increase not primarily because it will have that bad effect—that is a consequence of it, rather than the reason for it—but because that will enable the Government to obtain the revenue that they would obtain from an increase in income tax without breaking the pledge, which they made in terms, that they would not increase income tax.

The Government now say, "We are simply adjusting the contributions to the national insurance fund to take account of a deficit in that fund." That is nonsense, and everyone knows that it is nonsense. The fund simply does not work that way. Moreover, a moment after he had used the alibi of a deficit in the fund to explain what is in fact a 1p tax increase, the Chancellor admitted that he would in any case be leaving the fund £2·8 billion in the red. In no sense are we talking about a careful actuarial balancing of the national insurance fund. We are talking about a disguised income tax increase, of the kind we shall probably see more of in future, as the Government find it necessary to increase taxes because of the public spending gap, but do not want to do so by formally increasing income tax.

The provisions affecting petroleum revenue tax have also caused considerable controversy. The Liberal Democrats felt so unhappy about that aspect of the Bill that, with the Scottish and Welsh nationalists, we voted against the relevant Budget resolution. On that occasion, we were not accompanied by the Labour party, but concern has now spread more widely among Labour and Conservative Members alike that what the Government are doing on PRT seems likely to tilt the balance away from exploration and against the smaller companies in the oil sector and in favour of the more rapid depletion of existing oil wells—the part of the oil sector that has already been explored. Clearly, unless some changes are made, that will have a severe impact on jobs. We have requested, and are to have, a debate on the Floor of the House on the main principles of the changes in PRT, and I expect that there will be a considerable amount of more detailed debate in Committee, too.

The Government seem also to have acted strangely—unless one assesses the provisions merely in terms of how much revenue they will raise—in introducing the provisions for advance corporation tax. I feel particularly aggrieved about that, as I was one of those who complained to the Government about surplus advance corporation tax—the amount that companies with substantial overseas activities pay in advance, to the detriment of their profitability, their shareholders and, ultimately, their employees.

What the Government have done has not solved that problem, although it has eased it slightly. The Government have gone out to consultation on surplus corporation tax. Meanwhile, they have simply taken the opportunity to rake in a great deal of revenue at the expense of pension funds, charities and all sorts of other bodies which were not consulted at all. The principle of consultation is being applied to the measure for which there was the most urgent demand, yet the Government have brought out of a hat a whole range of measures affecting a large proportion of the population through their pension funds and their investments, on which there has been no consultation at all.

It is a bit like taking one's car into the garage to get a particular repair effected and coming back at the end of the day to be given a bill for the addition to the car of innumerable extras—and probably various other bills for work elsewhere—and told that the original repair has not been done. I am sure that hon. Members have had that experience. Those at the garage say, "All the other things that we have done may help a little with your steering problem, but we haven't actually been able to repair it." That is what the Government have done in respect of advance corporation tax, and we shall need to consider the matter carefully in Committee.

Overall, charities will feel very aggrieved, because although there are improvements in respect of, for example, gift aid for which we asked, and a little on payroll giving, no attention has been paid to the anomaly of the charities' liability for VAT, to their problems with that or to the considerable addition to those problems that will be made by heating VAT, which will cost charities enormous amounts. Barnardo's estimates that £122,000 will be added to its heating bill, while Methodist Homes for the Aged expects its figure to be £143,000. Those are frightening figures for charities struggling in difficult circumstances to help people. Again, the Government's proposals will need to be examined carefully in Committee.

This is a Finance Bill to raise the taxes that the Conservatives said they would not need and would not raise. It clearly and directly breaks election promises by the Prime Minister. It is a Finance Bill to pay for the continuation of the recession, which the Conservatives said would end as soon as the polls were closed and they were elected. Moreover, It hands the bill for the Government's failure to those sections of the community least able to afford it.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): I shall try to be brief, in view of the number of hon. Members who wish to speak. I agree with the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) that this is a long Bill, consisting, as it does, of 211 clauses and 23 schedules. Further to the comments that I made on Report last year, I hope that the Financial Secretary will tell us when he replies to the debate that the Bill will be no longer than that at the end of its passage through Parliament.

I shall concentrate on an important feature of the Bill—its relationship to what used to be known as the tax avoidance industry. It was in the 1960s and, in particular in the 1970s, under the last Labour Government, that that industry flourished to such an extent that, arguably, we became the tax avoidance capital of the world. People came from all over the place to go to the plush surgeries in the Harley street area or just off Oxford street to see their tax doctors. While they waited, they would pick up not a decaying copy of Punch but that day's copy of the Financial Times or The Wall Street Journal. They would buy at vast prices a scheme to avoid income tax, corporation tax, capital gains tax, estate duty, inheritance tax or even—jokingly—the dog licence.

This Government, with the assistance of some major court decisions, succeeded in killing off that industry. One of the major advances in tax legislation in recent years has been the extent to which a trend which, during the 1970s, appeared irreversible—that every time the Government announced a tax change, the highly paid brains in the industry would immedfately find ways of getting round it —has been stopped. That is to the Government's credit.

Many people argued that the principal reason why that trend was stopped was that the tax avoidance industry had been bred of high rates of taxation and that, once the Government had brought down rates of taxation, the need for the industry disappeared. Until recently, that could have been argued. In the past couple of years, however, there have been worrying signs that tax avoidance has started again. It is to the credit of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor that, in the Budget and the Bill, he has taken early and severe steps to knock the re-emergent industry on the head.

I do not think that the re-emergence of the tax avoidance practices that were prevalent under the last Labour Government and before that would be to anyone's benefit. The fact that the present Bill contains so many measures designed to combat—in some cases, effectively, although I shall draw attention to one or two provisions which I feel could be strengthened—the latest outbreak of the industry is wholly to the credit of the Government, the Chancellor and the Treasury team.

Large parts of the Bill are devoted to combating tax avoidance: clauses 61 to 66, 81, 84, 88, 111, 112, 116, 117 and 188 all deal with individual aspects of tax avoidance. But those clauses are not the only way in which the Government are bringing steady pressure to bear. As was announced at the time of the Budget, there are other measures which are not in the Bill that are designed to deal with tax avoidance. For example, provisions in Customs and Excise press release No. 28 of 1993 deal with the growing practice of claiming VAT input tax relief on non-business supplies.

As a member of the Public Accounts Committee, I was delighted to learn in a recent evidence session with Customs and Excise that it is considering setting up a specialised unit to deal with the avoidance of VAT and other customs duties just as, to combat the excesses of the tax avoidance industry in the early 1980s, the Inland Revenue had to set up a special anti-avoidance unit which, in the end, was very successful.

While I welcome the Government's work to combat tax avoidance, I hope that they will not rest on their laurels. There is already evidence since the Budget that the Government may not have gone far enough. One of the Government's disadvantages in combating major and organised tax avoidance is that the organisation extends to ensuring that the Government do not find out about the tax avoidance until the last minute. I remember that, during the 1970s, many tax avoidance schemes were sold on the basis that timing the submission of the accounts or returns concerned was left in the hands of the organisers of the tax avoidance so that as little information as possible reached the Government as late as possible.

Clause 111 relates to a particular area of tax avoidance bashing. The clause deals with business expansion scheme relief and its abuse. As the clause is drafted, there is at least a risk that the Government have allowed through a considerable measure of tax avoidance which has not yet taken place.

Clause 111 deals, as I have said, with the abuse of business expansion scheme relief occurring through what is known as the non-recourse loan, under which someone makes a business expansion scheme investment, which is perfectly laudable, and then effectively sells that investment six months later in such a way that it is not caught by the legislation.

A great deal of that kind of investment occurred right up to Budget day. A recent article in The Times suggested that, in the tax year just ended, about £800 million was invested in business expansion schemes with the intention of taking advantage of what was then a loophole. The tax at risk was therefore a maximum of £320 million.

As clause 111 is drafted, most of that tax relief will still be available by actions that might be taken by the taxpayers concerned until September this year. In Committee or on Report, I will try to assist the Government to claw back even more of that tax relief, which was never intended by the legislation and which is still available to the Government to claw back.

That particular abuse, the non-recourse loan which is effectively a sale by another name, does not just extend to business expansion relief. It can also be applied to capital gains tax to enable a capital gain to be taken now, but declared when the gain is exempt from tax. In Committee or on Report, we may have to consider the extent to which that tax loophole needs to be closed in relation to business expansion scheme relief and capital gains tax.

Those abuses are examples of areas where it is the duty of hon. Members to assist the Government to achieve their objectives. No one in the country can benefit if we once again become the proprietors of a tax system under which the principal beneficiaries are lawyers and accountants rather than the Government. I hope that we will be able to ensure on a non-party basis that the measures that the Government have taken laudably in the Bill can be extended and made even more effective.

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): It is a good custom, and helpful to the House, that we discuss the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee report with the Second Reading of the Finance Bill. I will refer to the Select Committee report, because I believe that that would be useful to the House.

In response to the comments of other hon. Members, I want to make two brief points. I agree that the VAT extension to domestic fuel will have a severe impact on many communities, particularly in Scotland and the north, where the weather is most difficult. We made that point in the Select Committee report. In addition, that tax was introduced primarily for fiscal rather than environmental reasons. That point was supported by all hon. Members in the Select Committee report.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): The hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) could have included Northern Ireland in his comments. Does he accept that the average weekly income in Northern Ireland is 76 per cent. of that in the rest of the United Kingdom, but fuel bills there are currently £3·50 more than in the rest of the United Kingdom? Under the new VAT changes, they will be £4 more.

Mr. Radice: The hon. Gentleman is right, and we could have mentioned Northern Ireland. His point bears out what we said in the Select Committee report. The Government should bear that point in mind.

As part of the background to the debate, the Government have made much of the signs of recovery in the economy. Certainly, output is at last showing some signs of growth. There have been improvements in high street sales, and there has been some slight stirring in the housing market. All that is welcome, and a mild recovery may be in progress. However, if the American experience is anything to go by, it cannot be taken for granted yet.

Before the recovery is heralded as a great British triumph, however—I fear that the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer have not avoided that temptation, and the Chief Secretary to the Treasury went down that path earlier today—it is important to put this into context. After all, the signs of growth follow 10 quarters of falling or stagnant output, which is the longest recession of this century.

There has been a loss of £21 billion of output and there has been a sharp rise in unemployment as 1·3 million jobs have been lost. In addition, our public sector borrowing requirement has gone sharply into deficit, and will be £50 billion in the coming year, as a consequence of the increase in unemployment and falling tax revenues. We should bear that in mind.

We must also bear in mind the fact that it is a very British recession. The recession was caused by the mistakes of the Conservative Government. We must not forget the Lawson boom of 1977-78 and the over-expansion. Let us not forget the one-club policy that followed. Let us not forget that the economy was clobbered with high interest rates at the end of 1988. We suffered a long period of historically high interest rates.

I must point out that the exchange rate mechanism is not the main reason for our recession. We should remember that we had two years of high interest rates before we entered the ERM. We should also remember that we joined at too high a level in October 1990—as some of us said at the time. In addition, we were able to bring interest rates down until October 1991.

The unification of Germany made interest rates too high throughout the whole of Europe. Of course, that put strain on the ERM, and eventually we were forced out of it. I agree with the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Mr. Legg) that our withdrawal from the ERM enabled us to reduce interest rates and devalue the pound. That has provided a sizeable stimulus to the economy. If there had not been some recovery after all that, I do not know what could have been done to improve the prospects of the British economy.

The problem is—this is the background to the Finance Bill—that any recovery will meet considerable difficulties. We underlined some of those difficulties in the Select Committee report, including the huge public sector borrowing requirement that we inherited. It is extremely difficult to bring down that requirement in any satisfactory way without aborting recovery at the same time. That is what the Government have tried to do in their sleight of hand when they promised tax increases, but not yet. That is a great difficulty, and we do not know whether the strategy will succeed.

We have a tremendous problem with the balance of payments deficit. Even in recession, we have a large balance of payments deficit. We should remind ourselves that we have a current account deficit of 2 per cent. of gross national product in the trough of a large and deep recession, compared with a 2·6 per cent. surplus in the trough of the 1981 recession. That is a worrying comparison. If I were responsible for running the British economy, it certainly would worry me.

It is all very well to say that we can continue to finance our balance of payments deficit—we have said that for a long time. The question that must be asked is whether we can continue to finance the balance of payments deficit at this level indefinitely. That is what has been put before the House in the Finance Bill.

We must then ask ourselves how much damage the recession has done to the economy. We have a high level of unemployment, which will be difficult to bring down. As we have discovered, it can choke the recovery by affecting confidence. We know that many business men have put off investment decisions during this period. It may well be that that has reduced the productive potential of the economy: we do not know yet. Certainly, that must concern Ministers as they try to bring about recovery.

Another problem is the fact that there is a recession in Europe. Those of us who thought that, with one bound, Jack was free, do not understand what has happened to our economy and how closely it is tied to what happens in the European Community. Sixty per cent. of our trade is with Europe. If there is a recession in Europe, or if there are high interest rates in Europe, they affect us. We should not believe that we can escape from what happens in Europe: we cannot.

We cannot have a short-lived consumer boom because we would immediately run into considerable difficulties and recovery would be choked. Recovery must be export-led and investment-led. It must be accompanied by measures to tackle the long-term weakness of the British economy which are well known to all hon. Members. We all know about the problems with education and training and investment in manufacturing industry, but we have not yet done enough about them. There is little in the Finance Bill to tackle those problems.

I must mention the position of the Chancellor—this matter is referred to in the Select Committee report. The Finance Bill contains a long-term taxation policy. We need a long-term policy to tackle the structural problems of the economy. Apparently, the policy will be sustained by a Chancellor who has used up his political credit. He has given us a false prospectus on the public sector borrowing requirement. Before the election, he told us that the public sector borrowing requirement in the coming year would be £32 billion. In fact, it will be £50 billion, as we pointed out in our report. That is the biggest single most glaring prediction made by the Government.

The Chancellor said that we would never devalue, yet we were forced to do so. We have devalued by well over 10 per cent.—it is nearer 15 per cent. During the general election, the Chancellor said that the Government would never increase taxes, yet the Finance Bill proposes an extension of VAT and increases in national insurance.

It is not surprising that the right hon. Gentleman, according to Gallup, is the most unpopular Chancellor this century. City experts have no confidence in him. Last week, the leader in the Financial Times said that he should be replaced. Those hon. Members on the Select Committee who said that the Prime Minister should replace the Chancellor were not being irresponsible—it is simply plain common sense, and we are absolutely right.

I do not lightly say that Chancellors should resign. Indeed, in 20 years in Parliament, I have called on only one Chancellor to resign—the present one. I genuinely believe that the best contribution that this Chancellor can make to recovery would be to make way for another Chancellor who would inspire more confidence.

6.5 pm

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): I am a little surprised by the remarks of the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice). Clearly, when one is debating economics, one turns to attacking personalities when one cannot win the argument with economic arguments—that does not do any good in the House. The hon. Gentleman has a nerve to blame this Government for the length of the recession, the drop in output and the loss in employment when he and his party, last summer, advocated a policy of staying in the exchange rate mechanism without any change in parity. Undoubtedly, such a policy would continue to force the United Kingdom into deeper recession. If we had left the ERM a year earlier, much of the loss in output, many of the lost jobs and many of the businesses that went bankrupt would not have suffered that fate.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned that Europe is in recession. Is not Europe in recession because of the ERM? Why is France, with a low inflation rate and a balance of payments that is fairly satisfactory, forced to have very high real interest rates that are driving the country deeper into recession? It is because of its membership of the ERM.

Mr. Radice: The hon. Gentleman knows that, at the time we joined the ERM, I said that we went in at the wrong time for the wrong reasons and at the wrong rate. He has heard me say that in the House, so he cannot include me in any strictures. It is no good attacking me or my party; we were not in government. The Conservative party was in government and sustained that specific policy. The Conservative Government did not seek to devalue the pound within the ERM, as they were perfectly entitled so to do.

Mr. Townend: Yet the Labour party demanded that we go back into the ERM within seven days of withdrawing from it. The hon. Gentleman's arguments would be much more convincing if he had agreed with us when we pointed out the damage that membership of the ERM was doing to our economy. Of course, he did not agree.

As I said in the Budget debate, there is much in the Finance Bill to be welcomed. I shall make a relatively short speech and restrict my remarks to one subject—the time bomb that is ticking away under the Government's financial policy. If that time bomb is not defused, it could not only destroy the Government's electoral prospects but do long-term damage to the British economy.

I speak, of course, of the twin deficits: the budget deficit and the complementary balance of payments deficit. I appreciate that there is no automatic correlation between the two deficits, but undoubtedly Government spending on the European Community, overseas aid and defence contribute to both deficits. It is generally true that, when a country has a large budget deficit, it usually has a large trade deficit.

In the Budget, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor started to defuse that time bomb by announcing tax increases which will increase to £10 billion a year by 1995-96. I strongly support the overall strategy in the Budget. It would have been a mistake to increase taxes this year because that could have snuffed out the recovery for which we have waited so long.

However, even taking the tax increases into account, the deficit in 1995-96 will still be no less than £39 billion, or 5·5 per cent. of gross domestic product. According to the Red Book, the deficit will still be £30 billion by 1997-98. That is without allowing for any slippage in expenditure. If one looks back at the track record of the Government and, indeed, every Government, one finds that in most years spending plans are exceeded.

The danger of slippage is borne out by the recent announcement of the March figures for the public sector borrowing requirement, which were no less than £9·5 billion. That was the highest deficit recorded in one month, and it emphasises the seriousness of the situation. The PSBR was £1·5 billion more than was estimated only a few weeks ago in the Budget, as the hon. Member for Durham, North said. So the Red Book figure of £35 billion for the current year has been increased to no less than £36·5 billion.

That rise in such a short period is disappointing, especially when one considers that the unemployment figures fell in February and March. That should have reduced the upward pressure on the social security budget. It is particularly worrying because expenditure in March was £23·3 billion—30 per cent. more than the expenditure in the same month last year.

In looking for the reason for the increase in spending, one significant factor is that spending Departments are completely ignoring the horrendous budget deficit we face. As usual, and as those of us who have served in local government or the health service know, towards the end of the year there is a bonanza of spending so that the Department can spend every penny of its budget and nothing goes back to the Treasury to reduce the deficit.

The Prime Minister needs to read the Riot Act to the Departments that have acted in that way. The size of the deficit, which is based on the plans in this year's Red Book, is unsustainable if we want a healthy economy. We are piling up debt which will have to be paid by our children and grandchildren. The cost of rising debt interest is cumulative. It builds up at a frightening rate.

The increase in the PSBR is set out in the Red Book for the six years to 1997-98. As has been said, it includes the benefits of increased growth of GDP. That increase is no less than £233 billion. With long-term interest rates at about 8·5 per cent., that builds up to an extra interest cost of no less than £20 billion a year. Do hon. Members realise the significance of extra spending on debt interest of £20 billion a year? It is equivalent to about 14p on the standard rate of income tax, or getting on for 8·5 per cent. on the rate of VAT.

The size of the borrowing that the Government will have to undertake and finance is so great that it is extremely unlikely that, over a period, they will be able to keep long-term interest rates down to 8·5 per cent. If that occurred, the cost would be even greater. If the Government are successful—I am sure they will be—in keeping inflation down, the real cost of interest on that debt will become unbearable. The speed of the deterioration can be illustrated by the ratio of net public sector debt to GDP, which in the Red Book will increase from 27·25 per cent. in 1991 to almost 50 per cent. of GDP by 1998.

I say to the House and to my right hon. Friends on the Front Bench that, having started to deal with the time bomb by announcing tax increases, it is vital that the Chancellor completes the job this year by tackling spending. He will be unable to achieve the necessary results without the unstinting and overwhelming support of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, who should spell out to the Cabinet that he will not preside over a Government who put Britain deeper and deeper into debt and that he will not put taxes up and up to pay for extra spending and debt reduction. He should tell the Cabinet that the problem will have to be dealt with by spending cuts large enough at least to match the tax increases already announced.

I hope that the latest disappointing figure for the PSBR in March will convince our spending Ministers how serious the position is. I strongly support my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury in his important task. Indeed, the future of the Government and the economy of Britain depend on his success. What he will have to recommend will be painful, but it will be even more painful if we shirk taking tough decisions necessary for both the country and the long-term survival of our party in government.

Cuts will have to be made across the board. There must be no sacred cows. May I make a few suggestions? We were successful in reducing manpower in the public sector, but it is beginning to rise again. I suggest that the Government should look at the example of the privatised industries, in which efficiency has risen, overmanning has been eliminated, and the work force has been significantly reduced. If the public sector—the Government, the civil service and local government—could achieve only half the reduction in manpower that companies such as British Telecommunications, PowerGen, National Power and British Gas have achieved, the number of those employed would fall significantly and billions of pounds would be saved.

We can no longer continue to make so many of our benefits universal regardless of income. We must consider whether we can afford to keep troops in Germany and spend £2 billion a year in overseas aid. Should we not reduce public spending in Scotland, Ireland and Wales to the level of spending per head in England? Are we dealing with young offenders cost-effectively when it costs £100,000 each? Are we dealing with the mentally handicapped and disabled who have been decanted from our long-stay hospitals into the community, when costs can reach £80,000 per year per patient?

Can we continue to achieve savings and economies through computerisation and modern management methods but spend those savings in expanding the services of our Departments? Should not a significant proportion be clawed back to help to pay for the large budget deficit?

I worry whether the Goverment have the backbone to tackle the problems of expenditure. Their record over the past four years does not give one confidence, especially after the most recent spending round. If they funk or fudge the issue, however, we shall see upward pressure on interest rates as the funding of billions of pounds of debt becomes more difficult, and we will face further tax increases in the run-up to the general election.

What worries me even more is that political pressures may prevent us from reducing expenditure or putting up taxation, so creating a great incentive to reduce the excessive burden and cost of debt by letting inflation rise. Given what we have suffered and what we have achieved under the Government, that would be an absolute tragedy. Compared with the long-term disastrous effects of that, the option of short-term pain caused by cutting expenditure must be preferred.

The Chancellor is right to be pleased with the economic recovery and, at a time when we are seeing the results of his economic policy, it was churlish of Opposition Members to make personal attacks against him and to demand his resignation. The Chancellor must reaffirm this success, however, with a commitment to cut spending and reduce the deficit by at least £10 billion by 1996. He should be assured, however, of my full support and, I am sure, that of my hon. Friends.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): I shall not follow the speech of the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) in detail, except to say that I thought that some of his proposed remedies for dealing with the Government's problems with their spending targets beggared belief. Perhaps he should reflect on what he said when he reads his speech in the cold light of day. In effect, he said that the mentally and physically handicapped should remain in institutions rather than lead a decent life outside in the community, because it was cheaper to keep them in those institutions.

Mr. John Townend: I asked whether a charge of £80,000 per person was cost-effective. I suggested that we should consider a more cost-effective means of treating such people.

Mr. Hughes: The hon. Gentleman has confirmed what I said—what matters to him is cost-effectiveness, not the dignity and life style of people who happen to be born mentally or physically handicapped.

The Chief Secretary, in between doing a bad impersonation of Pinocchio and Inspector Clouseau, had one odd moment of candour. He admitted that the Government's approach to the Budget and the Finance Bill were dictated by their difficulties with their spending plans and borrowing requirements. They, above all else, are the engine behind the Bill and the Budget—they are designed to deal with the Government's budgetary problems.

What the Chief Secretary did not admit—I rather suspected that he would not—was that many of the Government's problems are of their own making. They have failed to do anything to reverse the decline in our manufacturing sector, the economic base on which we depend. They let manufacturing go for years and years, and now they are reaping the whirlwind.

The Government have always said that they would never take the easy way out and would never borrow simply to meet their costs. The Government have done just that, however, because they have raised taxation in such a way as to make it appear that taxes have not been increased. VAT on domestic fuel will be phased in over two years, in the hope that people will forget all about it.

The Government's idea has always been that one should reduce direct taxation and increase indirect taxation, based on the dubious theory that, by reducing the former, people have more money in their pockets and can choose what to spend it on. In other words, less direct taxation means that people have more disposable income which they can spend on items of their choice.

By that test, however, the imposition of VAT on domestic fuel bills is an abject failure. People cannot choose whether to use electric lights, whether to eat hot or cold food or whether to heat their homes. I am not sure whether my next statement should be prefaced by an apology to the President of the Board of Trade or an acknowledgement to him, but VAT on domestic fuel means taxation before, during and after breakfast; taxation before, during and after lunch; taxation before, during and after dinner—in fact taxation for every hour, every minute and every second of the day, whether one is awake or asleep.

The decision to put VAT on fuel bills is a national disgrace. It is regressive taxation of the worst kind because it will bear most heavily on the lower income groups in our society. The VAT is also applied to the standing charges, which are themselves an imposition on the lower-paid.

It has already been acknowledged that the poor in our society spend a much higher proportion of their income on heating costs and domestic fuel bills. What is worse, the colder the part of the country, the greater the fuel bill and the greater the tax that one must pay. That is disgraceful. A great deal has been said about the possibility of a recompense for those on state benefits to help them meet the additional costs. It is clear, however, that the Government have not committed themselves to full compensation.

Even if that were done, there are many thousands, if not millions, of people, just beyond state benefits, who are on low incomes and will receive no help from the state. That is compounded by the fact that, this year, the Government have set a rigid maximum pay increase for public sector workers of 1·5 per cent. Without any changes caused by VAT on fuel bills or increases in national insurance contributions, that 1·5 per cent. increase is a pay cut and a cut in living standards.

The Government have tried to put up a smoke screen over the imposition of VAT with the paper-thin pretence that it has something to do with the Rio summit and global warming. That shows that the Government hold public opinion in contempt. They believe that, if they say something to people often enough and long enough, the people will accept it as the gospel truth.

If there were a connection between the Rio summit, global warming and VAT on domestic fuel, a large proportion, if not all, of the revenue that the Government will raise would be spent on methods of energy saving. The Government could do something to protect houses from heat loss and on the more effective use of fuel in the homes. But we have not heard a word about that from the Chancellor, the Chief Secretary or any other Minister. No mention has been made of using that revenue to offset global warming and to save energy.

When the VAT change was announced in the Budget, I wrote to the Secretary of State for Scotland. I acknowledged that the change could not make any difference to the public expenditure programmes for this year, but I asked him what plans he had for an emergency campaign to promote energy saving in the home. I got a nice one-and-a-half page letter in response telling me everything that the Government had done in 14 years, but, in essence, his response was that there would be no expansion in such energy-saving programmes. Let there be no mistake: the Government's decision is based purely on revenue generation. They should be honest enough to admit that and should strip away all the excuses.

The other major item in the Bill is the change to petroleum revenue tax and its effect on North sea operations. What was so sinister and ominous about the Chief Secretary's speech was the fact that he said nothing about PRT. When the idea was first mooted, however, much concern was expressed and all sorts of grandiose promises were made by Government Back Benchers about their intention to speak about it to the Chancellor, the Chief Secretary, other Ministers at the Treasury and those at the Department of Trade and Industry. Yet not a single word comes from the Chief Secretary.

There is an old saying, which I am sure you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker: "Act in haste, repent at leisure." That is exactly what the Government have done. They have acted in haste, but, unfortunately, they show no signs of repenting at leisure. I am glad that at least the hon. Member for Slough (Mr. Watts), the Chairman of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service, said that something would have to be done soon, and that we could not wait until the November statement if there were to be any changes.

The Government, desperately casting around for increased revenue, decided to alter the tax regime without thinking it through. We know that there was no consultation with the industry. We know that there was no consultation with the Department of Trade and Industry, which has privately told journalists that it was horrified and that it knew nothing about the changes until they were sprung on it. It is more than that. The changes in the tax regime clearly show the folly of subsuming the Department of Energy in the Department of Trade and Industry, of losing the Department of Energy as a separate Department and of losing the Department's place at the Cabinet table. That was no accident.

The Government decided, with the privatisation of the electricity industry and of gas, to abandon all thought of an energy policy. They believed that the market could simply take care of itself and of our energy needs. The error of that belief is shown clearly in the still unresolved debacle of the coal industry. All that shows that the decision to downgrade the importance of the Department of Energy was short-sightedness of monumental proportions. It is yet another example of the short-termism which has been the hallmark of this Administration throughout their existence.

They are a Government whose rule is based on sloganistic rhetoric and whose actions are often in direct contrast to their spoken word. I am tired, for example, of hearing every Minister say—we heard some of this today from the Chief Secretary—that the Government want small industry to flourish and smaller companies to grow. The Government say that they are not simply looking after big business, but that they need smaller companies as well.

In the various licensing rounds in the North sea, much has been said about the need to involve smaller oil companies. One of the conditions of the licensing rounds is how many small companies are involved. Licence conditions are also attached to exploration. I concede that there is merit in diversification—in not having all one's eggs in one basket—yet the Government, in their frantic search for revenue, have ignored the effects of the petroleum revenue tax changes on smaller companies, and especially on exploration and development.

It is probably inevitable that there are winners and losers in any tax change and that is certainly true in this case. The larger companies with proven, established production wells will benefit greatly. The big companies will get windfall profits, which will be very beneficial to them. The Government's defence, which I have heard repeated elsewhere, is that the extra windfall profits going to the large companies will release money which they can then spend on exploration. It is the age-old trickle-down theory. The trouble is that there is no guarantee that the substantial extra funds will be spent in the North sea. There are other parts of the world where exploration and development will be far cheaper and those are often areas where there is a more benevolent tax regime. That is where the money is likely to go.

It is right that we should encourage companies to do more to extract every bit of oil from existing fields. We should all applaud that. However, if we do not have a repletion policy or a renewal policy as the reserves are depleted, we shall lose in the long run in terms of energy production and future Government revenue, which will fall.

The Government's defence so far—I am surprised that they have been so silent about the whole thing—is that the transitional effects will take care of the immediate future. That is not what the oil companies tell me. One company told me that it is capitalised at £75 million. It will not gain from the changes in the PRT. As a result of the removal of relief, it will have to pay an extra £2 million to £4 million a year in taxes over the next few years. That is money which has been earmarked for exploration in the North sea in fulfilment of the company's drilling obligations to the Government. The companies believe that they cannot simply walk away from those obligations. They are not simply a moral responsibility. The companies argue that the obligations are legally binding and that they cannot get out of them.

The companies accept that some changes are necessary. They accept that there might have to be a maximum allowance to be offset, which would benefit the small companies more than it would the large companies. There is great concern about the job losses that will follow if the Government do not change their mind. Estimates vary. In one of the mysterious, off-the-record briefings which are not supposed to happen, the Department of Trade and Industry has conceded that the Treasury is willing to accept 10,000 job losses. That is no small number. Others say that that figure is too low.

I believe that the estimates of 40,000 to 50,000 are probably too high. However, we cannot afford any more job losses in the industry. Already there is job-shedding in Aberdeen. I know that it is difficult for hon. Members to become excited about job losses in Aberdeen and I concede that Aberdeen has done well out of the oil industry, as has the surrounding area. However, Aberdeen is not immune from recession, and we are already feeling the draught.

The PRT changes have caused confusion among Government Back Benchers, to the extent that they are spreading disinformation in Aberdeen. I am told by prominent members of the oil industry in Aberdeen that unnamed Government Back Benchers—I might be able to name them if pressed—[HON. MEMBERS: "Name them."] They are all sitting quietly looking glum, so we can draw our own conclusions.

Mr. George Kynoch (Kincardine and Deeside): As a Government Back Bencher who represents a constituency which is heavily involved in North sea oil, I ask the hon. Gentleman to accept that there is a major problem in the oil industry. He has quoted one individual company which is worse off as a result of the PRT changes. However, the oil industry has pressed for a long time for a reduction in PRT. The problem is that the companies reacted quickly immediately after the Budget. They have now reviewed their position, and they see that, in the long term, the PRT changes are clearly in their best interests. I might have some sympathy for the hon. Gentleman if he addressed his comments to a smooth transition to the new lower tax regime with lower tax allowances.

Mr. Hughes: It is a great pity that the hon. Gentleman has just come in, and has not heard the rest of the debate. If he had heard it, he would have heard the point made not only by Opposition Members, but by Conservative Back-Bench Members, including the hon. Member for Slough, the Chairman of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service. He said simply that the transitional relief was not good enough and that in the long run, the industry would be worse off.

Mr. Kynoch rose——

Mr. Hughes: The hon. Gentleman will have to learn to take it as well as dish it out. I can understand his embarrassment. Within a few days of the changes, he issued an optimistic press statement to The Press and Journal in Aberdeen. He said that he had been to see the Chancellor who had said, "It is all right, old boy. We shall have a look at this and review it." In an optimistic frame of mind, the hon. Gentleman, during Prime Minister's Question Time, said that he was concerned about the changes. He seems to be all over the place.

The hon. Gentleman seems to be beginning to defend the Government; previously, he suggested that the Government had it wrong. I expected the Prime Minister to tell one of his own Back Benchers something along the lines, "I know that my hon. Friend the Minister has been engaged in discussions on this. We will take another look at it." Instead, the Prime Minister slapped him down.

I was talking about Conservative Back Benchers spreading disinformation around Aberdeen. I could offer many more examples of companies that will be on the wrong side of the tax change. A prominent member of the oil industry in Aberdeen phoned me in a panic to say that Conservative Back Benchers had told him that the prospects of achieving changes in the tax regime had been badly affected because of the activities of Labour Members. He told me that he had been told that, if Labour Members table amendments, the Government will dig in their heels and refuse to budge—so it will be our fault if the Government make no changes.

That is unadulterated twaddle. We shall certainly table amendments; if the Government want to table their own, they can do so. They can pass their own amendments if they want to. So let us hear no more of this nonsense: our tabling of amendments will not prevent the Government from tabling theirs. If we do not table any, the Government will be delighted. There will then be no debate on the details; they will rush the measure through, saying that everything in the garden is rosy.

Mr. Salmond: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman has heard a slightly different version of a similar story? An oil company told me that Conservative Back Benchers had suggested that I should stop pushing for a debate on the Floor of the House on this matter, because that would act as a disincentive for the Government to make concessions of the sort for which the hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Kynoch) has been pushing for so long.

Mr. Hughes: I know that Conservative Back Benchers are running like mad for cover, but I understand that the Opposition decided to take these matters on the Floor of the House for debate. Indeed, we will be happy to debate them there.

I fear that the Government have decided to ride out the storm, to steamroller through their proposals and to hope that their Scottish Back Benchers, and others, will fall into line. I should remind the House that not only Aberdeen and its surrounding areas will be hit by the job losses. Many people from all over the United Kingdom work in the oil industry, so almost every constituency, not just mine, will be hit. The effects will be all the greater in my area, however.

I doubt whether the Government will see sense. They will not be moved in the least by unemployment. Certainly, Ministers go north and make platitudinous, banal statements about how awful unemployment is, but they take no action.

Nothing in the Budget furthers our manufacturing industry or tackles the problems of unemployment. The Government have failed yet again, and I do not believe that they will be forgiven this time.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): It is a sad reflection on the priorities of certain people in this place that no representative of the Liberal party is present. Perhaps Liberal Members are all too busy trying to persuade the electors of Newbury that they would be good at managing the economy. In any event, they are obviously too busy to participate in what is possibly the most important debate in the House at this time of year.

The one representative of the Liberal party who did grace us with his presence seemed to suffer an uncharacteristic attack of hyperbole when he referred to the black hole of depression into which the Government had got the country. I assume that he is unaware that the recession in the United States was a good deal deeper than ours. He may also be aware that most other western economies are still going into recession while we are coming out of it. In Germany and France it is deepening every day.

The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) overlooked the fact that we have been coming out of the recession, it now appears, since last June, whereas other countries have been moving into more severe recession. That is a result of the policies that this Government have been pursuing for some time—long-term policies to improve the productivity and competitiveness of British industry. Those policies are reinforced by the measures in the Bill.

I welcome the freezing in real terms of business rates. That is important to many of my constituents and to many small businesses throughout the country. I am also gratified that the Chancellor has doubled the threshold for stamp duty on house sales. That has contributed in no small measure to the recovery in the housing market.

For some time we have pursued policies to assist those involved in exports. The Bill increases the Exports Credits Guarantee Department cover, which is another contribution to the fact that our exports are at record levels.

I take a keen interest in the insurance industry, so I was particularly pleased to see the measures that my right hon. Friend proposed for improving the reserves of British insurance companies—for allowing them to retain more in those reserves. One of the elements that has held back British insurance companies from competing with their overseas, particularly their EC, counterparts, has been their inability to put into reserve as great a proportion of their gross premium income as their competitors have done, so they have not been able to build up to the financial strength of their competitors, particularly those in Germany.

I join many other speakers who have expressed their regret about the way in which the Government have arranged PRT affairs. Small companies face a particular difficulty here. I have been approached by a large number of them, explaining the difficulties that the Government's proposals will create for them. The whole industry, however, thinks that the change away from PRT is the right way to go. The difficulty comes with the transitional arrangements, as proposed. They pose a problem for small companies, especially those that have not placed the contracts with their contractors for work that they are obliged to carry out.

We must press the Government on the question of the licence obligation expenditure. There is no doubt that those who bid for licences did so on the assumption that they would be able to offset that expenditure against tax. I believe that Treasury officials have suggested that these are not contractual obligations—a view not taken by Department of Trade and Industry officials. I and other members of the Trade and Industry Select Committee will press the President of the Board of Trade on that subject when he comes before us tomorrow.

I hope that the Government will think about the possibility of phasing in the transitional arrangements in a fiscally neutral way by phasing the PRT changes at the same time. In that way we could achieve the objective in a short space of time and be fair to the companies that have undertaken these obligations. If we leave things as they are, those companies will be retrospectively disadvantaged. If the Bill is given a Second Reading, I propose to table a probing amendment that would have this effect and would maintain fiscal neutrality. The PSBR is at an all-time high and must be addressed by increasing taxation and, I hope, by reducing expenditure.

The Government could have increased income tax or alternatively corporation tax or they could have extended VAT and they chose the right option. An increase in personal taxation would have been a major disincentive at a time when we want the economy to continue to recover.

We must remember that much of the recovery has come from the unincorporated sector which undertakes considerable capital investment. If it was subjected to high marginal rates of taxation it would have to look at the risk-reward ratio and would be likely to take the view that the risk was not worth the net reward. Similarly, an increase in corporation tax would have given the wrong signal to the business community and would have been a disincentive to those who have been responsible for so much beneficial inward investment. An extension of VAT was the right approach, and it will not be anything like as harmful as some Opposition Members suggest.

There has been much discussion about the predicament of the elderly. As hon. Members know, my constituency probably has as many elderly people as almost any other, if not more. The damage that an extension of VAT might do to such people has been greatly exaggerated. Benefits will be uprated fully to compensate for the additional costs.

I share the concern of my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Mr. Bowden), who is not in his place. He made a powerful speech about those whose income from other sources takes them just above the benefit threshold and who feel that they may be uniquely disadvantaged by the proposal. They should consider the Budget package as a whole and look at the impact of the reduction in the lower rates of taxation from 25 to 20 per cent.

Over the two years in which VAT on electricity will be phased in, the rate reduction will also be introduced. It will mean that someone who pays just £1,000 a year in tax will save about £1 a week by the end of the second year. It is estimated that that is about half what the average elderly person will pay as a result of VAT on electricity.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): Does my hon. Friend agree that people should reasonably and rightly take into account not only his point but the fact that utility prices generally have been falling? For example, since the privatisation of British Gas, domestic gas prices have fallen by 20 per cent. in real terms. People should set that against the potential imposition of VAT to reach a balance and see exactly how their finances will be affected.

Mr. Butterfill: With his usual sagacity, my hon. Friend has anticipated me. In my constituency alone, Southern Electricity is reducing its prices in money terms by 2·5 per cent. in the coming year. That is in addition to the reductions about which my hon. Friend speaks. The matter must be viewed in the context of falling electricity prices as a result of privatisation.

Although elderly people have greater need of heat, they tend to live in much smaller homes—certainly in my constituency—than the average family. Pensions will be uprated by the average of the retail prices index, which will tend to be somewhat higher than the increased cost of heating their homes. As a result of the tax changes and the RPI indexation of pensions, some of my pensioner constituents may be better off as a result of the Chancellor's changes.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): The hon. Gentleman speaks about older people living in smaller houses. Does he agree that many elderly people live in badly insulated houses and that one of the best ways to help them reduce heating bills and save energy is to invest in home insulation?

Mr. Butterfill: I agree that some elderly people live in badly insulated houses. However, in recent years the Government have funded substantial programmes for insulation. Many elderly people in my constituency live in modern or warden-assisted flats which are exceptionally well insulated. People in such small units of accommodation will probably be better off as a result of the changes. I accept that it may be a minority, but it is a growing minority.

The Government are right to raise revenue at present. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) that the corollary is the worrying level of the PSBR and the need to reduce Government expenditure. I hope that the Chief Secretary will conduct his review robustly and vigorously. It is easy to say that there must be more public expenditure. We are used to such calls from the Opposition, but they are not prepared to take the painful decisions that arise from funding such expenditure. Usually, they fudge the issue when they are in power and create enormous taxation. The Government have not been prepared to fudge it and I hope that they never will be.

If there is a need for increased taxation, we should face it, however unpopular it may be, because at the end of the day we have some political integrity. [Interruption.] Opposition Members laugh, but when they were in power they did not display that same degree of integrity. Perhaps that is why they lost the last three general elections. The public have rumbled them.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): How much of what the hon. Gentleman says was in his address at the general election?

Mr. Butterfill: I have consistently advocated the need to maintain a curb on public expenditure and to increase taxes when it has been necessary to do so. I do not believe in borrowing and I have said publicly time after time that it is immoral to mortgage the future of our young people and future generations. Today we must earn what we spend. What distinguishes us from the Opposition is that they are never prepared to do that.

Mr. Brown: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Butterfill: No. I must conclude my speech.

The Budget is admirable and well suited to the prevailing economic conditions. It shows that our measures over the past two years are beginning to bear fruit because our economy is coming out of recession faster than most other western countries. If we maintain a curb on public spending we shall continue to prosper at a greater rate than those economies.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South-East): The hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) spoke about cuts in public expenditure and accused us of wanting to increase it. Over the past 14 years, and even in those years which, according to the Government's definition, were good years, there were major cuts in public expenditure. Therefore, the argument is not about vast increases in public expenditure but, as it has been over the past 14 years, about maintaining certain levels of public expenditure. Nobody is advocating hefty increases in public expenditure but, even in the good years when there has been no necessity to make cuts in public expenditure, the Government have seen fit to impose vast cuts. I have said before, but it is worth saying again, that Coventry city council has lost £200 million over the past 10 years, and that included the good years of the Tory Government.

Mr. Butterfill: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cunningham: No, not at this stage.

Mr. Butterfill: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on this point?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Cunningham) has made it clear that he will not give way.

Mr. Cunningham: Tory Members have used the events of 1976, when we had a Labour Government, in support of their arguments. However, they omit the facts. What happened in 1976 was the aftermath of the three-day week imposed by a Tory Government, and inflation in the United States was running between 26 and 28 per cent. Those factors worked their way into the British economy but are ignored by Tory Members now.

The nearest parallel to the events of 1976 were the events of September last year. In a roundabout way, the bankers, the money lenders or the Government creditors —whatever language one wants to use—were telling the Government that they wanted them to put their house in order, put the economy in order and start paying off some of the debts incurred before September. We must look at the Budget against that economic background.

Mr. Butterfill: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cunningham: No.

Another major factor that must be taken into consideration when we look at the future and at the Budget is the balance of payments problem. In a recent interview the Prime Minister, when asked what he was going to do about that problem, said that he would think about it. That is no substitute for an economic strategy. My fear about the Budget is that, although we have seen one or two green shoots, 18 months down the road we may find ourselves in another economic crisis because the Government have failed to take measures to deal with the balance of payments problem. That problem will not go away, and it will come back to haunt the Government.

The Government's strategy on VAT has been disguised. Because they have set their face against massive direct tax increases, they will use increases in VAT to fund their borrowing and debt requirements, and they will extend it to other goods and services beyond fuel.

Mr. Butterfill: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cunningham: I have said that I will not give way. I want to limit my speech as much as possible so as to allow others to speak.

Mr. Butterfill: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. Gentleman sure that it is a point of order?

Mr. Butterfill: Yes, Madam Deputy Speaker. I know that you are anxious to protect the reputation of hon. Members. In my speech, I referred to the increase in public expenditure. As the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Cunningham) said that there had been no such increase, he was implicitly saying that what I said was untrue. He knows that there have been substantial increases in public expenditure under the Government. Therefore, I hope that you will defend the integrity of hon. Members and allow them to redress comments made by Opposition Members.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is very ingenious, but it is a point of substance, not a point of order.

Mr. Cunningham: I can answer that last point. I said that the real argument was about maintaining levels of public expenditure against a background of cuts.

To return to the subject of VAT, one could live with the Budget——

Mr. Butterfill: I was right. Public expenditure has increased in real terms every year.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I recall that the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) is keen on points of order. Let me tell him that it is not in order to make seated interventions.

Mr. Cunningham: The fundamental question about VAT that the Government have not answered, although it has been repeatedly put to them, is whether the people affected by increases in VAT—pensioners, single-parent families, needy families and those on low incomes—will receive full recompense for those increases. All that the Government have given us on that is nods and winks.

There is nothing in the Budget about the provision of crèche facilities to allow one-parent families to retain a bit of dignity and get employment or training where necessary. There is nothing for women. In particular, nothing addresses the social problem of battered wives. The Budget could have introduced measures to encourage better voluntary services to deal with such issues. Many voluntary organisations do valuable social work among the ethnic communities, unemployed young people and others, but the imposition of VAT on such charities would impose a tremendous burden on them.

We should welcome any measures in the Budget aimed at reducing unemployment and helping small businesses. However, there is no recognition of the heavy costs for industry of research and development. The directors of large firms all say that they badly need Government assistance in that sector.

When trying to judge the Budget in social terms, we must look at the other side of the coin. A cost will have to be paid for the lack of measures to ensure safer inner cities. Safer city projects and urban aid grants are being phased out in Coventry, even though they play a tremendous part in dealing with some of the inner-city problems of cities such as mine. There has been no attempt to deal with education, with proper training for young people or with providing a proper education service. Outside the Budget, but in a way still part of it, is the confrontation between the Government and the teachers. The Government should be conciliatory and sit down with the teaching profession, parents' organisations and all other interested parties to try to resolve the frictions in education.

The Budget was a golden opportunity to help industry. If Britain is to retain a role in Europe as a major industrial power, it has to restore its manufacturing base, but that can be done only with co-operation between the interested parties and organisations which play a part in the maintenance of the manufacturing base. I am disappointed with the Budget. For the sake of the unemployed, I hope that it will succeed, but I am worried that 18 months down the road the erosion of our manufacturing base will continue and we shall still have a major balance of payments problem, when all those problems should be addressed now.

Mr. Matthew Carrington (Fulham): The real test of the Bill is the effect that it will have on, and the help that it will give to, the recovery of our economy. The purpose of the Finance Bill is to ensure that the groundwork is laid to encourage the recovery that is now so apparent in our economy.

We heard from my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury that the last three quarters have shown growth in our economy. That is greatly to be welcomed because it supports, in a concrete form, with statistics from the Central Statistical Office, the anecdotal evidence, which has been clear all around us for some time, of how economic activity is picking up.

Let me give one example of that from my constituency. House prices have started to go up, houses are starting to sell and activity among estate agents and surveyors is starting to pick up.

My constituency, which is in inner London, has been badly affected by the recession. Some of the measures in the Bill designed to help house purchase, such as the raising of the stamp duty threshold, will have relatively little effect on the average house purchase in inner London. Therefore, it is good that anecdotal signs of recovery are beginning to become apparent in statistics. The economy is now poised for a period of fairly rapid economic growth.

Of course, it is not enough simply to help economic growth through the Finance Bill; external factors are also necessary. The USA economy needs to recover from recession, and there are now unmistakable signs that its growth rate is recovering and that the USA will come out of its recession strongly. That will help our exports. Indeed, our exports to non-EC countries have risen by 12 per cent. over the past year, which shows the effect that the USA economy has on our economy and exports.

Most important of all is what happens in Germany and other EC countries, whose economies are already in recession and heading into even deeper recession. We need to encourage our European partners to take the measures necessary to come out of recession. One of those measures is a reduction in German interest rates, which are now being cut month by month. Those cuts affect the strength of the deutschmark, which has been far too strong, to the disadvantage of other EC countries. As the deutschmark weakens, that will do nothing but good to all our economies.

Britain already has a great deal in place to facilitate our recovery, such as lower interest rates——

Mr. Salmond: At what stage of the recovery would Britain have been in if the Prime Minister and the Chancellor had had their wish and kept Britain within the exchange rate mechanism at the rates previously set? What is the hon. Gentleman's estimate of how that would have impacted on economic recovery?

Mr. Carrington: The hon. Gentleman has asked me to support something that I have never supported—our position inside the ERM. I always felt that the mechanism was not sustainable and would break apart, for the very reasons that eventually caused that to happen. I was pleased when Britain left the ERM, although I am sure that we would all have wished that to happen under different circumstances.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East): The hon. Gentleman is singing in his bath.

Mr. Carrington: If the hon. Gentleman had ever heard me sing, he would welcome the fact that I do not sing in the bath.

Britain's low interest rates are now having the desired effect on our economy, and our competitive exchange rate is beneficial to business recovery. However, we need to be concerned about the level of interest rates. Given the nature of the housing market and of housing finance, if interest rates are too low, the market will take off again, just as it did in the 1980s. None of us wants that.

I hope that the Government will bear in mind the need to keep relatively high interest rates. I was glad to note that Ministers have said that they believe that the current level of interest rates is about right for the economy. I strongly support that view.

The problem in our economy is one of timing. Most of the elements necessary for recovery are now in place, but we must wait patiently for the reduction in interest rates and the competitive exchange rate to work through. That will result in a stronger economic, industrial and commercial base.

The other problem is the public sector borrowing requirement, with all the inflationary pressures that that causes, and the great danger it poses to the health of the economy in the short and medium terms. I am glad that the Government have taken steps to ensure that, first, there is nothing in the Budget to damage the recovery; and secondly, that the right signals are given to ensure that people understand that the Government take seriously the need to reduce the PSBR. That is in everybody's interest.

There are three ways to reduce the PSBR. One is economic growth, and I hope that growth will be even faster than projected in the Red Book, so that the PSBR will be reduced even faster. The second way is to keep public sector spending under tight control. It must be more efficient and targeted more effectively, so that the taxes raised are used to produce the greatest benefits for those in need.

The third way, which is regrettable but necessary, is to raise taxation. The measures to do so contained in the Bill are, sadly, inevitable but correct. It is also right that, by and large, they will not impact this year—the big increases in taxation have been deferred until the recovery has gained a proper foothold. Industry needs to build up its strength before the imposition of the increased taxation necessary to reduce the PSBR. The measures will start to bite next year and the year after.

No tax increase is ever popular. The Government had a choice, and they correctly chose to increase two taxes. First, there is to be an increase in the national insurance contribution, which is another form of direct taxation. The extra revenue from that will impact directly on the increasing burden of the social security budget. It is right to increase that form of taxation——

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley): The hon. Gentleman did not say that during the election.

Mr. Carrington: During the election, the economic problems in the world generally were not envisaged to be as great as they have proved to be subsequently. It was always implied that Britain had to come out of recession, and that if it continued for longer than expected, the Government—indeed, any Government—would have to take whatever measures were necessary to correct the imbalances in the economy.

The other tax to be increased is VAT, through its extension to domestic fuel. When coming out of a recession, it is right to increase indirect rather than direct taxes, because an increase in direct taxes has a direct effect on people's incentive to work. In general, people see what they get in their pay packet as the reason for working, so it would be wrong to affect that position through an increase in direct taxation.

The imposition of VAT on domestic fuel has another benefit. As my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary said, as well as reducing the PSBR, it will help to meet Britain's commitments under the Rio convention. The extension of VAT will assist the environment and is to be greatly welcomed. To some extent, it reverses the reduction in the real costs of domestic fuel under privatisation during the past few years. I believe that most people will be able to tolerate that increased tax, even if they do not welcome it.

Many people will find, however, that change painful and hard to afford. I look forward to measures in the autumn to make certain that those hardest hit by the imposition of VAT on domestic fuel will receive assistance with paying their bills. The most vulnerable will be those whose incomes are just above income support level, whom the present scheme does not assist. They must be given help in overcoming the substantial burden that they will be asked to bear.

The Bill's provisions are needed in our present economy. It does relatively little in the current year, which is right at this stage in our economic recovery, but sends all the right signals, to the markets in particular, that the Government are determined to reduce the massive public sector borrowing requirement, and take that task seriously.

This year, we have the advantage of another Budget in November. Having seen how the recovery shapes up over the next few months, I hope that, in November, the Government will reconsider some of their Budget decisions, will think hard on whether they are the right measures at that time, and will take whatever further steps are necessary in November—possibly even increasing taxation more—to ensure that the PSBR comes down and that the recession continues apace—I mean, that recovery from the recession continues apace.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): The hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) made a slip at the end of his speech, but at least he did not make the same mistake as the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill), who described borrowing as immoral. If the hon. Gentleman holds to that view, he must fear for the future of the Treasury team in the after-life, because its members are some of the biggest borrowers of all time.

Mr. Butterfill: The hon. Gentleman completely misinterprets my remarks. I said that it was immoral to build up borrowing that has to be paid off by future generations. It is moral only if we pay it off ourselves.

Mr. Salmond: By either test, the Treasury team would stand condemned. The hon. Gentleman may not have studied the alarming PSBR statistics in the current Budget. I do not know what tax changes the hon. Gentleman would propose to get rid of that borrowing quickly. Also, if he studies the Good Book, he will find arguments that the lenders of money are also immoral—so perhaps there is no hope for any of us.

I will concentrate my remarks on petroleum revenue tax. Right hon. and hon. Members who attended the Budget debate will know that on that occasion I commented on the general shape of the Budget. No doubt the Treasury team has been poring over my remarks in the past few weeks. Tonight, I shall comment only on PRT changes.

For the Treasury team, there is a big difference between tonight's debate and that on the Budget. Those changes were not considered the most controversial in the Budget, and when it came to the vote—as the deputy leader of the Liberal Democrats pointed out earlier—only Scottish National, Liberal Democrat and Plaid Cymru Members moved against the PRT changes. There was no recognition at that stage of the general concern that is evident now in contributions from hon. Members on both sides of the House.

All but three of the right hon. and hon. Members who have spoken so far made reference to PRT changes. I hope that the Treasury team is fully aware that if the issue were put to the test again—one hopes that it will be in Committee—the Government will not have anything close to the 264 majority that they managed to clock up when that measure was tested at the end of the Budget debate. There is general recognition now of the implications of the PRT changes.

I will examine the Government's three arguments for those changes, to test whether there is anything to be said for them. The Government argue, "We can't continue PRT as it now is because it has become a negative tax." In 1991-92, it actually cost the Exchequer £200 million. The Government say that it is ridiculous to retain the present form of PRT.

There are three contrary points to that argument. In 1991-92, the picture was much affected by what was, one hopes, the one-off Piper Alpha disaster and the tax treatment of the insurance claims that followed—so it seems unfair to pick that year as representative. In that year also, oil taxation as a whole was not negative, but raised more than £1,000 million for the Treasury.

Because PRT is a profit-related tax, it is sensitive to oil prices. When oil prices are high—they have been for long periods of Conservative Government—one would expect the Treasury to draw in vast sums from a profit-related tax such as PRT. Conversely, when oil prices are relatively weak, one would expect the PRT return to be relatively modest. A wise Government and Treasury would take the rough with the smooth. I did not hear any member of the Treasury Bench complaining, when oil prices were high and the Treasury was raking in up to £14 billion—as much as £20 billion per year at current prices—about the nature of the PRT system. At a time when oil prices remain relatively modest, the Treasury should accept a low tax take as an investment in the North sea's future profitability.

Petroleum revenue tax is sensitive also to development and exploration levels. It is mistakenly thought by many people, particularly in the Treasury, that the North sea is a declining oil province, but that is not the case. By no measure could the North sea be fairly described as an oil province in decline. On the contrary, oil and gas production levels are increasing and are expected to peak in 1996 or 1997.

The Minister for Energy himself stated in a Department of Trade and Industry press release dated 27 January:

"While the overall level of exploration and appraisal drilling fell last year—not surprising in difficult times of low oil prices and record levels of expenditure on field developments—such activity continued to bring home results. Better than one well in four proved to be a discovery. Historically, since drilling began in the North Sea, the ratio has been roughly one in five."

In other words, the current strike rate is better than the historical average. One well in four is successful in terms of a hydrocarbon accumulation being found. Although it is true that accumulations found today are smaller than before, by no standard for qualifying or judging an oil province can it be said that the North sea is a province in decline.

Therefore, it is an act of ultimate folly to devise a tax system that benefits continued production from existing accumulations at the expense of discouraging the exploration of future accumulations, when the statistics give every indication that such explorations would be very beneficial and productive. The Government's argument that the PRT was not doing its job is far from proven.

The second argument deployed by Treasury Ministers since the Budget is, "What's the point of giving money to international oil companies? Why should anyone support that prospectus?" But one consequence of the Government's tax changes is that certain, highly selective oil companies will be given lots of money.

There is something highly incestuous about the way in which some companies have commented on the changes. British Petroleum representatives said that they are wonderful, but given that BP is one of the companies, because of its production profile, that stands to benefit by tens or even hundreds of millions of pounds, it is hardly surprising that it is enthusiastic about them. Very few companies, if offered tens or hundreds of millions of pounds by the Treasury, would not say, "Yes, these are tremendously good tax changes."

For the Government then to cite BP's reaction as proof that the industry supports the Government's approach is at best disingenuous and, at worst, incestuous. The Government should be able to quote some independent advice to support the position that they have taken. Of course, that independent support would be very difficult to obtain at the present time.

The idea of winners and losers is very misleading. I hope that Treasury Ministers have studied the excellent letter in the Financial Times on 2 April from 10 managing directors of the smaller and highly active exploring companies in the North sea at the moment. A great deal of wisdom is found in that letter. The phrase that impressed me most was:

"Finally, the polarisation of companies into winners and losers is not really accurate. Almost any company can become a 'winner' by cutting UK exploration".

That is the fact of the matter in these oil tax changes. To be a winner under the fiscal regime proposed by the Treasury team, it is necessary only to stop exploring; it is easy to become a winner in terms of the tax changes.

Wood Mackenzie, the respected oil analysts, suspect that taxation windfall and gain that the Treasury anticipated from these changes will not come about because it has failed to understand the impact of these changes on behaviour. This is not just a matter of the petroleum revenue tax giving dollops of cash to international oil companies. It is a misunderstanding of who is going to feel the consequences of the oil tax changes. It will not be the international oil companies. If exploration in the North sea province becomes unattractive, they will move their exploration budget elsewhere in the world. It is an international industry and they can move their exploration activity to other oil provinces.

The people who will lose from the oil tax changes are not the international oil companies but the service companies and the workers in the North sea. Thousands of jobs are on the line as a result of these apparently ill-thought-out proposals in the Budget.

The third and final argument of the Treasury team is that the long-term tax regime being put forward for the North sea is very attractive and that international investment will be sucked in to take advantage of that tax regime. That is a fundamental misunderstanding. A tax regime that applies only a 33 per cent. corporation tax rate on an oil province is attractive in international terms—and would be looked upon as such—but very few people in the oil industry actually believe that, if there was a hike in oil prices, that tax regime would stay in place. What the Treasury is sowing in the current tax regime are the seeds of its own destruction; there will inevitably have to be further changes in the future.

We do not need a crystal ball to prove that point. All we need to do is look at the track record in the United Kingdom. One of the first acts of the present Conservative Government, when they came to office in 1979—facing a sharply increasing profile of oil prices—was to increase taxation in the North sea, as, indeed, any sensible Administration would have done at that time. They sharply increased the taxation regime that had been formulated by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). So a Conservative Government were increasing taxes set by one of the demons of the Labour Government.

No one in the oil industry believes that if we have a sharp increase in prices, as is quite likely towards the end of this decade, any Government would leave in place a 33 per cent. corporation tax rate pick-up from the North sea. Therefore, not even the incentive of a low tax regime is going to be effective in the impact of these overall tax changes. All three arguments put forward by the Government fall down very badly.

There are specific questions that I wish to ask because the Government, in written answers, have been carefully avoiding giving the information that many hon. Members require. We want to know if there was any consultation between the Treasury and the two Departments immediately concerned—the Department of Trade and Industry, responsible for energy policy, and the Scottish Office, which presently has some responsibility for the impact on employment north of the border.

As the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) said, the indication that has been creeping out from these closed briefings is that the DTI and the Scottish Office were not consulted; that this was a big shock and surprise to them. The best way to describe their reaction to these briefings is, "It wisnae me; somebody else is to blame. It was all the idea of the Treasury team."

It is an extraordinary prospect. Here is a tax change which is going to affect a minimum of perhaps 10,000 jobs north of the border and the Secretary of State for Scotland is allowing it to be known that he was not even consulted before the tax change was put in place.

One of my predecessors for the old East Aberdeenshire seat—Bob Boothby—perfectly described the position of the Secretary of State for Scotland as the "scullery maid" of the Cabinet. Here is a fine example of that reduced position if it is true that the Secretary of State for Scotland had no knowledge before the Budget of a tax change that put in jeopardy 10,000 jobs or more north of the border.

Mr. Robert Hughes: And all over the country.

Mr. Salmond: Of course, it is all over the country; I have developed that point.

The point that I am particularly making—I am sure the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North understands it—is that a Secretary of State who has a particular responsibility for Scottish industry and employment, according to the briefings that he is allowing people in his Department to give out, is indicating that he had no knowledge of this taxation change, which will have an enormous impact on Scotland.

These briefings are very curious. The Press and Journal is the local paper of many hon. Members in the north-east of Scotland and I think that everyone would accept that its coverage of this matter since the Budget has been first class in terms of the detailed examination it has given to the impact of the taxation changes. It reported—appropriately, on April fool's day, 1 April—the briefing given by a senior Treasury official. The direct quote from that briefing reads:

"For 10,000 (job losses) we are securing £400-£500 million a year in taxation."

When we heard the President of the Board of Trade and the Prime Minister last autumn—in a callous, indifferent, almost casual way—announce the impact of the coal closures in terms of the overall job losses and the impact that that would have on communities, and the furore, uproar and political controversy that followed, many of us thought then that the Government might have learnt their lesson. However, we see from the briefing by senior Treasury officials that 10,000 job losses are a price well worth paying so that the Treasury can achieve its objectives in terms of the overall shape of the oil industry taxation proposals.

I will conclude my remarks by focusing on the economy of the north-east of Scotland. The hon. Member for Aberdeen, North noted that many parts of our area have enjoyed a comparatively good time throughout the recession—although it has to be said that there are pockets in my constituency, in Moray and elsewhere, which have very high levels of unemployment—but it seems that the Government are determined to level out economic development throughout the country by making sure, just as the rest of the country is emerging from recession, that the north-east of Scotland is plunging into recession.

The key industries in our area—farming and fishing—are already experiencing difficulties. If oil, the third key pillar of the economy of the area, is plunged into major job catastrophe, as is threatened by these Budget proposals, we have a triple whammy being visited on the north-east of Scotland by the Conservative Government.

The big increases in taxation on petrol, the taxation increase which is threatened on domestic fuel, the prospect of people in the most energy-rich area in the whole of the European Community being unable to afford to turn on their electric fires, and these taxation increases on the oil industry, will have a very severe impact on the energy-producing areas of the country.

There are ways out of the mess that the Government have landed us all in. Suggestions have been put forward by, among others, Professor Alexander Kemp, the adviser to the former Select Committee on Energy. I hope that the Government have taken on board the measures suggested by Professor Kemp in his North sea study occasional paper No. 41. He suggests that we extend the transitional arrangements for relief in such a way as to avoid the effects on exploration.

Let me end on a cautionary note. I do not think that any Opposition Member will embark upon the fool's errand upon which the hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Kynoch) has apparently embarked. He has been told by the Treasury team that if only he, in Kincardine and Deeside, can think of some means of achieving the same results, in terms of Treasury revenue, by applying a different shape of taxation change, the Treasury team will be only too anxious to look at it. I am certain that it would. The Treasury's objectives have nothing to do with employment in the north-east of Scotland and elsewhere, but everything to do with the amount of money that it can grab from the North sea oil industry. I am certain that the Treasury would be glad to look at another way of getting an extra £700 million out of the North sea.

That, however, is not the issue that we wish to debate. We wish to debate whether the proposed taxation changes are sensible and whether they will have the impact that even the Treasury itself admits is possible in terms of the number of jobs lost. We do not want to embark upon finding another way for the Government to get an extra £700 million, thus damaging the North sea oil industry at a time when prices are not strong and when the industry needs investment for the future. I am confident that the Government will be forced to respond to the concern expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber as people come to understand the potential damage that will be done to the industry, in terms of the loss of tens of thousands of jobs. In Committee, we shall expect a climbdown by the Chancellor on this taxation proposal.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton): The 1993 Budget is different from Budgets of previous years, not least because of the economic background against which the Chancellor had to work—in particular, his need to address the public spending borrowing requirement problem. It has also set a new precedent, in that measures have been announced in this Budget not just for the forthcoming year but for future years. That is important. It is helpful when planning economic policy to be able to look further ahead than 12 months. The Chancellor has taken a bold initiative.

Many constraints were placed upon the Chancellor when he outlined his Budget. It was apparent that it would not be a giveaway Budget. I was pleased to be able to make representations to the Chancellor before he made his Budget statement and tell him that it was particularly important that the axe should not fall on the small business community. Many small business organisations—for example, the Forum for Private Business—have paid tribute to the way in which the Chancellor managed his Budget and allowed the small business sector the opportunity to grow and to increase the economic prosperity of this country, which we are now beginning to see.

I intend to draw attention to other matters, particularly those that affect people in my rural constituency of Tiverton in Devon. My hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Mr. Bowden) made a compelling case for the grievous impact that VAT on domestic fuel will have upon certain groups in the community. I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security has promised that those who are on means-tested benefits will be properly cared for in the autumn statement and that their benefits will be uplifted. There has also been a promise to take into account the impact of VAT on fuel in the retail prices index increase, which will also have an impact on other benefits, such as the state retirement pension.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kemptown referred to the fact that certain groups spend much more on domestic fuel than other groups. It is important that that should be recognised when benefits are uplifted. It would be impracticable to promise that everybody who is affected in this way will find that there is a mechanism for dealing with the increase, to the nearest penny, in fuel bills. Whatever averaging formula is used to measure the effect on fuel bills of VAT, account must be taken of the greater amount of fuel that is used by the elderly and the housebound.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kemptown made a strong case for the elderly. I agree with him. I attended a meeting of Tiverton Age Concern on Saturday last. When I entered the hall where the meeting took place, I was hit in the face by the heat. However, the temperature needed to be high because the elderly, the frail, those who are confined to wheelchairs or who are otherwise immobile feel the cold far more than those who are mobile.

Mrs. Roche: I have followed the hon. Lady's argument with great interest. The Institute for Fiscal Studies estimates that the poorest 10 per cent. spend 13·25 per cent. of their budget on fuel, compared with the richest decile, who spend only 3·46 per cent. of their budget on fuel. Does that not lead her to believe that this provision in the Finance Bill is completely wrong and will have a tremendously damaging impact upon those groups about whom she spoke so eloquently?

Mrs. Browning: I am grateful to the hon. Lady. She endorses my plea that due account should be taken of the fact that there are certain groups in society who necessarily have to use a lot of fuel because of their state of health or mobility.

I want also to draw my right hon. Friend's attention to those people who do not claim benefit. Reference has already been made to them. Some of them are on low wages. A high proportion of my Tiverton constituents earn less than the national average wage. Reference has also been made to pensioners who have only a little money in savings. Many of those people exercised thrift during their working lives in order to provide for a small private pension, or they have some savings. When the state retirement pension is uplifted in line with the retail prices index, there should be recognition of the true effect of VAT on fuel prices.

May I also ask my right hon. Friend to discuss with the Secretary of State for Social Security some of the non-means-tested allowances, for that will almost certainly bring into this category people who face high fuel costs? I refer, for example, to those in receipt of invalidity care allowance and disability living allowance. One ought to investigate how those people will be affected by this proposal.

It is important also to put on record my views on petroleum revenue tax. I fully understand why my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister committed this country at the Rio conference to reducing CO_2 emissions between now and the year 2005.

However, in my constituency—650 square miles of rural Devon—ownership of a car is vital. That is reflected in the latest census figures, which show that 81 per cent. of my constituents are car owners. In rural Devon, we do not use a car only for driving around to look at the beautiful scenery. It is essential that people have a car to get to work and for access to employment and training. It is also important for people who have to take children to school, to go shopping or to gain access to primary care facilities. They are all essential uses.

I can also think of many examples of elderly people who live independently in a rural community, and who find that their legs can no longer carry them to the village shop or the local doctor but are quite capable of driving a car. In those cases, the ownership or use of a car gives them continued independence and helps them to live in their own home for longer. The impact of such a tax on people in rural areas must be appreciated, especially as we are now implementing care in the community. If one considers the census figures, one sees immediately the difference between car ownership in rural constituencies and constituencies that are primarily urban.

I know that there is a strong argument for the tax in terms of the environmental impact of CO_2 emissions, but I draw to the House's attention information given to me by the Library. It shows that emissions in this country between 1990 and 2005 are forecast to rise by 19 per cent. That is the lowest forecast in the European Community, and compares with the forecast for Portugal of a rise of 63 per cent. and the average EC figure of 31 per cent.

I hope that such a pattern of taxation on environmental grounds will not continue in Budget after Budget, because it has a different effect on people in rural and urban areas. I suggest that we consider instead tax incentives involving cleaning up fuel and the motor car.

I realised that the Budget was not going to be a giveaway Budget. It would have been condemned as irresponsible and profligate by the Opposition, who criticise it now, had my right hon. Friend the Chancellor made it a giveaway Budget. The small business sector has welcomed the Budget, and I wish to draw attention to two aspects that are important to business and especially to manufacturing.

The first is capital taxation. The Chancellor has allowed those with more than a 5 per cent. interest in unquoted companies to roll over the gain if they purchase and move more than 5 per cent. into another company. I hope that that is the first of many measures to allow the transfer of interests between companies.

At the moment, there is no movement of capital, especially in the corporate sector affecting the smaller unlisted company. As the recession lifts, it is important that expanding companies can attract new investment, and I hope that the measure will be built on, as it is greatly needed in the small business sector.

Many hon. Members have mentioned the importance of manufacturing. In the autumn statement last year, the Chancellor allowed, for one year, 40 per cent. first-year capital allowances on an unrestricted sum. That year will be up by the time of the Budget in November, so, before my right hon. Friend makes a further announcement next autumn, I urge him not only to abolish the one-year break, which has been extremely helpful in lifting the economy and in bringing about the movement that we now see in business and manufacturing, but to take account of the fact that very small businesses find it extremely difficult to carry forward profit and capital to allow for periodic capital expenditures such as the purchase of a new vehicle, which they may make regularly every two or three years.

I do not ask my right hon. Friend to consider making it an unlimited tax benefit, but to consider putting a ceiling on it. Ideally, I should like a ceiling of £100,000 in any tax year, but I suppose that I could settle for £50,000 if he would consider that. In any event, it should be a 100 per cent. allowance, because the continuation of that allowance will be instrumental in helping small companies which now have increased orders on their books and which are looking forward to further growth.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): I apologise for not being here for much of the debate, Madam Deputy Speaker, but there was a meeting of the Public Accounts Committee which was considering the expenses of the Gulf war. However, I heard the Chief Secretary's opening remarks. I should have been especially interested to hear what he was going to devise as an economic reassessment following black Wednesday.

You may remember, Madam Deputy Speaker, that we were promised a reassessment shortly after black Wednesday, but that was seven months ago. The Budget was certainly not the reassessment of economic policy that we might have expected, so I thought that, even at this very late stage, we might have heard something from the Chief Secretary about it today, but we did not.

That day in September was very important. It was the day that Thatcherism came to an end; it was the day that the Government had to face the reality that an economic policy which had lasted for 11 or 12 years had finally run into the sand. It was when the Government realised that something had gone wrong, and their hopes, dreams and expectations that they had fundamentally changed this country's economic position were seen as the nonsense that they always were.

We all know that Governments make mistakes, but the striking feature of the 1980s was the combination of the scale of the mistake and the long period for which it persisted. The Government were incapable of learning from their errors. Part of the reason for the errors were the wonderful days of North sea oil, which replaced imported fuel. However, the revenue was dissipated in the consumer-led boom which eventually led to the problems and troubles of last year.

The folly was compounded by the belief that the myth of prosperity was the result of clever Conservative economics. That has all been washed away, along with the money that could have been used in the seven fat years to prepare for the seven years of famine, which have some way to run. Unfortunately, the Government believed that the windfall was proof of an economic miracle, but now we have to live with the reality for which we were unprepared. How are we responding?

I regret to say that the Government's economic policy does not make sense. The Government now regard success as getting people into shops to spend money, most of which will go on imported products. Our balance of payments deficit is bad enough, but such a move will increase it. The Red Book shows a 1·25 per cent. increase in gross domestic product for this year, together with the same increase in consumer expenditure. At the same time, the Government are levying value added tax on fuel.

I have a personal interest in VAT on fuel because, while I was Financial Secretary to the Treasury, we held the presidency and it was my lot to negotiate the sixth VAT directive. I argued that VAT was a progressive—or reasonably progressive—tax, but that it would be a regressive tax without zero rating. At a stroke, the removal of zero rating makes it a regressive tax. It is a tax on the poorest people, and the argument that we have been able to use in the Councils of Europe will not be available to us any more because we have conceded the principle that there is a need to retain it as a non-regressive tax. The Government are giving an open door to shoppers to spend their money before the tax comes into effect. That is not a sensible way to proceed.

The Government must produce a policy for the whole decade. There are long-term dangers because we have frittered away the benefits of previous years and must now be called to account. The £50 billion budget deficit and the £17·5 billion balance of payments deficit will take all those years to recover.

There are two ways in which the Government can proceed with an economic policy that makes some sort of sense. First, they can reduce the value of the pound and go for exports and the growth that comes from them, while increasing investment incentives. My proposals for the latter would be somewhat different from those of the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mrs. Browning). I do not think that they would apply to motor cars and I do not agree with the limit that the hon. Lady suggests. Nevertheless, the idea of substantial investment initiatives is a correct one.

We must give manufacturing industry something: we must reverse what happened to it throughout the 1980s. Even 100 per cent. allowances would not be as disastrous as our doing nothing. The 40 per cent. figure will have to be renegotiated this autumn and I expect that to continue, but the figure should really increase to 60, 70 or 80 per cent.—even 100 per cent. would not be impossible, as I said. That would rapidly have an effect. Education and training will take some time to get right; that will need to be done on a rather longer-term basis, but we must begin the long haul to economic viability. The need for that must be impressed upon the Government.

I have outlined the sensible approach first. The other approach—the approach that I fear will be adopted by the Government—might accept a stronger pound. We have seen the pound rising in the past few weeks. That will please the Bank of England, which loves a dear pound, and will reduce the living standards of our people. That is fundamentally the Conservatives approach; there is no question about that. The Conservatives accept implicitly that the living standards of the British people throughout the 1980s were built on sand. The Government feel that they must reduce them to make sense of their economic policy. Whatever happens, the Government will reduce living standards. They hope that, as a result, imports will fall relative to exports.

That will still leave the problem of the budget deficit, and that is where the Chief Secretary and his Thatcherite partner, the Secretary of State for Social Security, will start their emasculation of the welfare state—and "emasculation" is the word. I am thinking not just of the common retirement age of 65 for men and women; with a Conservative Government in power, I regard that as inevitable. I am sure that that is what they will do—at the very least. The amount of the retirement pension and the qualifications for it will fall under the axe. Disability payments and a whole range of state benefits are all now under threat, and in addition to those cuts will be the cuts in the national health service.

The history of the welfare state under this Government and under all Conservative Governments has followed a depressing pattern. General nods in the direction of the post-war consensus which began under the first post-war Conservative Government gave way later to cuts disguised as changes, then to cuts accepted as necessary, now to the real 1990s version of the Geddes axe. The public expenditure cuts of the 1930s created a bitterness whose effects we can still feel, 60 years later. They led to a torrent of dissent that changed the political landscape of our country. The great pity is that that approach is not merely divisive; it is cruel and unnecessary.

The only claim that the Government can make is that they have kept inflation under control. That claim is not true, but they make it anyway. The price of that claim has been an overvalued exchange rate. The reason why inflation has not been as high as it would otherwise have been has been the very high—the absurdly high, the ruinously high—level of the pound, and the levels of interest rates that have accompanied it. It is the greatest condemnation of our economic inadequacy that the Government entered the ERM at a disastrous level. The Government watched our balance of payments react calamitously and used billions of pounds worth of taxpayers' money in a fruitless attempt to defend the rate. It was the greatest economic incompetence of our age to throw away those valuable moneys on a worthless venture. Never had we seen our resources used so profligately.

Finally, when the money—our money—ran out, the rate was allowed to fall and business sighed with relief. It should have happened long before, yet the Government claimed credit for it—for the fact that now we have a realistic exchange rate. Now that all that money has been squandered, the exchange rate is realistic and the Government appear to be proud of the part they played in the process.

Complaints about a cheap pound come from down the road in the City. The City has advocated a dear pound and high interest rates, both of which affect our vital companies in Manchester, Birmingham, Glasgow and our industrial centres on which we depend. If we cannot have financial devolution, we should at least listen with greater care to what industry really needs, and we should meet those needs, one of which is large investment incentives for plant and machinery. Such incentives will not only help industry to modernise itself. The hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) is absolutely right and I am sorry he is so readily brushed aside by those on the Treasury Bench.

The advantage of investment in new plant and machinery is that it modernises the workers as well as the plant itself. New equipment leads to new methods of manufacture and new forms of operations in which many can play their part.

Mrs. Browning: The right hon. Gentleman referred to my comment about capital allowances. I hope that he would agree that, in the case of large conglomerates, which have an open-ended opportunity to invest—they can invest and benefit from tax breaks on millions and millions of pounds—there comes a point at which such a provision could be abused. That is why I propose a ceiling, rather than the open-ended offer that he appears to favour.

Mr. Sheldon: I would accept that if it applied to the present definitions that qualify for investment incentives. I am thinking purely of plant and machinery, and investment in plant and machinery leads to modern methods and practices and modernises workers as well as equipment.

Our industrial strength used to lie in the manufacturing skills of our people and in their inventiveness. Our manufacturing skills have been overtaken by those of scores of other countries in the developing as well as the developed world. Our inventiveness at least remains, and, although it is not enough to ensure the predominance of our manufacturing industry today, it is nevertheless a talent of great value. But it, too, is under threat because Germany, Japan and now France now produce more patents than we do. Our one residual advantage is now disappearing. What is more, those countries actually use their patents to produce articles.

Although the Government are beginning to talk as though manufacturing is important, precious little is emerging from their talk. The Prime Minister appears to have a new-found love of manufacturing industry. It is a great pity that he did not discover his affection for it years ago when there was more time to make use of it.

What the Government are doing for manufacturing industry is wholly inadequate. They need to reassess training and education and to run the economy in the interests of manufacturing industry, and therefore in the interests of prosperity and of our people. The tragedy is that the Government will be trying to retain a high pound when we have a real opportunity to obtain the benefits from a truly competitive pound. In my view, the pound should be considerably lower than it is at present. It is with great sadness that I view the attempts to jack it up.

Because of our high unemployment levels, we have an excellent opportunity to meet the inflationary pressures that arise from a low pound. That high unemployment will be the greatest assistance to us in producing expansion without inflation. There are not the constraints that we have had in the past and, although the deskilling of our people is serious, I believe that training can be expedited, as it was in the early days of the war when training centres played such an important part in producing for wartime conditions.

People want to work. A lower pound can reduce imports and promote exports and that should receive the support of the country. It is a terrible indictment of the Thatcher and post-Thatcher years that such a policy is not proposed. I have always been impressed by the French experience of 1958 to which I keep returning. Under President de Gaulle, the French combined devaluation with deflation and that provided a limitation to import and an incentive to export. Deflation provided the room to achieve those obectives.

We have no need for further deflation in Britain today. We already have an excessive degree of inflation and such a high level of unemployment. The way is now clear to achieve what France achieved more than 30 years ago. Now that the myths of monetarism and the constrictions of the ERM have been banished, we might have expected a fresh analysis of our economic situation. Indeed, that is what we were promised following black Wednesday. What has happened? We are planning—at least for the time being—a life outside the exchange rate mechanism. In addition, the Government are certainly not going to give the Bank of England the independence that it dearly wants.

The Government are right in that respect. The Bank of England is like the other nationalised industries. It wants to be privatised because a privatised monopoly is a comfortable institution in which to reside. The first thing that happens is that salaries are jacked up; then share options are introduced; and, finally, both are justified on the basis that the new monopoly profits are a sign of good management.

So, we have no ERM and no privatised Bank of England. There is a reduction in living standards and exhortation after exhortation to export. That is the revised agenda of the 1990s. The great strength of our democracy has been that Governments have eventually learnt from their mistakes. The learning process certainly needs to begin soon.

8.11 pm

Mr. Barry Legg (Milton Keynes, South-West): In some ways, we have had a curious debate so far. We started with some shadow boxing from the Opposition Front Bench. We then heard a few ideas and some glimmerings of a strategy from the Opposition Back Benches. The right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) put forward some kind of strategy and we have just heard a strategy from the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon). However, there was a dearth of strategy from the Opposition Front Bench.

In debate after debate, no matter how carefully we listen to hon. Members such as the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman), we come away with no idea of what those on the Opposition Front Bench would like to see in respect of the total level of public spending, the total level of taxation, the borrowing requirement, the level of interest rates or the level of the currency.

Mr. Quentin Davies: They do not know themselves.

Mr. Legg: As my hon. Friend makes clear in that valuable intervention, they do not seem to know. So long as those on the Opposition Front Bench lack a strategy, they will continue to be a most ineffective Opposition. The British people will regard them as an ineffective Opposition who are incapable of being an alternative Government.

My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury identified some very encouraging indicators in respect of the British economy that have appeared in the past few weeks. Those encouraging signs include the reduction in unit wage costs of 2 per cent., the latest increase in manufacturing output per head of 7·8 per cent., the improvement in the non-EEC trade balance and the 2·5 per cent. rise in manufacturing output in January and February. There are many other examples which show that recovery is finally getting under way.

I hope that the Government will continue to watch our economic indicators carefully, because I do not believe that it will be plain sailing from now on. Many hon. Members have identified problems in the economy. I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Government Front Bench to watch the indicators and to take the appropriate action to ensure that we get the sustained and lasting recovery which is so much needed in this country.

As my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary rightly said, we are leading Europe out of recession. Although the projections of our growth for this year are meagre, they are much better than those of our European partners. In its most recent projection in respect of Germany, the Deutsche Bank projects a 2 per cent. decline in gross domestic product. Britain is leading Europe out of recession and it is good that the Government have taken advantage of the freedom and flexibility that the markets provided last September.

The Government have taken advantage of that freedom and flexibility to let the pound float and to reduce interest rates. The British economy is now moving back to a better balance. Many hon. Members wanted to know what the Government are doing for industry. By leaving the exchange rate mechanism and reducing interest rates by 4 per cent., the Government have reduced the interest charges of British industry by £4 billion. That is more than has been contributed by the Budget and more than any of the suggestions, however vague, from Opposition Members.

It also behoves British politicians to encourage British industry and commerce to look widely for markets and to raise their eyes across the world. The economic pattern across the world is changing. Unfortunately, Europe is currently stagnating. I fear any moves to create a fortress Europe in respect of trading arrangments. I am sure that my colleagues on the Government Front Bench will be ever vigilant in that respect.

At the present time, the developing economies in the Far East are doing better; they are growing and becoming stronger. The Asian Development bank has projected growth in GDP in the developing economies of the Far East for the coming year of 7 per cent. at a time when growth in Europe is flat. Several of the economies in the Far East are growing at higher rates than that. In addition, the Chinese economy is growing at a rate of 10 per cent. per annum according to the Asian Development bank.

Business men in this country must see that as an opportunity. The growth in the Chinese economy means that the Chinese are exporting more and also importing much more. It is projected that imports into China in the next 12 months will increase by 20 per cent. or 25 per cent. There are certainly markets out there which British industry should take advantage of and there are opportunities which can help Britain to have a prosperous and successful future.

Several hon. Members have referred to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee report on the economy. We produced a report on the Budget statement, and last week we produced a report on monetary union. Quite a lot of work went into the former report and it was unfortunate that some of its impact was diverted by one or two Labour members of the Committee who sought to take cheap political advantage of it. However, overall a lot of worthy evidence was taken and sound conclusions were drawn.

One of the more important questions about which many hon. Members are interested is when Britain is likely to return to the ERM. I must admit that I am not altogether encouraged by the evidence that we received from my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he appeared before the Select Committee.

My right hon. Friend saw the criteria for our returning to the ERM as follows: first, that we are clearly out of recession in the United Kingdom—that moment is rapidly approaching—and, secondly, that the economies of Germany and the United Kingdom are more closely synchronised. I am not quite sure what he meant by that, but if he means interest rates coming closer together, that is also happening. However, I do not believe that that should be a reason for returning to the ERM.

Mr. Iain Duncan-Smith (Chingford): What about the fault lines?

Mr. Legg: I was coming to the fault lines.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister rightly identified fault lines when we left the ERM in September. Since then, we have had a report from the governors of the European central bank which says that they cannot find the fault lines. It is not surprising that governors of the central bank cannot find the fault lines in the European exchange rate mechanism system. If they admitted that there were fault lines, they would have to throw even more money at defending the artificial exchange rates that they have set across Europe.

The real fault line in the exchange rate mechanism is that the former anchor currency and anchor economy in Germany are no longer financially stable. Fixed exchange rates can run successfully for various periods. For example, under the Bretton Woods system, we ran a successful fixed exchange rate system across the western world for a number of years. One of the reasons that we were able to maintain the system was that the United States was the major economy in the western economies. It is worth remembering that the United States economy is five times larger than the Germany economy.

The fixed exchange rate system ran successfully because currencies were linked to the major economy and the major economy had sound and stable financial policies. The major economy did not run big budget deficits and it did not have high inflation. When it started to run big budget deficits with the coming of the Vietnam war in the 1960s, that destroyed the Bretton Woods system of fixed exchange rates.

We have seen the same thing happening in Europe in the past few years. Germany has ceased to be an effective anchor because it no longer possesses the financial stability that it had in the 1960s and 1970s. Germany faces a prolonged period of large budget deficits and reconstruction with the unification that is taking place there, so it no longer possesses the stability that it had previously.

Germany has massive problems on the competitiveness front. It is no longer the competitive country that it was in the 1960s and 1970s. German wage costs per hour are substantially greater than in the United Kingdom. To imagine that Germany will once again become the anchor and that Britain should, in the near future or the medium term, fix sterling against the deutschmark will simply lead to a repeat of the problems that the United Kingdom has faced over the past five years with inappropriately valued exchange rates and interest rates being set at the wrong level for domestic conditions. If that happens, we shall not see success in our affairs. There is a great danger economically for the United Kingdom in returning to the exchange rate mechanism.

Hon. Members would do well to draw on recent experience and say that, broadly speaking, floating exchange rates provide the best means of establishing the level at which currencies should operate. If central bankers and politicians think that they know better than markets and that they can overrule markets and set exchange rates, that is a grave mistake and the people and taxpayers in many countries suffer as a result. There should be no return to the exchange rate mechanism in the lifetime of this Parliament.

We have heard comments from several hon. Members, including my hon. Friends the Members for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) and for Bridlington (Mr. Townend), about the high level of public spending and the high level of the public sector borrowing requirement in the United Kingdom. Certainly, for a Conservative Government to be running a deficit of some £50 billion, which equates to some 8 per cent. of gross domestic product, requires vigorous action in the coming months and years to achieve a proper financial balance and bring our public finances into better order.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington highlighted the level of public expenditure of some £23·3 billion in the past month. He rightly said that that was some 30 per cent. greater than in the same month the previous year. Certainly, Treasury Ministers have a great deal to do in maintaining firm control of public expenditure and substantially reducing the deficit.

Several hon. Members have noted that the Finance (No. 2) Bill is a substantial document. It has more than 200 clauses and 19 schedules. It may be in danger of running against that well-known cannon of taxation—that taxation should endeavour to be as simple as possible. Conservative Members have often advocated that taxation should be simplified.

The Bill is weighty. It contains measures which all of us support, such as the raising of the threshold for stamp duty. It also contains extensive measures which will puzzle hon. Members, such as those relating to the taxation of vans. There is a schedule of some 10 pages concerning the tax on vans used by directors and other persons. The Inland Revenue goes into tremendous detail about these vans—the requirements and the definition of a van. In fact, the definition of "van" is any vehicle which conveys goods, provided that it is not a motor cycle as defined in the Road Traffic Act 1988 and it is less than 3,500 kg. If one is an employee or director who is in the habit of driving a three-tonne lorry, the schedule will bring the lorry within the taxation provisions as a benefit in kind.

I strongly support the Government's strategy for reducing regulation on business, but the Government, the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise should be mindful that Bills and Acts of Parliament are also regulation. I wish the Committee well in its work on the Bill. I hope that it will be able to reduce some of the volume and help to achieve some simplification.

In conclusion, I hope that my right hon. Friends on the Front Bench give as much time, energy and ability as they can to tackling the main matters within the Government's control. They should get public expenditure under control so that overall tax levels can be reasonable. They should not spend too much time delving into economic forecasts, second-guessing the markets and working out the correct exchange rate between the deutschmark and sterling or other currencies but should address the fundamental matters which come within their responsibility or control. If the Government do that, we shall have a strategy which will be good for the country, the Government, and our party.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): I do not think that there is an hon. Member on either side of the House who does not sincerely hope that we are seeing the end of the recession. It is the longest recession since the war. We have been told that manufacturing output has started to rise, that consumer confidence is rising and that the gross domestic product will grow by about 1·3 per cent. this year and 2·5 per cent. in 1994. That should make us all feel better.

When the economy was falling like a stone, I remember an economist saying that even a stone bounces. Unfortunately, stones do not bounce far, but tend to settle down to the lowest level. For two consecutive months, we have seen slight falls in unemployment. Yesterday in The Observer, William Keegan described it as a "Group 4 recovery". He said:

"They seem to be losing the unemployed".

Even the tabloids do not seem to believe what is happening. Last week, the Evening Standard had the headline, "Shock fall in unemployment", as though that somehow was bad news. But so long as it is real, it is welcome.

I believe that employers over-reacted to the gloom and uncertainty in the autumn and are now beginning to recruit again. Instability is bad for industry because, when employers make people redundant, we lose vital skills which are not replaced. The skilled people we lose are often in their late 40s and 50s, and they find it extremely difficult to get work again when the economy begins to turn up.

The problem is that, on the basis of the Government's previous record, it is difficult for people to have confidence in what the Conservative Government are doing. Last autumn, the Government seemed intent on doing their utmost to destroy British manufacturing industry. We had record interest rates and an unsustainable exchange rate. The housing market was described as flat, but, in reality, house prices were plummeting.

Despite their best efforts, the Government were ejected from the exchange rate mechanism and forced to devalue the pound. That led to an 18 per cent. devaluation and lower interest rates. That is what has led to recovery. It is not something which the Government intended to happen, although they now pretend that it is what they intended all along and that they are responsible for the welcome signs of upturn that we are now seeing.

However, as many hon. Members, but especially Opposition Members, have said, there are dangers in the upturn. That is well illustrated by the circumstances that arose in the early 1980s. When we came out of recession then, the balance of trade was positive. It led to several years in which consumer demand exceeded the growth in exports before the trade deficit grew to unacceptable limits. However, that is not a luxury that we can allow ourselves on this occasion. It is not sustainable. The balance of trade is already in deficit to the tune of £12 billion, and is projected to grow to £18 billion as we come out of recession.

So we must either restrain consumer demand or encourage exports—preferably both—to bring the deficit back into balance. In the current circumstances, any Government would find it extremely difficult to do so. Manufacturing is only 21 per cent. of GDP. When we compare that with levels in our competitor countries—31 per cent. in Japan and 35 per cent. in Germany—we begin to realise what a weak state British manufacturing is in. Britain, where the industrial revolution began, is in the appalling position of deriving only a small proportion of its GDP from manufacturing industry.

More help is needed for manufacturing. Opposition Members have said that on numerous occasions. It has only recently been recognised as important by the Government. We need to provide more help in investment. I agree with the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mrs. Browning), who is no longer in her seat, that we must give more help to people who are prepared to invest in resources for research and development.

We certainly need more investment in our education and training. We should also seriously consider an attempt to cure the short-termism which cripples British industry. High-tech firms, which are the backbone of recovery in a modern technology-based industrial environment, also need their own special encouragement, but the Government are not interested in increasing skills or encouraging research and development; nor do they seem particularly interested in raising levels of investment.

The Conservative philosophy is simplistic: keep down inflation and wages and in the free market everything will beautifully come all right. We will automatically improve our skills, raise our investment and increase our research and development and that will help us to become an innovative and competitive country. Well, I am sorry to say that that has not happened in the past 14 years, and the electorate are beginning to realise that the Government are pulling a great con trick in pretending that they know how to manage the economy.

I have more than 1,000 high-tech firms in my constituency. I spoke to one of them this morning. It is a highly innovative firm employing a great many people with valuable skills. It is losing work as a result of declining defence contracts. It has skills which could well be used in civil engineering and consultancy work. It asked me for my help with a specific problem.

After an exchange of correspondence with Ministers I eventually directed the firm to the regional office of the Department of Trade and Industry for the help that it needed. It reported to me this morning that the DTI was not interested in addressing its problems seriously. It simply tried to push the DTI schemes at it. The schemes were not suitable, but the DTI showed a lack of regard for what the customer wanted. That is one of the basic problems that we have not addressed.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth (Coventry, North-East): Does not the response that we get from the DTI show that there is a lack of strategy on how we should diversify out of the defence industry into other industries? The answer that we are always given in this place is that there is a straight choice. If we are not prepared to accept the forces of the market, we support the propping up of lame ducks. But we have always advocated the adoption of a strategy. If there is not a strategy, what on earth is the role of the Government? But Conservative Members never appear to agree with that.

Mrs. Campbell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He has reminded me that another difficulty of which the firm in my constituency complained was that there was a lack of strategy in the Ministry of Defence. There is no way in which a firm can know in advance whether its project or proposal will have a good chance of success. Encouraging noises from MOD officials are not usually sufficient. A company may put a great deal of work into a proposal and find that it is turned down at the end of the day. Small firms cannot afford that luxury. They need to be reasonably sure that, if they put a great deal of time, energy and effort into a project proposal, it will have a reasonable chance of being accepted.

The other major problem that growing firms in my constituency face is finance. Many small firms—I am talking about very small firms consisting of perhaps only half a dozen people—have great difficulty in expanding. Sometimes they obtain the initial finance successfully, but have tremendous difficulty in moving on to the next stage.

I welcomed the increase in the percentage that the DTI guarantees under the small firms loan guarantee scheme. That could be useful in some circumstances. However, the problem with that scheme is that often the banks refuse to operate it or make it difficult for firms to get hold of the money. The British banking system does not understand high-tech firms. It has no basic understanding of scientific innovation and ideas. That is the problem.

I suggest that the Chancellor should make the scheme available through science parks. Science parks are usually run by people who understand small high-tech businesses and are prepared to come to grips with the scientific issues at stake. If the Chancellor took up that suggestion, I should like to put forward the St. John's Innovation Centre of Cambridge, which would be delighted to run a pilot project.

There are two ways in which the country can go. We can either strengthen the supply side, exploit British skills and expertise, invest in people and regain our competitiveness, or we can follow the route for which the Government seem to want us to opt. Under that option, we would lower wages, reduce skills and offer no help with investment and research and development. No attempt would be made to overcome short-termism. That second option will inevitably lead to third-world wages and skills. We would become the world's cheapest conveyor belt, making cheap goods at low prices, which would generate low consumer demand. We would have an even larger proportion of Europe's poor than we have now.

That is the future for Britain under the Conservatives, but there is an alternative. The people have the ability, the skills and the enthusiasm to make Britain great again. I hope that we can do that.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. I understand that the winding-up speeches will commence at 9.20 pm. Four hon. Members, who have been in the Chamber for most of the day, are seeking to catch my eye, and with a bit of co-operation from everyone, I may be able to call them.

Mr. Maxton: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I thought I had clarified with you on an earlier point of order that there is no reason why any hon. Member should not speak, because the vote does not have to take place at 10 o'clock, but at any time thereafter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We shall have to wait to see what happens at 10 o'clock. At present four hon. Members wish to catch my eye.

8.41 pm

Sir Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) made some interesting and constructive points about some of the smaller high-tech firms in her constituency, with which I agree. It was good to hear what she had to say. The Finance Bill is good news for small and medium-sized firms, and I agree with the hon. Lady that the amended loan guarantee scheme will help those firms as they come out of recession and start to take advantage of the expanding economy.

I want to speak about an issue which has been before the House for a long time: unitary tax. Eight years ago, the House included a retaliatory clause in the then Finance Act to put pressure on the United States Government. I have been concerned about this issue for some time. I have an interest to declare. I feel passionately that we must resolve this issue before too long. On 18 February 1980, Peter Rees, now Lord Rees, said about the United Kingdom/United States double taxation treaty:

> "To those concerned about the unitary question, I say that there is no disposition on the part of the Government to let the issue die . . . the United States were left in no doubt by what I told them"

Thirteen years later, we are still no further forward. The blame must be put, fairly and squarely, at the door of successive United States Administrations, who have not addressed the issue effectively. I shall not go into detail about what unitary tax is; suffice it to say that it means taxing companies on a worldwide basis rather than on the basis of the state or the country in which they operate. It is used by some American states—in particular, California—and it has been internationally condemned by the United Nations, the OECD, the 12 members of the European Community, Japan, Switzerland, Finland, Australia, Canada and many other countries.

Today marks the deadline for the United States Administration to submit an amicus curiae brief in support of Barclays bank, which is leading the way in trying to get a judicial decision on this issue against the California Franchise Tax Board. According to the press

—I believe this to be true—the United States Administration have now decided that they will not support Barclays bank in its litigation. I know that the House will be disappointed by that news, and I am aware of the feelings of the 213 hon. Members, many of whom are present now, who have signed early-day motion 1489. I believe that we are justified in being outraged at the American Administration's decision not to support Barclays' case.

It would appear that that American Administration have gone back on their promise to the House that they would use their best endeavours to resolve the issue. The chairman of the California Board of Equalisation has stated publicly that the decision not to file a brief is a "clear signal to the Supreme Court that the Administration does not want the case heard."

My hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Sir R. Moate) and the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) who is sitting on the Opposition Front Bench this evening, recently visited Washington as part of a delegation. They were informed by the acting Secretary for tax policy at the United States Treasury:

"Failure to file the brief"—

in support of Barclays—

"will be considered a decision not an oversight".

Although it is still feasible that the United States Supreme Court will take the case, the failure of the United States Government to support it significantly jeopardises the chances of a court hearing. By failing to support Barclays, the Administration have destroyed the foundation on which their international tax treaties are based. The House should note that, for the first time in their history, the American Administration are admitting that a tax system radically different from the international standard of arm's-length reporting has a place internationally.

There is a real danger that the use of worldwide unitary tax will break out, like measles, all over the United States. That could send a damaging signal to other countries, which might be encouraged to adopt that as a standard form of taxation because the American Administration no longer seem to regard the OECD model as the accepted standard.

Other American states are looking to adopt worldwide unitary tax, as demonstrated by the letter sent by the American Governors Association to President Clinton on 15 April stating that the worldwide unitary system offered advantages from which the federal system could benefit. In a far-sighted letter of 24 March to Treasury Secretary Bentsen, the president of the United Kingdom section of the American Chamber of Commerce stated:

"I regard this matter as potentially the most important to arise in transatlantic commercial relations in a very long time. This is an issue that should be allowed to exhaust the US legal process in the hope that it can avoid becoming a major political dispute."

Today it has become such a dispute. It has been suggested that the Clinton Administration's reason for not backing Barclays is that they regard the issue as solved, since California enacted legislation giving companies the option of being taxed either on a worldwide basis or on what is known as the "water's edge". The companies are only given that so-called solution on payment of a fee—often a substantial one. It is worth reminding ourselves that neither our Government, the Unitary Tax Campaign nor the Confederation of British Industry supported that legislation.

It is morally outrageous that a company should be punished for the right to be taxed on an equitable basis. It is quite clear that that so-called solution is not a solution in practice. According to the California Franchise Tax Board, an estimated 2,500 foreign and domestic companies were eligible to elect for the water's edge option in 1990 and that just over half did so. Of that number, only 8 per cent. of British companies—68—elected to do so. That represents less than a quarter of British companies operating in California.

The fee for the water's-edge election is not insubstantial, and California estimates that it will collect between $40 million and $60 million from that election fee. To charge a fee for the right to file under accepted international practice is surely akin to the highwayman's charge to his victims for the use of the road. The staff of the California Franchise Tax Board have consistently attempted to undercut the legislation.

The House must be under no illusion that while the 1986 legislation in California was a small step in the right direction, it does not provide a solution to this issue. Given the fee and the throw-back provisions that British companies must face, without a right of appeal, that legislation is morally indefensible.

I now look quickly to the future. The House passed retaliatory action in 1985, now in the form of section 812 of the Income and Corporation Tax Act 1988. The time has come—I believe that the Opposition agree—for decisive action against the United States to show that we are serious and that we are angry. We have waited too long for the Americans to solve the problem. The House took the words of the United States on trust and, frankly, the United States has let us down.

Our credibility in negotiations with the United States on all future economic issues will be undermined if we do not follow through and retaliate as we have always said we would. How wide or how narrow the retaliation is is a matter for debate. To deny payment to United States companies of British tax credits could give the Inland Revenue an extra £200 million. In view of the way in which the Americans have behaved, that is a very attractive proposal.

Many people say that the treaty may be torn up by the United States. The House should remember that the treaty is outdated. It benefits United States companies substantially. The United States would not abandon a treaty which benefits it, especially if retaliation was targeted finely against United States companies which have a presence only in a unitary state—California. The Clinton Administration have made a political decision to protect themselves domestically. The British Government must now protect their own national interest and our own British companies operating in America. The British Government should no longer tolerate the antics of California.

Although the opportunity for the successful conclusion of legislation has been in the Californian courts since 1984, the United States once again backs away from a meaningful solution. It is British companies and British businesses that are directly affected by the United States Administration's sudden decision to turn turtle. We cannot allow that to happen. The only thing that a United States President can do unilaterally is file an amicus brief, which he has apparently not done to date.

The United States system differs from the United Kingdom parliamentary form of government. The President cannot guarantee legislation or, as we know from bitter experience, even a treaty. There is no sign that the United States Administration would support any effort to limit the states. Any attempt to ignore the litigation in favour of some new solution would jettison Barclays and all the other companies which have borne and fought the tax.

[Sir Michael Grylls]

There is no doubt that the Government must now retaliate. Our Government must show the Clinton Administration that we will not tolerate their showing disregard for their international obligations and for their promises to the House. I hope that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will take this message back to the Treasury and that, as soon as possible, the Government will commence implementation of the retaliatory clause.

8.52 pm

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): I shall be brief, because I am conscious that many hon. Members wish to take part in the debate.

This week marks a milestone because it was this week a year ago that the Prime Minister's predecessor said that there was no such thing as Majorism. She also threw in for good measure the fact that the Prime Minister was not his own man. At the time, I thought that those were curious statements, but in the year that has passed, I have realised that Majorism has been given a definition.

To many of my constituents, Majorism means soaring unemployment. Unemployment in Pendle has risen by 80 per cent. since November 1990. To many of my constituents, Majorism means slump, broken election pledges and the collapse in manufacturing. We know that Majorism means massive borrowing of £50 billion, way above anything ever mentioned by the Conservatives at the time of the general election. It means an enormous trade deficit in manufacturing, running this year at £13 billion. Under a Conservative Government, this country in 1983, for the first time since the industrial revolution, had a deficit in manufacturing.

The Budget is not only the Chancellor's Budget, but the Prime Minister's Budget. It will be remembered not only as the last Budget before the Government introduce the unified Budget in November, but as the Budget that comprehensively and cynically ditched a raft of election pledges which were made solemnly to the British people on 9 April. It will be remembered—a point picked up by the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mrs. Browning)—as a Budget with a delayed-action fuse. It is a ticking time bomb. The hon. Member for Tiverton said that it was an innovative Budget because it proposed tax increases in later years. Those words will come back to haunt the Government in later years because the tax increases are built into the Budget. Conservatives will never be able to say again with a straight face that they are the party of low taxes and that Labour always wants to put taxes up.

It is one of the great ironies that the Government seem to have built up a reputation for economic competence. The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Mr. Legg) referred to that belief when he tried to mock the Labour party for lacking a strategy. The Government's whole strategy was turned on its head on 16 September 1992 when we pulled out of the exchange rate mechanism and lost £5 billion in the process.

There was also some reference to the British national interest. Again, it strikes me as strange that Conservatives are constantly seen as the party that defends the British national interest, whereas the Labour party is seen as incapable of doing so. That attitude was taken furthest by the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), the President of the Board of Trade. He told The Guardian on 27 November 1991:

"Some of us would rather see the Budget handed over to the Common Market than to the Labour party."

Yet the Conservatives wasted £14 billion on the poll tax fiasco and hiked up VAT by 2·5 per cent. to pay for that.

The Budget runs counter to a series of specific pledges. We may be tired of hearing about them in the House, but they bear repetition so that people outside can hear them. There was a specific pledge on national insurance contributions, and that was broken. The Prime Minister said during the election campaign:

"I have no plans to raise the top rate of tax or the level of national insurance contributions."

There was a specific pledge not to increase taxes and that was broken.

During the election campaign, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said on 31 March 1992:

"We will not have to increase taxes. I cannot see any circumstances in which that will be necessary."

The pledge on VAT was broken and that is perhaps the most cynical action of the lot. It is mean, and it will have an adverse impact on the poorest in our community. We still do not have an assurance from Ministers that the poorest members of our community will be adequately compensated.

I am not talking only about pensioners and those on income support. I am talking about the many millions of poor families whose incomes take them just above the income support level. Some Conservative Members posed questions about that, and I hope that the Financial Secretary will tell the House what special provision will be made to ensure that those just above income support level will not be affected adversely by the hike in VAT.

We know why VAT on fuel was increased. My regional daily, the Lancashire Evening Telegraph, told its readers a few days after the Budget on 18 March that VAT on fuel was "a desperate pledge-ditching step to service the huge deficit that the Government has run up, many would say by its own economic incompetence . . . it would only need the dissent of just 11 Tory MPs for the measure to be undermined. Such action in our opinion would have the force of probity behind it, in contrast to the attempt by the Government to portray this new VAT imposition as a green anti-global warming tax, fulfilling Britain's international environmental obligations."

The Chief Secretary tried to sell this line again today. We were told that the Government were committed to the development agenda at the Rio earth summit, which was why it was right for Britain to try to curb pollution by the year 2000. That was the justification offered for hiking up fuel taxes.

Why then was it not equally right for Britain to join France in moves to agreeing a timetable to reach the United Nations target of 0·7 per cent. of GDP to be spent on overseas aid by the year 2000? France has committed herself to that target. The Lancashire Evening Telegraph was spot on when it said that VAT on fuel was forced on the Government by an exploding deficit which had to be paid for.

The Chief Secretary displayed tremendous optimism about the state of the British economy, but his optimism is not shared by many people in this country. I was amused to hear the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington), whose constituency I know well, detecting signs of recovery from the increased house prices in Fulham. I am not worried about house prices in Fulham; I am worried about what is happening to the real economy—and that means manufacturing and those who work in it making things.

The Chief Secretary said that the Labour party would have us believe that manufacturing is dead. It is not dead: it is on a life support system. There have been huge losses of manufacturing jobs this year in my constituency. Rolls-Royce has shed 5,000 jobs nationwide and 175 in Pendle. Smith and Nephew has laid off 574 people this year. Wadkins of Colne is closing. Progress Engineering is closing and the latest victim, only a couple of weeks ago, was Baxter Healthcare, which makes medical products, such as intravenous drips. It is closing its plant in my constituency and transferring production to Malta. The NHS trust in my constituency spent £128,000 on Baxter products last year. Ludicrously, highly skilled jobs are being exported to Malta and the Burnley health care trust is expected to import those products in future, now that 200 skilled and loyal workers are to be laid off by this American multinational.

Beyond the boundaries of my constituency, things are terribly bleak. The last colliery in Lancashire, Parkside, is closing down. Leyland DAF is fighting for its existence, while the Government stand idly by, expecting Lancashire county council to do what is necessary to save it.

The Governor of the Bank of England has told people what they already know. Speaking to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee last month, he said that Britain faced a fundamental weakness, in the form of its large trade deficit, which will take many years to correct. The fact is that we are rapidly losing our manufacturing base. We are importing more and more of the goods that we used to make here. The Governor confessed himself a little worried by the Treasury prediction that our trade deficit would reach £13 billion this year, but went on to say that the trade gap reflected a lack of competitiveness and that there were problems with productivity, training, education and innovation.

The weakness in our manufacturing is a systemic weakness in the British economy that has not been properly dealt with for the past 14 years. Manufacturing is in decline and the evidence of that decline is plain in the constituencies of hon. Members who represent industrial areas. I can only urge Conservative Members to open their eyes and see the extent of the chaos and the devastation that Government policies have wrought in this country. This Budget does nothing to deal with the real problems facing the nation; tragically, it is not a Budget for jobs.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): I shall begin by declaring my interests. I am an adviser to NatWest Securities, which is the investment banking arm of the NatWest group, a director of Dewe Rogerson Consultants, and parliamentary consultant to the Institute of Taxation.

The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman), the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman, made an appalling speech. She called for reductions in taxation or the abolition of some taxes and then complained about the size of the PSBR. She completely failed to recognise the obvious contradictions between those two, which is an insult not just to the intelligence of the House but to the intelligence of those outside. Such speeches do not deserve to be taken seriously, nor will they be.

I should like to pay a sincere tribute to the Chancellor. Few politicians in my time in the House, perhaps none, have been subjected to such a sustained and often malicious campaign of abuse. The Chancellor took up office in difficult circumstances two and a half years ago and set himself two tasks—to reduce inflation and to restore growth in the economy. He has been triumphant in the first—there is general recognition of that—and it is becoming increasingly clear that he is succeeding in the second.

It would be futile to expect Opposition Members to pay tribute to a Conservative Chancellor. They will go on mindlessly calling for his resignation whatever happens to the economy. I am not so naive as to suppose that the animal will change its spots, but I hope that fair-minded and perhaps better informed people in the country who had lost patience during the recession and criticised the Chancellor, will be magnanimous enough to recognise their errors.

The Chancellor's Budget is courageous. He decided that it was necessary to increase taxes, and I am sure that he is right. He was also right to avoid raising direct taxes such as income tax and capital gains and corporation tax, which are the most economically damaging taxes of all. Having decided to focus on indirect taxes, he was also right to widen the tax base rather than to increase the rates. I hope that he will be emboldened to go further and spread the VAT net even wider in the next Budget. Perhaps he might like to start by extending it to books, magazines and newspapers.

Many hon. Members have rightly recognised that the economy is now reviving, and have asked whether the new growth will be sustainable. It is essential not to return to the cycle of inflation followed by retrenchment and recession, which is often exacerbated by counter-productive if well-intentioned attempts by Governments to fine-tune the economy. Such attempts have characterised much of our history since the second world war.

The Chancellor is concerned about the danger of inflation—he said so recently to the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service—and about the need to address it and see it off. Fortunately, there is a weapon to hand which is very appropriate in present circumstances. Interest rates on the continent are falling, but we must resist the always present temptation further to reduce our interest rates, and instead allow sterling to appreciate. I hope that the Government will take the opportunities that are presented in the next few months to do this.

One cannot have it both ways about devaluation. If it is conceived as an attempt to gain a permanent competitive advantage, it must be accompanied by measures that will retrench demand and release resources for export. That is the only way to ensure that the increase in import prices is not accommodated by demand, which must lead to a general increase in prices. That has not been the position over the past six months, because devaluation has been accompanied by a reduction in interest rates and a relaxation of fiscal policy until this Budget.

Devaluation has thus been conceived not as an attempt to gain a competitive advantage in export markets, or in domestic markets in internationally traded goods and services, but rather as a necessary concomitant of the reductions in interest rates over the past few months—the price we have had to pay for those reductions. That being so, it is right that, when the international situation permits it, we should allow that devaluation to be reduced, and thereby minimise or lessen the potential impact on price inflation of the rise in import prices. I hope that that will be done.

There are many good things in the Budget and I approve of the content of the Bill, but I fear that I cannot say the same thing about its drafting. It is almost an object lesson in how a Bill should not be drafted. It is far too long. I know that there is a great tradition in Finance Bills of low standards of bureaucratic obfuscation and prolixity, but the position is getting a great deal worse. My hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Mr. Legg) —I endorse his excellent remarks on the subject—drew attention to the absurdity of the passage about vans. I notice that the sensible and welcome changes in the rules for roll-over relief for business assets are spun out into 26 pages, with a text longer than that in which the original relief was cast some years ago.

Parts of the Bill are simply incomprehensible. Let me give the House one small nugget. Clause 138(1) says:

"An amount is available for relief under section 136 above for an accounting period if amount A is exceeded by amount B or (if amount C is lower than amount B) amount A is exceeded by amount C; and the amount available for relief for the period is the amount of the difference between amount A and amount B or (as the case may be) between amount A and amount C."

That is disgraceful. Violence is done to justice because, if a citizen cannot understand the law—the central assumption of the law is that the citizen understands and knows it—then the citizen will be disadvantaged. In this case, people will not be able to claim the reliefs to which they would be entitled, or they will be penalised for making mistakes in their filing because they cannot understand the law. Economic damage will be done because the cost of compliance with such nonsense will increase. There will no doubt be an enormous improvement in the revenues of tax accountants and lawyers, but the burden will be borne by businesses and individuals.

I hope that the Chancellor will enjoy a well-deserved and general congratulation on having stuck to his policies, which are now coming right, through thick and thin. However, I hope that he instructs the Inland Revenue to hire a new parliamentary draftsman.

9.13 pm

Ms Tessa Jowell (Dulwich): The concern of the House about the effect of the imposition of VAT on domestic and charities' fuel and power has rightly focused on the plight of elderly and poor people who live at home and who will now face increased bills. However, I should also like to draw attention to the problem that the measure will cause to charities, and particularly those serving the needs of the many people who can no longer live on their own but require the care of a residential nursing home or hospice.

The recession has had a serious impact on the ability of charities to respond to real needs through reductions in donations—a 67 per cent. fall according to a survey by the Charities Aid Foundation—and a significant increase in the demand for help from charities. The increase in the level of irrecoverable VAT that is paid by charities makes their vital job even harder. The Government have argued that charities should bear VAT on fuel and power for their non-business use, along with the rest of society. They also contribute to global warming, and therefore should be encouraged to save energy.

Such an argument reflects a blatant lack of understanding of the reality of such care provision. It is an inescapable medical fact that elderly, ill and disabled people need higher temperatures if they are to be cared for properly. Indeed, one of the ways in which cancer manifests itself is through the need for extra warmth, even in the height of summer. Thus, because of the direct needs of people in their care, the charities that provide the care are high energy users. They have a duty of care to their residents. We cannot, as a simple economic choice, ask them to reduce their energy consumption.

Of course, residential care providers are not the only charities that will suffer under the Government's measures —grant-making charities will also be affected. They too have had a significant increase in demand on their resources during the recession. Ill, elderly and disabled people on low incomes increasingly turn to charities for help. Their numbers are growing, and no doubt will grow even further with rising fuel prices. The Cancer Relief Macmillan Fund disbursed more than £3 million in patient grants in 1992, of which about £850,000—by far the largest category—was for grants for fuel.

It is also important not to ignore the effect of the measures on other charities that provide vital services. Equally hard hit will be organisations such as the Imperial Cancer Research Fund, which will lose £170,000 a year; Barnado's, which estimates a loss of £122,000 a year; and the Royal National Lifeboat Institution, which will lose about £80,000 a year.

The overall figure for the 300 members of the Charity Tax Reform Group is estimated to be about £27 million. Do not the Government realise that charities will have to spend vast amounts of money on VAT on fuel, instead of spending it on their primary purpose of provision of services? It is also fair to say that those who volunteer their help to charities do so to support those services; they do not stand on windy street corners rattling their collection boxes to raise money for VAT.

The problem should not be viewed in isolation from the wider context of the tax burden of charities. Whereas local authorities and commercial organisations can recover VAT, the services provided by charities are either exempt from or outside the scope of VAT. Charities are in a uniquely disadvantaged position, which will be made worse by the Government's proposal to levy VAT on fuel and power.

The Government's policy—which they claim encourages charitable giving—rather than offering what they call indiscriminate tax relief from the VAT that charities pay, is just a feeble attempt to face reality. While the measures on gift aid and payroll giving are welcome, what is really needed is a solution to the problem of irrecoverable VAT, which currently amounts to about £300 million a year.

The obvious solution would be the introduction of a VAT rebate scheme, under which charities could recover an agreed percentage of the presently irrecoverable VAT. That system already exists in Canada, where it works well. The Government have produced excuses for rejecting that proposal, which is popular with charities, including the excuse that it would be unacceptable to the European Community. When the Minister replies, perhaps he will confirm that that is the advice that the Government have received, which is in direct contradiction to the independent advice given to the Charity Tax Reform Group.

The Budget undermines the position of charities and their long-standing traditional reliefs. We cannot afford to lose the invaluable contributions they make to the well-being of those who are most disadvantaged in society, and to the community life of our nation. We want the Government to listen, to withdraw their proposal to charge VAT on fuel to charities, to undertake a long-term review of charity taxation, and to give renewed consideration to the introduction of a VAT rebate scheme for charities—which must no longer be penalised by the tax system. They deserve even this Government's help.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): They key issues that the Chancellor had to address in this year's Budget were problems caused by previous policy errors—negative economic growth, lack of performance in the British economy, and a substantial public sector borrowing requirement.

The Chancellor's policy for growth—showing him to be the Keynesian child of the 1960s that we all know him to be—is to cross his fingers and hope that devaluation and a high Budget deficit will provide sufficient stimulus for recovery. Since neither were his pre-election policies, there are those who allege that the Chancellor has stumbled into his present policy by accident. I do not take that cynical view. I can see a future for the Chancellor on his eventual retirement—lecturing at the London School of Economics and writing Tribune group pamphlets on demand management.

I am pleased that the Chancellor is now back on the radio, replacing the Home Secretary as the Government's principal spokesman on economic affairs. The Home Secretary was probably warned off by a passage in the Budget speech in which the Chancellor made special mention, in a sinister way, of his regret at sticking four and a half pence on a packet of five of the small cigars that the Home Secretary smokes.

Although the Chancellor's policy for economic growth cannot truly be called Conservative in the sense that the previous Prime Minister would have understood it, the right hon. Gentleman's policy for deficit reduction can truly be called Norman, in the sense that his 11th century namesakes would have understood it. The Chancellor is raising money by taking it from the poor. Of all the revenue-raising options open to him, he chose the most regressive.

This would not be an economic debate without Conservative Members seeing signs of economic recovery. In fact, The Economist provided some of the latest evidence of that. I noticed the Chief Secretary leaning on it a little. A recent article in The Economist reported that manufacturing output in February increased 2·5 per cent. on a year ago; business men are more optimistic about sales than at any time since 1989; new car sales were up 13 per cent. in the year to March; domestic air travel also increased 5·5 per cent. in the year to March—and even The Economist did not attribute that to rail strikes.

One must, however, be cautious about forecasting economic recovery on the basis of evidence provided by The Economist. Business men may be more optimistic about sales than at any time since 1989, but in 1989 similar wild optimism was followed by the economy shrinking 1·5 per cent. in the following 12 months. The Chief Secretary spoke about new car sales, but failed to make the point that, as the economy dipped into recession, those sales fell 45 per cent. before registering the more modest 13 per cent. increase that he did tell us about.

More significantly, today's GDP figures offer harder evidence of the recession coming to an end. I am surprised that the Chief Secretary did not make more use of them. Instead, breaking the habit of a lifetime, he even quoted with approval a survey by the AEEU.

In common with my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) and all my right hon. and hon. Friends, I hope that recovery is under way. The real issue is that 10 successive quarters of a shrinking economy have left a devastating and enduring legacy. It is no use Conservative Members talking about manufacturing output resuming growth when they are unwilling to acknowledge the 8 per cent. fall in output before growth resumed.

The recession has had a deep and lasting effect on the British economy. Any recovery will be from a lower base. Something like 3 per cent. of GDP has been permanently lost—a point well made by my hon. Friend the Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice). Of course recessionary forces are at work in the international economy, but there are peculiarly British dimensions to our own recession—exacerbated by Government economic policy. The recession started earlier and has lasted longer, ran deeper and caused more lasting damage than recessions elsewhere in Europe or in the United States.

Between 1989 and 1994, according to the OECD forecast, growth in the G7 economies will average 9 per cent. The figure for the British economy over the same period is 1 per cent. That is an indication of the peculiarly British dimension to the problem. Even the Government admit to having presided over five years of stagnation in the British economy—although, in fairness, they tend not to express it in quite that way.

If the Government's growth forecasts are to be believed—like their pledge to stay in the exchange rate mechanism, and their promises to preserve the value of the currency, not to put up taxes and not to increase the rate or broaden the base of VAT—output in the British economy will not return to the level that it reached in the second quarter of 1990 until some time in 1995. Surprisingly enough, the Government's forecasts were much more optimistic before the general election, when a much stronger recovery was foretold. Before the election, the Chancellor told the House and the British electorate that output would grow by 2 per cent. in 1992-93, by 3 per cent. in 1993-94 and by 3 per cent. in 1994-95, and that there would be stronger growth than the Government now anticipate in the following years. That promise has turned out to be as well founded as all the others.

I know that, in politics, it is normal to look for points on which our opponents may not have been totally honest with the electorate, but—when we examine the Government's pre-election statements on economic policy—it is difficult to find a single significant issue about which they have told the truth. This lack of candour is designed to conceal the devastating effects of the last five years of economic stagnation. The delay in economic recovery has meant that capital has been strapped, and growth has been constrained by capacity at much lower levels without hitting the constraints of inflation or the balance of payments.

Before the general election, the Government were telling the British people that, in 1996-97, the economy would be 16 per cent. larger than in 1992. This year, that forecast has been revised downwards to 10 per cent. That revision downwards suggests that the Government concede that they were over-optimistic before the general election; no doubt, they hope that no one will attribute unworthy motives to them. They claim that an economic recovery is under way, and they reduce their growth forecast rather than increasing it. The truth is that, on the Government's own figures, by the end of this Parliament —should it run its course—output will be some 6 per cent. lower, and the country will be some £40 billion poorer —that is, £700 per year for every man, woman and child.

Mr. Butterfill: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I cheerfully give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Butterfill: Can the hon. Gentleman name another OECD country whose forecasting has been any more accurate? Does he think that Chancellor Kohl in Germany was any more accurate—particularly when he told the German people that unification would not cost them any more?

Mr. Brown: This is not an error of forecasting, but something a little more substantial. It is not a forecast which worries me so much—although, of course, it is possible in every speech to make fun of forecasts. I am worried about the outcome. Why are the other G7 countries able to do so much better in regard to growth rates up to 1994 than we are? Why is their figure 9 per cent., while ours is 1 per cent.? That is not a forecast; it is now almost a foreseeable outcome. The problem has a peculiarly British dimension. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman addressed it in his speech, but I shall be happy to give way to him again, although it is almost madness to do so.

Mr. Butterfill: The hon. Gentleman is traditionally over-generous. Perhaps he should look at the possible outturn for the other G7 countries in the next couple of years. I suspect that they are on a delayed path towards what has happened here.

Mr. Brown: I prefer to take a reasonable look at the cycle, rather than picking and choosing as the hon. Gentleman clearly does. I look forward to debating these matters with him in Committee: I can see that he is fighting hard to get on to the Committee, but he will be aware that, since the general election, the ratio between Government and Opposition is slightly smaller. As the hon. Gentleman has not always been a reliable vote for the Government in the past, I think that some pretty firm pledges will have to be given to those who organise these matters in the Conservative party before we can enjoy exchanges such as this late into the night and, indeed, into the early morning.

The Government's fibs about growth are as nothing compared with what they said about tax, in particular what they said about value added tax. I should like, however, to deal with two other matters.

The hon. Member for Surrey, North-West (Sir M. Grylls) mentioned unitary tax. There have been press reports today of the American Administration's decision. Although there is no difference in principle on this issue between the Opposition and the Government, we take it very seriously indeed and will seek to explore the Government's position in Committee. Amendments will probably be tabled to the clauses dealing with advance corporation tax. They will be designed to probe the Government's commitment to the retaliatory clauses.

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York): I know that my hon. Friend is aware that the ACT proposals will have a bad effect on charities which enjoy income from investment in equities, but is he aware that the Joseph Rowntree charitable trust, based in my constituency, found that, if those provisions had applied last year, its income would have been cut by £110,000? Many of the projects which it co-funds with the Government would have gone by default. If the Government tax charities in that way, they will lose money for public welfare schemes. Will my hon. Friend give an undertaking that he and other Labour Members will press this point in Committee?

Mr. Brown: I can most certainly give my hon. Friend the assurance that he seeks. It would be peculiar to structure the changes that the Government intend to make in such a way as specifically to disadvantage charitable institutions. We intend to explore that issue in detail in Committee. My hon. Friend was right to raise it.

A number of hon. Members, most notably my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes), referred to the petroleum revenue tax provisions. Again, we shall explore those provisions in detail in Committee. It will set the tone for those debates if I say now that we oppose the Chancellor's proposals for two reasons. First, we do not believe it right to rely solely on corporation tax as the mechanism for raising taxation from the North sea. If profits have fallen since 1986, that does not necessarily mean that they will not rise again. Relying on corporation tax may mean that the Exchequer is deprived of future revenue. Secondly, we should not like provisions to be enacted which could lead to a drop in North sea exploration, particularly when one appreciates that the North sea is in competition with other parts of the world for the interest of oil companies.

I turn now to a matter that every hon. Member, without exception, has mentioned either directly or indirectly—clause 42. If clause 42 were a poster, it would be used by Benetton to advertise its products. Clause 42 is a betrayal of a specific commitment, given by the Government before the election, so it may help Conservative Members, particularly those who have expressed reservations about it, to explore how it came about by following the progress of pledges given by those on the Treasury Bench in the run-up to and after the general election.

As early as 17 October 1991, the Financial Secretary's predecessor, Francis Maude, said in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett):

"I will give the hon. Lady a straight answer."

That set the tone for what came afterwards. He continued:

"In the middle and late 1980s, we managed at the same time to increase spending . . . to run a substantial budget surplus and to reduce tax, and we shall be able to do so again."—[Official Report, 17 October 1991; Vol. 196, c. 426.]

One out of three is not bad, but I am not sure that increased spending was the one out of the three that the hon. Gentleman would have chosen.

History continues. On 13 February 1992, John Maples, another member of the Treasury team who failed to get re-elected at the general election, told the House:

"We have no problem in this regard; we do not need to raise taxes"—

apparently, hon. Members then shouted, "You have," and he continued:

"We have set out our tax and spending plans for the next three years."

That was in February 1992, so it should have taken us through 1993, 1994 and 1995. He said that the Government did not need to raise taxes, but that turned out not to be true.

During the same extravagant Treasury Question Time Mr. Maples said:

"My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has made it clear that we have no intention of raising the rate of VAT either before or after the election."

That did not turn out to be true either. He later said:

"My right hon. Friend . . . has made it perfectly clear we have no intention of increasing VAT. We have made our plans on spending and tax perfectly clear. We do not need to raise VAT".—[Official Report, 13 February 1993; Vol. 203, c. 1106-08.]

He said it often enough but, as we know, it was not true.

The present Secretary of State for Employment was also at it. On 12 March, she said:

"I am happy to repeat the categoric pledges given by my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Chancellor"— rope them all in—

"that there will be no increase in the standard rate of VAT either before or after the election. We have no need and have no plans to extend the standard rate or to put up other taxes."—[Official Report, 12 March 1992; Vol. 205, c. 961.]

The latter part of that statement did not turn out to be true either, did it?

On 11 June 1992, after the general election, the present Paymaster General told the House:

"We have no plans and no need to raise or extend VAT, as my right hon. Friends have said on numerous occasions."—[Official Report, 11 June 1992; Vol. 209, c. 440.]

On 10 December 1992, the Paymaster General was again asked whether the Government intended to increase or extend the standard rate of VAT or to increase other taxes. Referring to the general election, he told the House:

"Those categorical pledges stand as they did at that time."—[Official Report, 10 December 1992; Vol. 215, c. 986.]

By 4 February 1993, however, the Government were getting coy. At Question Time, the Paymaster General tried to finesse a question by pretending that he thought that we were asking about the previous rather than the next Budget. In response to a question on 4 March 1993—let us remember that the Budget was on 16 March—the Economic Secretary to the Treasury said that he could give the assurance

"that all these matters are carefully taken into account in assessing the Budget strategy."—[Official Report, 4 March 1993; Vol. 220, c. 446.]

The Government resiled pretty late from a range of promises.

Lest anyone think that the Liberals have anything to be proud of, during the long exchanges about the rate and breadth of VAT, the Liberal spokesman asked about VAT, racehorses and the bloodstock industry, so he may be happy with the outcome and regard it as helpful in that narrow respect. In the more significant matter of VAT on fuel, charities and domestic consumers, however, they have rather missed the boat.

My hon. Friends the Members for Dulwich (Ms Jowell) and for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Cunningham) said that extending the VAT base was a highly regressive measure. If all zero-rated categories were included, it would raise about £10·7 billion for the Exchequer, but the poorest 10 per cent. of households would be £7 a week worse off. The richest 10 per cent. would be £11 a week worse off but, as proportions of household incomes, those figures represent 7 per cent. and 2 per cent. respectively.

Clause 42 is structured in such a way that it would be possible for it to be followed—next year, for example—by further extensions of the VAT base. Sewerage and newspapers, for example, might appeal to the Chancellor. When considering such matters, it is important that the House should realise that increases in the VAT rate and the shift from direct to indirect taxation have already had a regressive effect. The poorest 10 per cent. of households are 4·4 per cent. worse off than they would be if VAT were at its 1979 level—that is the case now, without taking these changes into account—while the richest 10 per cent. of households are just 2·9 per cent. worse off as a result of increased VAT.

It is true that the recession has taken its toll on the public as well as the private purse. On the question whether the tax increases will solve the problem, my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) rightly pointed out some flaws in the Conservative party's case. Public borrowing last year was more than £8 billion higher than the Chancellor expected at the time of the last Budget, and even turned out £1·5 billion higher than announced in this Budget in figures released just one month later.

Given the short-term problem of lack of demand in the economy, I can see why the Chancellor delayed some of his increases in taxation. But even when the sizeable increases announced in the Budget for future years have fully come into effect in 1995-96, they will reduce public borrowing by only one fifth. Even with five years of growth and three years of above-trend growth, on the Government's forecast public borrowing will still be 3·75 per cent. of GDP by 1997-98. Public sector debt will have increased from £150 billion to nearly £400 billion and will continue to increase. I think that we can therefore probably expect further regressive tax increases, perhaps even later this year.

In an excellent speech, my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) said that we needed a policy for the long term—something more than is implied in an answer that the Chancellor gave my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) on 28 November 1991:

"He asked how we are going to pay for the borrowing. We shall pay for the borrowing by borrowing—that is the normal way in which one pays for it."—[Official Report, 28 November 1991; Vol. 199, c. 1062.]

Clearly, the former Prime Minister was no longer in office, as she would not have let the right hon. Gentleman get away with that.

Every Opposition Member who has spoken has referred to the Conservative party's election pledges—that there would be no tax increases, no national insurance increases, no cuts in mortgage tax relief, no increase in value added tax, no broadening of the value added tax base, no devaluation; that there would be continued membership of the ERM; that the recession would come to an end a year ago—and to the phoney pre-election growth forecasts.

At the election, the Conservative party lied about our tax policies; now the electorate can see the extent to which it lied about its own tax policies. When the Conservatives said, "Labour will cost you an extra £20 a week," they did not go on to say, "whereas the Conservative party will only cost you £8·50." The Bill is constructed on dishonesty, and I urge the House to reject it.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): There is a relatively narrow strip of common land in the Budget and I want to begin on it following the speech made earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West (Sir M. Grylls) on the subject of unitary tax. My hon. Friend has played a distinguished part in leading the expression of the long-standing concern that exists on both sides of the House about that subject. I take this opportunity to state clearly that the Government continue to share my hon. Friend's view that the unitary tax concept legislated for in California is not one that we can recognise within a recognisable system of double taxation treaties.

The House should be in no doubt about the basis of the case that Barclays is bringing within the American courts. It is arguing, with our support, that any state tax system in the United States that collects an arbitrary share of the worldwide profits of a company is contrary to the existing double taxation treaty between Britain and the United States. We had understood that that view was shared by the American Federal Government. It appears that that is not the case, and the Government must therefore now review their position. I do not believe that a double taxation treaty can continue to exist indefinitely between two Governments who believe that it means different things. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor will be seeking clarification of the American Government's views when he is in Washington later this week.

On another matter on which there is a widely held view, let me comment on the opinion expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) and several other of my hon. Friends who drew attention to the length of this year's Bill. My hon. Friends will be aware that the ambition of short, brief and clear legislation has been shared by Governments of all political complexions dating back to Oliver Cromwell, a distinguished predecessor of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister as the Member for Huntingdon.

Oliver Cromwell once expressed an ambition to reduce the laws of England to the size of a pocket book. He did not make much progress in that direction and I suppose that we are some way behind. However, I give my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West the assurance that he sought: we shall resist, where humanly possible, the temptation to add further to the length of what we recognise is already a long Bill.

I want now to consider petroleum revenue tax, an issue in respect of which there is rather less agreement between the two sides of the House. We shall, of course, return to that subject in detail in Committee. However, it is essential to restate the elements behind the Government's proposed changes. Those elements have now gained a significant level of support in all parts of the oil industry.

Our approach is to cut by one third the marginal rate of petroleum revenue tax on existing fields, because we recognise that that will encourage development and therefore bring forward jobs in the development sector on existing and proven reserves and also because we recognise that the lower rate of PRT on existing fields will prolong the life of those fields.

It can therefore be said to be a measure designed to ensure that we recover the maximum economic reserves out of the North sea. We are also proposing to abolish PRT on future fields. As we are abolishing the tax on future fields, we are also abolishing tax allowances on future fields. The House should pause for a moment and recognise that it is rather strange to argue that we should keep a tax in place in order to operate a system of allowances. That is exactly the kind of system that we have now in many respects, and it has two characteristics which should not command support in the House.

The system has led me into the rather remarkable position—I suspect almost uniquely among tax Ministers—of being responsible for a tax system which, instead of raising money for the Government, actually costs the Government money. On figures published by the oil industry itself, in respect of a typical new field, the system has led to a subsidy from the taxpayer for oil production running at a rate of about £1·60 a barrel.

There is widespread recognition within the industry that that system cannot endure. Of course, the Government recognise that we must avoid unnecessary dislocation, and we shall seek to do that. However, the Government believe that it is equally obvious that the existing system cannot endure and must be changed.

Mr. Salmond: The Financial Secretary is quite wrong: the proposal in the Budget is losing support all the time, as is clear from the oil industry press. However, will he answer the question about consultation? Was there consultation with the Department of Trade and Industry and the Scottish Office before the proposal was announced in the Budget? Is it a piece of collective irresponsibility, or is the Treasury alone responsible for this shambles?

Mr. Dorrell: I certainly will not refer to the discussions that go on within Government. However, I will comment on the proposition that there should be consultation with the industry. It seems to be a rather odd proposition that, before a Government consider raising tax, they must engage in consultations to give notice of their intentions so that the industry can bring forward its activity to take advantage of the tax system that we are seeking to remove.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Dorrell: No, I want to move on to another issue that was raised by several hon. Members—the Government's proposals on VAT.

The Opposition's reaction to the VAT proposals has been interesting. In the months or six weeks since the Budget, they have launched a number of arguments against the proposals. They have been extremely fleet of foot moving from one argument to another as they discover that the arguments that they first mounted do not work.

The Opposition began by claiming that the distributional effect of the Budget was unfair. That argument was shot down by the Institute of Fiscal Studies, which made it clear that the Budget raised roughly the same share of income across the income scale. Therefore, they cannot use that argument.

Labour Members then said that the Government would not make good the effect of the VAT changes on the poorest sections of the community. That was a clear scare, which was shot down by the words of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in the Budget, when he made clear our commitment to provide extra help for those on means-tested benefits. The next argument was——

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Can the Minister tell the House whether the Government will compensate in full those people on state benefits for the cost?

Mr. Dorrell: Since Budget day, we have said clearly that we shall take account of the VAT changes in the benefit upratings which will be announced next autumn.

Labour Members then argued that the Government were not interested in fuel prices. Understandably, they moved off that quickly when they were reminded that, in the past 10 years, electricity prices have fallen by 8·5 per cent. and gas prices by 15 per cent., both of them in real terms. That is in sharp contrast to the 30 per cent. increase in real terms in electricity prices which was introduced by the Labour Government between 1974 and 1979—the period when the Leader of the Opposition was an Energy Minister. Labour Members had to move off that argument quickly as well.

Mr. Brown: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dorrell: No.

Today, Labour Members argued that, because the VAT changes are revenue raising, they cannot also be motivated by the environmental considerations. That is a completely absurd argument. It calls to mind the words of former President Johnson when he was describing someone who he alleged could not do two things at once. He said that that politician was so dumb that he could not walk and chew gum at the same time. That may be true of some Labour Members: it is not true of Conservative Members. The VAT changes are part of a revenue-raising plan. We are not raising £3 billion by accident. The changes are part of our commitment to deliver the Rio objective, which is strongly endorsed, at least in theory, by the Labour party.

Mr. Brown: I am pleased that the Financial Secretary can make a speech and give way at the same time. I ask him again to give the House an assurance that people on state benefits will be compensated in full for the cost of the Chancellor's VAT exactions.

Mr. Dorrell: I have already responded to that point. My right hon. Friend's Budget addressed the need to do two things. He clearly said that he needed, first, to sustain the recovery that was under way and, secondly, to take action to reduce the Budget deficit. The signs of recovery are clear. Even the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) brought herself to say through clenched teeth that every sign of recovery is welcomed. She carried conviction. The words passed her lips, but she moved on to the next business as quickly as she reasonably could.

Last week was a black week for the Labour party, because we announced that industrial production is growing here when it is falling elsewhere in Europe. We announced that retail sales are up by 3 per cent., car registrations are up by 12 per cent. and house sales are up by 15 per cent. on the same period last year. When surveys are taken of business opinion, they do not share the views of Labour Members. As though to underline the gloom of the Labour Front Bench, on Thursday we announced a drop in the level of unemployment for the second consecutive month. Clearly, it is too soon to say that it is the beginning of a trend. However, we know that it is not, in the words of the Opposition employment spokesman, a freak or a fiddle.

Mr. Brown: Every Opposition Member hopes that the recession is coming to an end. Will the Financial Secretary explain why the Chancellor found it necessary to revise his growth forecasts down and not up?

Mr. Dorrell: We shall be able to consider such issues in the Committee.

Against that background, my right hon. Friend concluded that it would be wrong to impose a tax increase this year. I welcome the endorsement of my hon. Friends the Members for Bridlington (Mr. Townend), for Slough (Mr. Watts), for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) and for Milton Keynes, South-West (Mr. Legg) of that strategy. However, my hon. Friends rightly made their endorsement subject to two conditions, both of which the Government accept.

The first condition is that, while there will be no tax increase this year, there must be action to bring down the deficit in the medium term. That is why the Bill provides for what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor described as a tax wedge to address the budget deficit.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Dorrell: No. I am dealing with some remarks made by my hon. Friends.

The second condition that my hon. Friends made clear was that action must not be confined to the revenue side of the balance. They said that public expenditure restraint was essential. The Government agree with that and wholeheartedly endorse it. The Government share with my hon. Friends a commitment to control inflation. We shall not inflate our way out of debt. They also share with my hon. Friends a commitment to control the burden of taxation. We shall not tax our way out of debt.

Given those two commitments, the iron laws of arithmetic determine that we shall have to deliver—and deliver we shall—our commitment to restrain public expenditure within what can be afforded in the medium term. All that is in sharp contrast to the Labour party. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West, I came to the debate keen to know what was the economic policy of the Labour party.

On monetary policy, is the Labour party in favour of going back into the ERM or not, and under what terms? Is it still in favour of economic and monetary union? Does it believe that monetary policy is too tight or too loose? Its monetary policy used to be to fix interest rates at 2 per cent. below the level fixed by the Government. What is its monetary policy now?

Not only on monetary policy are the questions unanswered. What is the Labour party's fiscal policy? Is the level of borrowing too high or too low? [Interruption.]

[Mr. Dorrell]

The shadow Chief Secretary, the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) says that it is too high. That is an interesting proposition. How will she deliver her commitment to reduce the spending plans of the Labour party to bring the Budget deficit down? How will she do that against the background of the commitment given by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) on "The World this Weekend" in January, when he said:

"I'm not talking about raising income tax or national insurance or VAT".

He seems to have cast a large share of the burden for dealing with the deficit on the shadow Chief Secretary.

Either way, it is bad news for the hon. Member for Peckham. She cuts a rather sorry figure. There she sits—the political heir to Joel Barnett. Her job is to say no. Her job is to address the language of priorities and choices. Yet she prefers to live in a soft-focus world where to want is to have, where there are no choices, no difficult decisions, no priorities and no disappointments.

I remember well the days when the hon. Member for Peckham was a health spokesman. She would speculate about Labour's plans for spending on the NHS. Those speculations were expensive enough. Now she speculates not only about health but about education, training, employment measures and overseas aid. All that is against the background of the commitment made by the shadow Chancellor that there would be neither tax increases nor borrowing increases. The House and the country want to know who speaks with authority on behalf of the Labour party.

Labour's economic policy is like a much-loved ancient monument. It is a familiar part of the landscape. It undergoes the occasional face-lift, but its essential elements are passed lovingly from generation to generation. Like all such creations, it was never designed. Its distinctive shape, its higgledy-piggledy charm, are testament to the creative genius of the composite resolution. But the essential elements of the confection are clear. It was designed for a bygone era. The planners insist that successive generations maintain a range of adornments, the purpose of which is lost in the mists of time. Its maintenance would cost very large sums of public money. It has no relevance to today's economic needs. It is in sharp contrast to the Bill, which addresses today's needs and which I commend to the House.

9.59 pm

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr) rose——

Madam Speaker: Is this a point of order?

Mr. Rooker: It is not a point of order, Madam Speaker. I stood up to be called.

The Financial Secretary did not have an opportunity to give way to me, and I should like to spend a couple of minutes to make the point that I would have made had he done so. [Interruption.] If Conservative Members do not realise by now that the Second Reading of the Finance Bill is not subject to the 10 o'clock rule, they have now found that out. Incidentally, the Financial Secretary is no Robert Sheldon either.

I should like to take up what the Minister said about no tax increases this year. I was late arriving at the House today, because I took a few hours off to visit one of the shire counties in middle England. The local people, on the margin of the low-paid, asked me why I had not operated my tax law and why they will pay more taxes. I said that I would take the first opportunity to correct the record.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer is deliberately increasing taxes for 500 people in every constituency—that is the effect on the low-paid of freezing the tax allowances. It is no good the Financial Secretary saying that the Government are not raising taxes. How can it be justified for 500 of the lowest-paid people in every constituency, who would not normally pay tax, to be called upon to pay tax in order to pay for the tax reliefs to business? How can that not be called an increase in taxation? It is dishonest of the Government to claim that there has not been a tax increase when 300,000 people will pay tax in this tax year. They are some of the lowest-paid people, and the Government should be damn well ashamed of themselves.

The Government have said that the recovery is here, and they have quoted a catalogue of good news. How can we justify, therefore, the lowest-paid people being expected to face an increase in their tax burden from zero to 20p in the pound? That imposition is in addition to the added burden of VAT on domestic fuel.

We will debate this issue at some length in Committee. That is all that I wanted to put to the Financial Secretary. How can he justify the immorality of taxing 500 of the lowest-paid people in every constituency when the good times are now here?

Question put, That the Bill be now read a Second time:—

Affordable Housing

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Chapman.]

10.20 pm

Sir Fergus Montgomery (Altrincham and Sale): I am grateful for the opportunity to have an Adjournment debate. Usually when I have such debates, they come in the early hours of the morning, so I am pleased to have one at a civilised hour.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will take note of the points that I shall make. In a perfect world, we would not have a problem about affordable housing. If the housing stock of the country were shared out carefully—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Could the door be closed? It is far too noisy and I cannot hear the hon. Gentleman.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: Thank you, Madam Speaker.

In a perfect world, we would not have a problem about affordable housing. However, problems such as the terrible increase in divorce, with the result that where one home sufficed now we need two, and the increase in the number of young people leaving home and gravitating to big cities have all led to an increase in housing problems.

Housing associations are now the main providers of new homes for people with low incomes. I have to declare an interest, as my wife is chairman of a housing association and a member of the Housing Corporation. It might be better if she were making the speech tonight instead of me, because she knows a great deal more about housing than I do. Some would say that she knows a great deal more about everything than I do, but naturally I would not accept that.

The purpose of the Adjournment debate is to highlight the concerns of housing associations over the proposed cuts in grant rates. As my hon. Friend the Minister knows, the Government provide an average of 72 per cent. of the capital cost of new housing association homes. That is due to drop to 67 per cent. in 1993-94, and the Government have announced the objective of reducing the levels of subsidy to an average—I underline "average"—60 per cent. in 1994-95 and down to an average of 55 per cent. in 1995-96. I emphasise the word "average" because it is an average for the country as a whole. In the north-west, where my constituency is, the figures would be 45 and 37 per cent. respectively.

If those figures materialised, rents on new homes built with a 55 per cent. subsidy would, on average, be 75 per cent. higher than they were last year. To put that into simple language that people understand, it would mean that a rent of £48 now would rocket to £84 a week. If that happened, it would adversely affect tenants who were working but who would find it difficult to pay such an increase in rent.

It is accepted that housing associations should be concentrating on housing for those in greatest need, which usually means the poorest families. Consequently, the high percentage of new tenants who are eligible for housing benefit is proof that housing associations are being successful in their target. However, there is concern about the cost to the Exchequer of housing benefit, and it is felt that maintaining housing association grants would reduce future housing association benefits.

My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing, who I acknowledge got an enormous amount for housing, and who is regarded as knowing more about housing than just about any other hon. Member, gave a lecture on 4 March in which he emphasised benefit tapers and work incentives. The combination of withdrawal rates for housing benefit, family credit and community charge benefits means that households in benefit need to earn about £25 a week more just to have £1 a week in disposable income. That is a horrifying figure.

The rent levels that housing associations are increasingly having to charge their tenants, especially those with children, require a higher income than the majority could ever earn to escape the severe effect of the tapers. I am told that, at current rent levels, 46 per cent. of working tenant couples with three children would need to earn £100 a week more in order to escape. At the same time, the poorest people are being put in the newest social housing at rents that make it even more difficult for them to get out of the poverty trap and to better themselves.

If the proposed cuts in housing association grants are implemented, working households would face massive rent increases. On average, in the year 1996, that group will spend 39 per cent. of their income on rent, compared with 29 per cent. last year. The percentage of new working tenants spending more than one third of their income on rent would rise from 27 per cent. last year to a massive 76 per cent. in 1996. If that happens, could the new rents to be charged be considered to be even remotely affordable?

There is also the question of housing benefit. I am glad to see my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt)—the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security—in the Chamber, as I am glad that he is taking an interest in this matter. The National Federation of Housing Associations estimates that, if the average grant rate goes down to 55 per cent. in 1995-96, 89 per cent. of all new housing association tenants moving into new homes will be on housing benefit.

The federation makes three valid points. The first is that the percentage of all working households dependent on housing benefits would rise from 47 per cent. last year to 66 per cent. in 1996. Secondly, on average that group would qualify for just over £30 in weekly housing benefit in 1996, compared with just over £13 last year. Thirdly, the weekly income that that group would need to earn to escape any dependency on housing benefit would rise from £160 in 1992 to £224 in 1996. We come to the crunch question—in those circumstances, would it be worth new tenants having a job? I would have thought that the Government would want to encourage people to work, rather than have them stay in the benefits system.

Housing benefit is a complicated business. An article in the Financial Times on 21 April suggested that there were rumours that housing benefit may be the focus of attempts to make savings in the social security budget. One estimate was given of savings resulting from a steepening of the taper in the rate at which housing benefit is withdrawn as income increases, from the present 65 per cent. to 80 per cent. That would increase the maximum marginal deduction rate to 100 per cent. As a consequence, thousands more people would find themselves in a crippling poverty trap.

I shall give an example. If that happened, a single person who had a £1 increase in gross income would find that, with income tax of 25p, national insurance of 9p, housing benefit on an 80 per cent. taper of 53p, and council tax on a 20 per cent. taper of 13p, the total withdrawn from each additional £1 would be £1. That is a 100 per cent. marginal deduction rate. The person would lose all his pay increase through taxes and loss of benefit. The same would be true for families. That would severely affect work incentives.

There are other examples. A single person earning £120 a week would find that he had a weekly disposable income of less than £50. A single person earning £180 a week, with a net income of £139·28, paying £40 a week rent, council tax of £280 a year—about £5 a week—and travel expenses of £5 a week, would be left with a weekly disposable income of £89·28.

Compare that with the single person receiving £44 income support, £40 housing benefit, and £5 council tax benefit, totalling £89 per week. A single person would have to find a job paying at least £180 before he or she was even a few pennies better off in work than out of it. I cannot believe that we should be encouraging that sort of thing.

Under the capital rule, anyone with capital of £16,000 is disqualified from housing benefit. Capital below £3,000 is disregarded. With capital between £3,000 and £16,000, a notional amount of interest is assumed at the rate of £1 per week for every £250 of capital. I only wish that I could find some way of enjoying that sort of return from my savings. In fairness, that rate of tariff income is too high and is a disincentive to saving. I hope that also will be examined. It would be fairer to assume a tariff income of 50p per week for every £250 of capital.

I hope that the Minister can give some assurance to housing associations throughout the country, because they are extremely worried about the proposed reductions in grant aid. Affordable housing must be provided for the poorest people in this country, and we must ensure that the housing benefit system does not militate against those who want to work and to help themselves, and that we do not penalise the elderly who have been thrifty during their working lives.

The reduced grant rate objectives will have four main effects. They will worsen affordability problems; increase housing benefit dependency and reinforce the poverty trap; make housing association revenue streams increasingly dependent on housing benefit—making them, in the view of private investors, a political risk and diminish their quality; and create difficulty in raising private finance because of the adverse impact on loan security for private investors.

I therefore hope that the Minister will heed the warnings from housing associations throughout the country.

10.32 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Tony Baldry): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale (Sir F. Montgomery) for raising the important subject of affordable housing, which is one that we take seriously—as evidenced by the presence on the Government Front Bench of my hon. Friends the Minister for Housing and Planning and the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, who has responsibility for housing benefit.

My hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale has always taken a close interest in housing policy and as he pointed out, his wife, Lady Montgomery, is chairman of the Manchester and district housing association and a distinguished member of the Housing Corporation. Her work is much appreciated.

Our aim is that a decent home should be within reach of every family. That commitment means using public money to best effect, which in turns means extracting the best value from every pound spent and making maximum use of private finance levered in to support public spending.

Most people prefer to own their own homes. We have expanded home ownership from 56 per cent. in 1979 to 69 per cent. today—from half to well over two thirds during the lifetime of this Government. The right to buy for council tenants, our rents to mortgages proposals, cash incentive schemes to enable council tenants to move out into owner-occupation and shared ownership schemes are all important parts of our commitment to empower those who want to own their own homes to become home owners.

With mortgage rates at their lowest for 25 years, some impressive fixed-rate mortgage deals on offer and better and better economic news, now is an excellent time for those thinking about buying their own home to do so. The evidence of increased mortgage lending suggests that people are doing exactly that.

Of course, not every household will want or be able to afford owner-occupation. We must therefore ensure that sufficient good-quality rented accommodation is available. In the private sector, we have ended 75 years of restrictive legislation that had almost killed the private rented sector, to which most people used to look first for housing. There is now evidence of an increase in the number of private lettings. We are determined to continue to reinforce a well run, well managed private rented sector to help meet the need for housing.

Many people will rightly continue to be housed by local authorities. Here we are making a gradual shift from across-the-board rent subsidies—which went indiscriminately to all tenants, whether they needed help or not—towards targeted, income-related assistance to those who genuinely need the most financial help. This means that, when tenants can afford to pay more towards their housing costs, they do so. Tenants who cannot meet the full cost of the rents will receive means-related help through housing benefit. It must be right to move subsidy away from buildings—away from bricks and mortar—towards the people who live in those buildings, and who really need the subsidy.

As enablers, local authorities are responsible for developing the housing strategies for their areas, in partnerships with a wide range of groups—in particular, housing associations. Local authorities are responsible for the efficient management of their own housing stock, and for ensuring the provision of accommodation for the statutory homeless. However—as my hon. Friend made clear—local authorities are no longer the main suppliers of new social housing for rent; that role has been taken on by housing associations.

Housing associations can attract private investment to supplement public spending, and are thus able to build more houses for rent. Over the past five years, public spending on housing association grant has been supplemented by more than £2 billion of private-sector finance—a substantial gain to housing output at a time of public spending restraint. That private finance has made possible a great deal of additional investment in social housing.

Housing association properties have always been intended for those on limited incomes who cannot afford owner-occupation or the alternatives offered in the private rented sector. It is therefore not surprising that many housing association tenants receive housing benefit. We must remember that housing benefit goes a considerable way up the income scale. The fact that a substantial number of new tenants receive benefit demonstrates that new social housing is going to those in greatest need; but diversity in lettings has always been important, and our latest figures show that more than a quarter of new housing association lettings were made to tenants who are not on housing benefit.

My hon. Friend posed the important question, "Is it worth while for people on housing benefit to have jobs? Should we not encourage people to work rather than to depend on benefits?" I think I quote my hon. Friend reasonably accurately. I entirely agree that getting people off benefit and into employment is vital for the economy and vital for individual prosperity. Our housing benefit taper policy helps to ensure that anyone with income above income support levels will be better off in work. With the taper set at 65 per cent., no tenant, having paid his rent, will be left with an amount to live on that is lower than the appropriate income support level.

The steep taper is essential to ensure that maximum help is directed at those who most need it. At the same time, it keeps the overall cost and scope of the scheme under control. To reduce the taper to 50 per cent. would have a very substantial annual cost of no less than £340 million. I believe that our view of this issue is understandably coloured at present by the impact of the recession. We need to look beyond that to the future. As the economic cycle turns, more jobs will be created and more people will be able to get jobs to enable them to come right out of the housing benefit system, and keep a dramatically higher percentage of their income.

But people on low incomes need to know that provision is being made for them in the housing market. Our manifesto promised 153,000 new homes to rent over a period of three years. We will do much better than that. The Housing Corporation estimates that around 80,000 new homes have been provided by Housing Associations, backed by corporation and local authority housing association grant, in 1992-93 alone—nearly three times the output of the previous year.

As I have already made clear, private sector finance is important to ensure that public spending provides as many decent new homes for families as possible. Private finance enables a third more homes to be built with the available public money than would otherwise be the case. Therefore, we have to strike a balance between rent levels and the number of homes provided. If we provide Housing Association subsidy at a higher level, we must forgo extra output, and that means leaving families in bed and breakfast, or other unsatisfactory accommodation.

The key point—it is a straightforward one—in the debate is that housing associations this year, despite reductions in housing association grants, have bid by a factor of more than four and a half times for the number of schemes that can be supported by the resources available. In other words, housing associations, knowing what the grant level for this year is, have notwithstanding bid by a factor of more than a four and a half times for the number of schemes that can be supported. That clearly suggests that, whatever concerns housing associations may express in public, they have considerable confidence in their ability to make use of their resources available at lower grant rates and to achieve higher outputs.

We have made it clear that our objective is to increase the proportion of private finance input to new schemes in the future by reducing grant rates to 60 per cent. in 1994-95, but we have also always made it clear that final decisions will be taken only when we have assessed the likely impact on the ability of housing associations to raise the private finance necessary. The advice of the Housing Corporation on this matter will obviously be listened to with very great care.

But whatever the level of capital spending, we shall inevitably have to choose between the number of houses that we can build and the level of rents that are to be charged. Public investment in housing must be concerned with tackling housing need, and that means seeking as far as possible to help those in greatest need.

Last year saw the first year-on-year reduction in families being accepted as homeless by local authorities. As new homes are made available through the housing market package, the figures should continue to improve. The housing market package—announced in my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer's autumn statement—has meant that around 18,000 homes for rent will be made available in England. The 80 housing associations involved deserve great credit for their achievement. Purchases have been made right across the country, in almost all local authority areas, making a vital contribution to meeting local housing needs.

However, the families who may still be in unsatisfactory temporary accommodation and who need a home of their own will not thank us if we allow concern for existing tenants who are already well housed and who can afford to pay a little more towards the cost of their housing to be put ahead of the needs of those needing new homes.

I hope that I can reassure my hon. Friend that, although our objective is to increase the proportion of private finance input into new schemes because we want every pound of public money to go as far as possible in ensuring the highest possible output of new homes, I continue to make it clear that final decisions housing association grant rates will be taken only when we have assessed the likely impact on housing associations' ability to raise the necessary private finance. We are determined that housing associations shall play their full part in ensuring the greatest possible number of new homes to let, because we are committed to ensuring that a decent home is within the reach of every family.

Question put and agreed to.

PRIVATE BUSINESS

LONDON LOCAL AUTHORITIES BILL [Lords]
Order for Second Reading read.
To be read a Second time on Thursday 29 April.

Oral Answers to Questions

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

1. Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures she is introducing to assist the long-term unemployed in the north of England.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Patrick McLoughlin): New measures announced in the Budget will provide an extra 100,000 opportunities nationally for the long-term unemployed. Learning for work, community action and an expanded business start-up scheme will be available for long-term unemployed people.

Mr. Atkinson: Is my hon. Friend aware that Tyneside training and enterprise council, which I understand has been chosen for a pilot scheme for one of four workstart programmes, yesterday launched its own workstart programme, Tyneskill support, aimed at people who have been out of work for more than two years? Does my hon. Friend agree that the advantage of workstart is that it confers a double benefit—first, for the people who are helped and, secondly, in that it helps to convince employers that people who have been out of work for more than two years still retain their skills and an enthusiasm for work and should not be written off as unemployable?

Mr. McLoughlin: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend, who points out the amount of help that we give to people who are unemployed long term. Indeed, the United Kingdom has a good record compared with our European counterparts. The proportion of long-term unemployed people in the United Kingdom, at 28 per cent., is lower than in Italy, where it is 67 per cent., in Belgium, where it is 61 per cent., in Ireland, where it is 60 per cent., in Germany, where it is 45 per cent., and in the Netherlands, where it is 43 per cent. That shows that we dedicate help to the long-term unemployed.

Mr. Lewis: Does the Minister's litany of assistance include encouraging people to go on the sick register instead of the unemployment register? Will he ask his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to order the investigation that I have requested into the scandal going on in the Employment Service in my constituency?

Mr. McLoughlin: It is rather sad that when we have seen unemployment falling for two months, the only people who complain about it, and continue to do so, are Labour Members. That is not surprising, in view of the way that they have relished it when unemployment has continued to rise.

Mr. Trotter: May I say how much Tyneside will appreciate being chosen for one of the new schemes and how appropriate it is that an area of high unemployment, with an excellent basic record of industrial relations and skills, should have the opportunity to make itself available for inward and home-based investment as the recession ends? The news will be much welcomed in the community on Tyneside.

Mr. McLoughlin: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He is right to say that the scheme will have an important impact. We shall watch it closely to see what lessons we can learn from it.

Ms Quin: Will the Minister confirm that there is a massive problem of long-term unemployment on Tyneside and that the scheme to which the hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) referred aims to create 400 jobs for the long-term unemployed by July, whereas there are 32,000 long-term unemployed people on Tyneside? Will the Minister agree to support some of the ideas advanced by the Labour party to bring Government Departments together in an office in the north to identify and promote employment opportunities in the region?

Mr. McLoughlin: It would make a great difference if we started to receive some support from the Labour party for the many schemes that we try to offer long-term unemployed people. The Labour party is always lacking in enthusiasm. The hon. Lady rightly mentions the high unemployment in the northern region, but in July 1986 unemployment in that region stood at 220,000, whereas according to the latest figures it is now 166,000—25 per cent. lower. I should have thought that even the Opposition would welcome that.

Total Quality Management

2. Mr. Stephen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether she will use the techniques of total quality management to measure the extent to which her Department is efficiently delivering the service which industry and commerce need.

The Minister of State, Department of Employment (Mr. Michael Forsyth): Total quality management has a part to play in the Department's drive to improve services and to ensure value for money.

Mr. Stephen: Will my hon. Friend ask a senior official in his Department to liaise closely with the European Foundation for Quality Management and to explore whether the excellent self-assessment model it has developed would benefit the public service?

Mr. Forsyth: Anything that improves quality management at a European level is to be welcomed. I will pass on my hon. Friend's helpful suggestion to officials in the Department.

Mr. McAllion: Does the Minister accept that his Department's ability to deliver services efficiently depends at least in part on its reputation for honesty? That being so, can he explain to the House why he allowed Sir Robin Butler, the head of the civil service, to write to civil service unions on 16 March saying that the imposition of no-strike clauses on public sector workers was not even under consideration when, 18 days earlier on 26 February, the Secretary of State for Employment had written to the Secretary of State for Education saying that she intended to amend the Employment Bill to make industrial action by public sector workers unlawful? That letter was copied and sent to Sir Robin Butler.

Either Sir Robin Butler is so inefficient that he does not even read letters from the Secretary of State for Employment which are copied and sent to him or he is deliberately covering up for the Government by misleading civil service unions. Which is it? Did the Department know about that? If so, did it consent to it?

Mr. Forsyth: The trouble with the hon. Gentleman is that when he scrabbles around in dustbins reading bits of paper, he ends up misinformed. The position that the Cabinet Secretary set out—which is that the Government have not considered introducing, nor do they have any plans to introduce, legislation to prevent industrial action in the public sector—remains the case. The hon. Gentleman is at a disadvantage in that he has relied for his information on scraps of paper that were based on leaked information.

Mr. Evennett: Does my hon. Friend agree that the training and enterprise council network is improving the quality and effectiveness of his Department's training programme? Does he agree that the job seekers charter is improving the service throughout the Employment Service? Both schemes are to be welcomed and encouraged, and show that his Department is doing a good job for people seeking jobs.

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with my hon. Friend. Since my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State took charge of the Department, the number of opportunities for the unemployed to obtain help in getting back to work or to obtain help with training has increased from around 1 million to 1,600,000. That dramatic record of achievement has been thanks to the efforts of the Employment Service, the training and enterprise councils and Ministers across the Government. I should have thought that that would be welcomed by everyone in the House.

Disabled People

3. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what progress is being made to reduce discrimination against disabled people in the context of employment; and if she will make a statement.

7. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures she is taking to promote employment opportunities for people with disabilities.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: We aim to raise employers' awareness of the abilities of disabled people and to provide practical employment help and advice where necessary.

Mr. Wigley: Does the Minister accept that, either deliberately or inadvertently, a significant number of employers discriminate against disabled people in terms of employment? Does he accept that the overwhelming majority of organisations working with and on behalf of disabled people want anti-discrimination legislation? What is the Department's latest thinking on how to make that a reality?

Mr. Forsyth: I know how much time the hon. Gentleman spends on this subject, especially in his role as vice-chairman of the all-party disablement group. I accept his point that we need to do even more to encourage employers to take on disabled people and to make use of their skills. Disabled people certainly find it harder to obtain work when unemployed, especially during a recession.

I am sure that we must look at ways to reduce discrimination and to encourage opportunities for disabled people. Although it is easy to look to legislation as the answer, the hon. Gentleman needs to address some of the difficulties that arise because of the legal complexities and the costs it would impose, which may not be to the advantage of disabled people. I am happy to continue the helpful discussion going on with the hon. Gentleman and others in the House on how some of the problems may be addressed.

Mr. Thurnham: Does my hon. Friend agree that the private sector has a much better record than the public sector in employing people with disabilities? Will he recruit more disabled people in the civil service? Will he expand the successful sheltered placements scheme? Is not privatisation in the best interests of everyone, not least the disabled?

Mr. Forsyth: The answers to my hon. Friend's questions are: I am not sure, yes, yes and yes.

Mr. Galbraith: Can the Minister say why, despite the fact that only 23 per cent. of employers adhere to the quota, there have been no prosecutions whatever under the Government? Is it not time that the Government reviewed the quota system with a view to enforcing it properly?

Mr. Forsyth: We are certainly examining the quota system. The hon. Gentleman will recognise that the 3 per cent. figure relates to registered disabled. The number of people who are registered as disabled is less than 3 per cent. of the work force and, therefore, it would be mathematically impossible for all employers to meet the quota. We take seriously employers who are not meeting their obligations. We try to ensure that they do so by persuasion. The policy of not having had prosecutions reflects the conduct of every Government in the past 40 years.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Does my hon. Friend agree that the end of the recession and the extremely welcome recovery in the labour market make it an especially appropriate moment to introduce legislation to prevent discrimination in employment against disabled people? Will he reflect that the fears that have been expressed about the cost implications of such legislation are invalidated by the immense contribution that disabled people could make to the economy and that experience shows that nothing less than anti-discrimination legislation would enable that contribution to be released?

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with my hon. Friend that enlisting the talents of disabled people is a key element in ensuring that we maximise the performance of our economy as well as meet the needs of individuals. I would want to discuss my hon. Friend's specific ideas for legislation and its form before jumping to the conclusion that he reached. I would point to some of the difficulties that have arisen in other countries as a result of perhaps not thinking the matter through as carefully as it should have been. I should be happy to meet my hon. Friend to discuss his ideas in detail.

Labour Statistics

4. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people were unemployed for 12 months and longer in May 1979 and at the latest available date.

The Secretary of State for Employment (Mrs. Gillian Shephard): The figures for January 1993 show a reduction of almost 10 per cent. in the number of people who have been unemployed for 12 months or more, compared with January 1983—the earliest date for which equivalent figures are available.

Mr. Winnick: Is the Secretary of State aware that it is perfectly understandable that she has not given the figure for 1979, which is 366,700? I have just obtained that information from the Library. Is it not a fact that three times as many people have been unemployed for longer than one year than when the Labour Government left office? Is not the Secretary of State ashamed of the misery and heartbreak of so many of our fellow citizens who are long-term unemployed, many of whom work on the assumption that, even with the slow recovery which is taking place, they will never be able to work again? They are the victims of the Government's economic policies.

Mrs. Shephard: I would not want in any way to minimise the difficulty for people who suffer long-term unemployment. The simple fact is that the number of long-term unemployed people is almost a quarter—24 per cent.—lower than at its peak in 1986. It is obvious from the hon. Gentleman's supplementary question that, like so many of his colleagues, he would have liked, and perhaps he was expecting, a more gloomy reply. I shall add to his all-too-obvious discomfiture by inviting him to welcome the fact that in his constituency the reduction was 21 per cent.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the only jobs provided by the Government are the jobs of those who are directly employed by the public service or the quangos and other organisations set up in the public service area and that the jobs that are provided in the economy come as a result of the Government creating low inflation, low interest rates and competitive prices, thanks to white Wednesday? Consequently, we can look forward to improvements in the United Kingdom because we are more competitive than any other country in Europe.

Mrs. Shephard: I would not want to build too much on the improvement in unemployment that we have seen for the past two months. Of course, my hon. Friend is absolutely right. It is not the Government who create jobs; it is business, industry and commerce. It ill behoves Opposition Members to pour scorn on the good economic news, which is good news for unemployed people.

Mr. Grocott: Does the Secretary of State recall that throughout the past 14 years we have had repeated assurances from the Secretary of State for Employment, two Prime Ministers and others that all the dreadful unemployment statistics were nothing whatever to do with the Government? Now that Ministers claim that there is some marginal improvement in the unemployment statistics, will the Secretary of State take this opportunity to reaffirm to the House the Government philosophy that if there is any improvement it is nothing whatever to do with the Government?

Mrs. Shephard: What is absolutely certain is that only when Opposition Members express a commitment to keep Britain competitive, reject support for the national minimum wage and, in the case of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), support employers can their much vaunted and so-called support for unemployed people be taken seriously.

Mr. David Evans: Does my right hon. Friend agree that of the 1 million long-term unemployed, probably half have no intention of working again and, therefore, can be termed layabouts? Do the long-term unemployment figures include the lot opposite? They have been unemployed for 14 years.

Mrs. Shephard: My hon. Friend's strictures on fraud among people who call themselves unemployed are well known. I understand his anxiety because any fraud within the unemployment or benefits system can only serve to make things worse for people who are genuinely unemployed. As for the present or prospective employment of Opposition Members, my hon. Friend has made his point.

Workstart

5. Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what progress has been made in setting up the workstart pilot projects.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I have asked the Employment Service and the two training and enterprise councils in the pilot areas to submit plans by 7 May. I hope that the first employees to be taken on under the scheme will start work by June.

Mr. Beith: Does the Secretary of State realise how dissatisfied I am, as someone who advocated a workstart scheme and supports its principles, that long-term unemployed people in Northumberland—where there are many long-term unemployed—are excluded from the scheme both in my constituency and in the constituency of Hexham, which was mentioned earlier? At what stage will she decide whether to continue the scheme and whether to extend it?

Mrs. Shephard: I hope that the right hon. Gentleman welcomes the 2 per cent. fall in unemployment in his constituency last month. I also hope that he will welcome the fact that long-term unemployed people in his constituency and elsewhere will greatly benefit from the 1·6 million opportunities for long-term unemployed people that we now have on stream.

As for the pilots, the right hon. Gentleman will realise that a pilot is a pilot. If the pilot projects succeed, we shall certainly consider extending them.

Dr. Spink: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the return in confidence, the recovery and the workstart pilot scheme will give new opportunity, new hope and great help to the long-term unemployed in Britain?

Mrs. Shephard: I agree with my hon. Friend that the workstart pilots should be extremely useful. We will monitor them carefully to see what lessons can be learnt and, in particular, what special help, confidence and encouragement they can give to people who have been unemployed for a long time.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Does the Secretary of State nevertheless recognise that even though workstart is only a pilot scheme, people are worried that employers are being asked simply to give an undertaking that they will not make other people unemployed in order to take on people on workstart and, I assume, an undertaking that they will not simply dismiss people at the end of the scheme? In the same vein as the Secretary of State waxed eloquent about fraud among those who claim benefit, will she wax eloquent about fraud among employers who seek to abuse the system?

Mrs. Shephard: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point. The contracts with the participating firms will naturally stipulate that existing employees must not be displaced and that the workstart participants will be considered additional to normal recruitment. As he would expect, the scheme will be subject to close and careful monitoring.

Labour Statistics

6. Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many new jobs have been created in the Brigg and Cleethorpes constituency since January 1992.

Mr. McLoughlin: The information is not available in the form my hon. Friend requested. However, I am sure he will welcome the news that two American firms, notably Kimberly-Clark and Paramount Packaging, have chosen to invest in his constituency, bringing 800 new jobs to the area.

Mr. Brown: Does my hon. Friend agree that the information he has just revealed suggests that the recovery in the United Kingdom is centred on my constituency? Is he aware that it is hoped that the Kimberly-Clark project will eventually employ more than 2,500 people once it is fully operational and that my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade performed the topping-out ceremony at that factory just a few weeks ago? Is he further aware that a new power station was opened last week, which will employ 35 people, and that, in Cleethorpes, Allied Colloids announced that it will employ 90 people? Those jobs are in addition to those that my hon. Friend has just announced. Does he agree that the industrial recovery in the United Kingdom has begun in Brigg and Cleethorpes?

Mr. McLoughlin: My hon. Friend tempts me, but if I agreed with him wholeheartedly about Brigg and Cleethorpes I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) would have something to say about that. My hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) has revealed that the changes we have made since 1979 to reform industrial relations have meant that a number of companies now find the United Kingdom the most attractive country in which to invest. Those changes have, of course, been opposed by the Labour party.

Voluntary Work

8. Mr. Thomason: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures she is introducing to encourage voluntary work among the long-term unemployed in the west midlands.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: We announced at the Budget the introduction of 60,000 voluntary work opportunities through community action.

Mr. Thomason: Will my right hon. Friend join me in welcoming the Budget announcement of an additional 60,000 places for the long-term unemployed? Does she agree that that welcome new intitiative should be supported on both sides of the House and not grumbled about by Opposition Members, who are in the rut of opposing everything and who fail to put forward any constructive proposals?

Mrs. Shephard: I hope that everyone will welcome the new programme. It will give unemployed people the opportunity to participate in a part-time work programme which will be supplemented each week by structured help with job search. That is a productive and useful way in which to help unemployed people and it deserves a welcome from the Opposition parties, although I doubt whether they will give it one.

Ms Short: The Secretary of State will know that many unemployed people want to do voluntary work because there are not other opportunities for them. It is an outrage, however, that there is a mass of work that needs doing in our country when we have 4 million people unemployed. When the Conservative party came to power, there were 1·2 million unemployed people. I do not know how the right hon. Lady has the cheek to stand here today and constantly insult the Labour party as though the Conservatives' record on unemployment was good. The high levels of unemployment are causing poverty and high bills for benefits and mean that production rates are too low. The Conservative Government have failed dramatically on this issue and the right hon. Lady should not boast.

Mrs. Shephard: I did say that the Opposition would not welcome this scheme and that turns out to be right. If the hon. Lady encouraged the Labour Front Bench to undertake credible economic policies, her remarks would carry much more credibility. I hope that she will at least accept that the Conservative party has introduced a vastly increased number of measures to help unemployed people and that those, combined with the vastly improved economic situation, mean that a great deal of help is available for unemployed people.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: Although I welcome the Government's further measures for the long-term unemployed, does my right hon. Friend agree that the best scope for long-term jobs for unemployed people is provided by increased competitiveness in British industry? Will she pay tribute to the enormous efforts that have been made by British industry in the past 10 years, particularly in the past two years, to improve competitiveness? It has improved to such an extent that unit labour costs in this country have not gone up; that compares with the increase of 9 per cent. in Japan and 6 per cent. in Germany. Does my right hon. Friend agrees that that improvement in competitiveness will create jobs and that it is endangered by the social chapter of which the Opposition are so fond?

Mrs. Shephard: My hon. Friend is right when he speaks of the need to keep Britain competitive and to oppose the provisions of the social chapter, which would heap ever more burdens on the heads of employers. It is important for Opposition and Conservative Members to congratulate British business on its performance—exports are up; car production is up; manufacturing productivity is up. Everything is up except the spirits of Opposition Members.

Mr. Alex Carlile: However welcome the increase in voluntary placements, does the Secretary of State agree that we should be aiming at satisfactory paid employment for as many people as possible? Will she comment on a young couple—he has a first class honours degree in history—who have escaped long-term unemployment by obtaining menial jobs in a burger bar? When will the Government ensure that young graduates in this country are able to find the jobs for which they were trained and stop committing them to the burger economy?

Mrs. Shephard: That was clearly a much rehearsed question. However, I can assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that, despite his exhortations, the Government will not espouse the cause of a national minimum wage.

9. Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures she is introducing to encourage voluntary work among the long-term unemployed in East Anglia.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: In addition to the community action opportunities, I am making available further places on voluntary work projects in north Norfolk.

Mr. Spring: Does my right hon. Friend agree on the importance of upgrading the quality of management in the voluntary services? Will she join me in congratulating the Suffolk training and enterprise council on undertaking a number of initiatives to promote good management in the voluntary sector? It sponsored 13 managers from the voluntary services to enrol on a course to gain a certificate in business administration. Does she agree that by raising the standards of management in the voluntary sector we can help improve services, both for the long-term unemployed and for our communities at large?

Mrs. Shephard: I am very pleased to hear what my hon. Friend says about the work of the Suffolk TEC. No doubt both unemployed people and voluntary organisations stand to benefit from the new community action programme.

Pit Closures

10. Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is her estimate of job losses saved in consequence of the announcement of 25 March of the reprieve of 12 coal mines in respect of jobs (a) in the pits and (b) in related industry.

Mr. McLoughlin: The number of jobs saved in the pits and related industries will depend on how much coal British Coal can sell and how successful it is at reducing costs and improving productivity.

Mr. Churchill: While I welcome the reprieve of the 12 pits and the saving for the time being of 10,000 jobs, may I ask my hon. Friend to confirm that that will represent a saving of £400 million—one third of the £1·2 billion pledged in redundancy pay by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade in his statement on 13 October last year? Does my hon. Friend agree that that figure equates almost exactly to the figure of £300 million to £400 million in subsidy pledged by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade? Therefore, there will be no additional cost to the taxpayer.

Mr. McLoughlin: My hon. Friend adequately explains the equations that result from the White Paper recently published by the Government and endorsed by the House. There are a number of related issues; we obviously need to discover the outcome, the growth in demand for coal and how that will help to protect jobs in British Coal.

Mr. Enright: Does the Minister agree that British Coal Enterprise has so far totally failed to replace the jobs that have already been lost? Will he undertake positively to examine what British Coal Enterprise is doing, evaluate the information and see how many jobs are lost after six months and how many after one year? British Coal Enterprise creates false jobs and false hopes.

Mr. McLoughlin: I regret the false and negative way in which the hon. Gentleman approaches the issue. All our efforts to help specific areas fail to find favour with the Opposition, which is a great shame.

Mr. Dickens: Does my hon. Friend accept that despite the cuts in British Coal brought about by falling orders for British coal, the coal mining industry in this country remains one of the largest in the world, a fact which should not be forgotten?

Mr. McLoughlin: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. It is equally important to remember the great way in which British Coal has improved its productivity in the last few years, which will ensure that it sells more coal.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: Is the Minister aware that it is a disgrace that miners' pension money should go towards policies that will result in the loss of jobs in the industry, not only in the north-east of England but throughout the country? When will he get off his backside and get something done to create work in those areas?

Mr. McLoughlin: When it comes to getting off one's backside, I wonder what the hon. Gentleman was doing between 1964 and 1970, when 277 coal mines closed in Britain.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is important to consider employment in all the energy-intensive industries and in the oil and gas industries? Does he further agree that all such employment would have been hit had we listened to the Labour party and done nothing about the coal industry?

Mr. McLoughlin: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making those points, which rightly sum up some of the questions that must be addressed by the President of the Board of Trade.

Labour Statistics

11. Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the change in the number of unemployed people in Greater London in the past three years.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In the Greater London area, seasonally adjusted claimant unemployment rose by 274,800 between March 1990 and March 1993.

Mr. Raynsford: Does the Minister recognise that in the past three years, the number of unemployed people in the London borough of Greenwich has doubled? Does he further recognise that unemployment is a corrosive force, particularly among the young, and that the unemployment level today is destructive of the social fabric? When will action be taken to bring down the level of unemployment at least to that which applied three years ago, and when will it be reduced to the level that existed in 1979?

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman's constituency is famous for its observatory for looking into deep space. What an irony that the hon. Gentleman cannot see what is happening under his nose. Unemployment in London has fallen for the first time in three years, and he cannot even bring himself to recognise that fact.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Is the Minister aware that people in London welcome the fall in unemployment but remember in my constituency of Ealing the way in which we lost many jobs during the four years of the loony Labour left which had control there and which, at a stroke, increased local taxation by 65 to 100 per cent? That is how jobs are lost. Labour loses jobs. The Conservative party does not.

Mr. Forsyth: The way to create jobs in Britain is to ensure that we are competitive. That means controlling public expenditure and keeping taxation, including local taxation, down, and my hon. Friend is right to point out how Labour authorities have destroyed jobs the length and breadth of Britain.

Mr. Dobson: The census shows that in Greater London, 28 per cent. more people were out of work and looking for jobs than the figure produced by Department of Employment officials. Which figure was right?

Mr. Forsyth: When the figures were going up, the hon. Gentleman was happy to accept them. Only when they are going down does he cast doubt on them. [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] I will answer. The census figure for people not working includes people who are ill and people who are not working perhaps because they are going on holiday —[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman should not try to compare apples with pears, otherwise he ends up with results that are just bananas.

Mr. Forman: Is the Minister aware that the policies of the Government for employment creation in the Greater London area will have a positive effect and that the co-operation that his Department is encouraging between further education, the training and enterprise councils and private employers can only be for the good? Is he further aware that the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) would not recognise good news if it were staring him in the face?

Mr. Forsyth: My hon. Friend is right. The key to future employment in a competitive world market lies in improving our skills. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for welcoming the innovative measures that the Chancellor announced in his Budget to allow unemployed people to become involved in further education. Education and training are the key and the Government have done more to increase education and training opportunities than any other in Europe.

Employment Action

12. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many previously unemployed people have been employed in the employment action programme in 1991-92.

Mr. McLoughlin: Employment action ran for only six months in 1991-92. By March 1992, 19,300 people had started on the programme in England and Wales.

Mr. Flynn: Does the Minister appreciate that the scheme has been a failure and that many people who have taken part in it feel cheated and demeaned by the experience? Only one third of places were taken up in the first year and there was a 15 per cent. shortfall in the second year. Is the Minister aware that in my constituency last year there was a 16 per cent. increase in unemployment and there have been a further 200 jobs losses this month? Why do not the Government stop trying to stir up manic optimism and realise that in my constituency and many others all that has taken place is a phantom recovery?

Mr. McLoughlin: What has happened in the hon. Gentleman's constituency is that in July 1986 unemployment was 5,986 and in March 1993 unemployment was 4,530. For the sake of the Opposition, that is 24 per cent. lower than it was in 1986. Yet again, the Opposition condemn any kind of moves that we make to attempt to help those people who are unemployed. It is not surprising that no one believes what the Opposition say these days.

Workstart

13. Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will make a statement on the workstart pilot scheme established for east Kent.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I have asked the Employment Service for a detailed plan for the pilot scheme in east Kent by 7 May. I expect the first participants to be employed in June.

Mr. Gale: My right hon. Friend will understand that in north-east Kent we very much appreciate her Department's recognition of our real needs. We hope that this measure will be followed by other Government measures to enable us to compete on equal terms with northern France for inward investment. Does my right hon. Friend understand that my constituents and the businesses that I represent, together with those represented by my hon. Friends the Members for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) and for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier), are greatly looking forward to taking part in the scheme? Will she try to find time to visit it herself once it is up and running?

Mrs. Shephard: I can assure my hon. Friend that I shall attempt to visit at an early stage all the pilot areas where workstart is to take place.

Apprenticeships

14. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what recent discussions she has held with employers' organisations on measures to increase the number of young people undergoing apprenticeship training.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Government, working with TECs and other employers' organisations, is progressively extending youth credits to all 16 and 17-year-olds not in full-time further education.

Mr. Hughes: Does the Minister appreciate that Britain's future is tied up with education and training together with the rebuilding of our manufacturing base and, alongside that, we face ever more intense competition in international markets? Therefore, will he tell those reluctant employers who are not training sufficient numbers of their employees that they are, quite literally, failing the nation?

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with the hon. Gentleman and I shall certainly tell employers who are already doing more to do even more for training and to encourage apprenticeships. In return, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will tell those people in the Labour party and the trade unions who opposed youth training, employment training and every other Government training initiative, to change their minds and give us some support.

Mr. Streeter: Is my hon. Friend aware that in Devon and Cornwall the Government guaranteed training place scheme for 16 and 17-year-olds is working extremely well, with almost every youngster who has applied for such a place being accommodated well within six weeks? Does he agree that the Devon and Cornwall TEC is operating extremely successfully—[Interruption.] Does he agree that the Devon and Cornwall TEC is doing a great job and should be congratulated?

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with my hon. Friend. It is because of the work that has been done by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that the youth training guarantee scheme is being delivered despite the difficulties that were caused by the recession. It would be a matter of considerable support for the TECs if the House would acknowledge their splendid work, including that which my hon. Friend has outlined today.

Mr. Janner: Does the Minister know that in many great manufacturing cities such as Leicester, there has been no decrease in unemployment? Over the years, there has been a vast increase among young people desperate for work. As apprenticeships have dropped—and we know why—surely the Government could do much more to help young people to get jobs at the end of their training.

Mr. Forsyth: As the hon. and learned Gentleman will know from his role as Chairman of the Select Committee, the youth training scheme has been remarkably successful in getting young people into jobs or ensuring that they get qualifications—indeed, it has helped some three quarters of them. It is particularly surprising that Opposition Members do not know that. I agree with the hon. Gentleman's point about apprenticeships. Training in the workplace is second to none and we should encourage apprenticeships. What a pity it is that the trade union movement did so much to destroy so many apprenticeships in Britain.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Gunnell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 27 April.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Gunnell: Now that there is optimism that the bulk of the Maxwell pension funding will be recovered over the next four years, is it not time to end once and for all the uncertainties felt by many of those lobbying us today? Will the Prime Minister authorise the availability of capital now, knowing full well that as funds are recovered most of that money will come back? Eighteen months is too long, for elderly people in particular, to suffer such anxiety. Will the Prime Minister end it now?

The Prime Minister: I think that the hon. Gentleman knows that over many months we have made a positive response to the Maxwell reservations. I believe that it was the right thing to do, not least setting up the Maxwell pensioners' trust, which has raised more than £6 million, and providing £2·5 million to ensure that pensions are paid. We continue to look sympathetically at the problem, but I have no fresh announcements to make today.

Sir John Wheeler: In the wake of the bomb in the City of London on Saturday, will my right hon. Friend confirm that the Government will bring forward the reinsurance scheme? Will he urge the Leader of the House to make time for legislation for that scheme as soon as possible?

The Prime Minister: The Government scheme for insurance against terrorist attacks has been providing cover since 1 January this year and the Government will fully honour their commitment under the scheme. It is, of course, a matter for individual businesses whether or not they choose to take out such cover, but everyone who has done so, or has alternative policies, will have been covered against damage caused by the Bishopsgate bomb. The Government scheme is one of reinsurance for the industry, so those who have suffered damage will need to make claims to their insurers in the usual way.

On my right hon. Friend's last point, legislation to provide for payments to be made to the insurance companies under the scheme will be brought before the House as soon as possible. I hope that it will be possible to attract support from all parts of the House for that measure.

Mr. John Smith: Now that all six teacher and head teacher organisations have appealed to the Secretary of State for Education to suspend this year's testing and assessment arrangements under the national curriculum, will the Government for once listen to the considered professional judgment of the whole teaching profession and suspend this year's tests?

The Prime Minister: I think that the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows the importance that we put behind the principle of testing. He also knows—he will have heard the remarks of Sir Ron Dearing—that we need the experience of this year's tests to ensure that we are able to remove the unnecessary bureaucracy and make sure that the tests are right for the future. The implication of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's question is that he now accepts the principle of testing. I hope that is now so.

Mr. John Smith: Does the Prime Minister not understand that this increasingly bitter dispute is not about the principle of sensible testing but about the dogmatic insistence of an arrogant Secretary of State that his view must prevail against those of governors, teachers and parents? Why does not the Secretary of State recognise that which is recognised by everyone else—that he has lost the argument and that it is an insult to use £700,000 of taxpayers' money on futile propaganda?

The Prime Minister: I notice again that the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not indicate that he does not accept the principle. I assume that he does accept the principle of testing. In view of his question, he may care to comment on the remark by the National Union of Teachers president, who said:

"We should annihilate tests in the national curriculum."

I hope that the right hon. and learned Gentleman will now condemn that particular comment. On his further point, I must tell him that I do not think it appropriate for teachers to take industrial action at the expense of those tests.

Mr. John Smith: If the Prime Minister is so confident of parents' support, why does he not use that £700,000 to hold a ballot, to find out what parents really think? If the Government are sincere about parental choice, why not let the parents choose?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman knows as well as every other right hon. and hon. Member that two agendas are in play—that of the ordinary teacher who wants less bureaucracy, which we are considering and to which we shall respond, and that of the militants' opposition to any sort of testing or appraisal and to all our reforms. I note that the right hon. and learned Gentleman implies that he is favour of tests, but he does not have the courage to denounce the NUT and its comments about industrial action.

Mr. Cash: Will my right hon. Friend reconfirm the assurance that he gave the House unambiguously on 24 September last year, that if the Danes vote no in the second referendum it would be unacceptable for us and the rest of the Community to go ahead without Denmark, and that the Maastricht treaty could not go ahead?

The Prime Minister: Perhaps my hon. Friend has been misled by some of the reports that he may have seen this morning. The leader of the Progress party in Denmark, which my hon. Friend will know is the only Danish party opposed to the Maastricht treaty, said:

"There was nothing new in the Foreign Secretary's remarks, and they were manipulated by the press."

That was her comment, not mine. As to my hon. Friend's specific question, if he will study the transcript of the remarks made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, a copy of which will be placed in the Library, he will find that my right hon. Friend made four straightforward points. First, we do not expect the Danes to vote no. Secondly, were they to do so the Maastricht treaty could not enter into force because it requires ratification by 12 member states. Thirdly, United Kingdom legislation to ratify the treaty could therefore not proceed. Finally, all 12 members of the European Community would need to hold urgent consultations about what to do next. Each of those points is self-evident. That was said by my right hon. Friend yesterday.

Q2. Mr. McFall: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 27 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. McFall: In the right hon. Gentleman's first speech as Prime Minister, he spoke of a commonsense view of life from a tolerant perspective. Now that the Scottish Conservative party has joined the massive opposition to water privatisation in Scotland, will the Prime Minister display that tolerance by recognising the genuine and universal concern felt in Scotland, where water is regarded as being for the benefit of all—not for the profit of a few? At next month's Tory conference, will the Prime Minister state that the public interest will best be served by increased investment in the present water and sewerage system? Regardless of whatever the Tories have brought to Scotland in the last 14 years, will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that we shall not witness the return of the Victorian cry of "Gardyloos!" to the streets of Edinburgh and Glasgow?

The Prime Minister: The future structure of water and sewerage services in Scotland is still under consideration. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not want me to go further while that matter remains under consideration.

Q3. Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 27 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Rathbone: Now that Britain is exporting television to Germany, lace to Brussels, cosmetics to the French and pizzas to Italy, as my right hon. Friend pointed out in Manchester last week, does he not think that all British companies now have the competitive edge to develop export markets everywhere?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is entirely right to praise our exporters and to point to the opportunities for further exports. We also export more per head than Japan and now have an excellent opportunity to break into new markets and win back old ones. It was for that reason that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor increased the amount of Export Credits Guarantee Department cover both last autumn and in the recent Budget. Manufacturing matters; exporting matters. We seek to support them both.

Q4. Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 27 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Gerrard: Is the Prime Minister aware that very many people in London are extremely worried about the survival of the travelcard and concessionary fares after bus deregulation and rail franchising and that their fears are echoed today in the report by the Select Committee on Transport? Will the Prime Minister tell us what he intends to do to guarantee the future of the travelcard and concessionary fares schemes?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman knows, we have to study the report of the Select Committee and then respond to it. That is what we will do.

Mr. Whittingdale: Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating President Yeltsin on his outstanding personal victory at the weekend? Does he agree that, in supporting President Yeltsin, the Russian people have voted in favour of democracy built on market economics? Does this not represent by far the best chance for the future of Russia?

The Prime Minister: I have no doubt that my hon. Friend is right about the last point. I have sent my warm congratulations to President Yeltsin on the outcome of the referendum. The results are remarkable. They show that the Russian people maintain their personal trust in the President and, most important, that they wish him to carry his democratic reforms further. It is a remarkable result on the back of the sacrifices that have been made towards economic transformation. I believe that the Russian people are beginning to see the benefits of individual enterprise. Success for Russia is essential for its people and equally vital for the rest of the world.

Q5. Ms Eagle: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 27 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Ms Eagle: Does the Prime Minister not find ironic that, as we celebrate the 50th anniversary of the battle of the Atlantic, we are losing the battle for our shipyards without even a fight? Given his Government's refusal to create a strategy for defence diversification, what action does the Prime Minister intend to take in response to the petition handed to him today by the save Cammel Laird community group, asking him to save the yard from closure in July?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Lady knows, there is a problem for shipbuilding round the world as a result of the level of capacity and the level of demand. I understand the hon. Lady's concern about Cammel Laird and I know that it is shared by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and by my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter). The yard's future is primarily a commercial decision for Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering Ltd. which is having to respond to that worldwide decline, which is not just a problem for the United Kingdom but one for the rest of Europe and for countries in other parts of the world. None the less, I will study with great care the letter from the Cammel Laird support group and reply in due course.

Mr. Batiste: Will my right hon. Friend reassess the case for identity cards to see whether they can give significant support to the police in their fight against crime and terrorism?

The Prime Minister: That is a matter which from time to time we will need to review. It is one which has many difficulties. We have looked at it in the past and not found it a terribly attractive proposition. I know that a constituency is demanding it. It is not something which I would wish to rule out, but it is not on our immediate agenda.

Shetland

Q6. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Prime Minister whether he has any plans to pay an official visit to Shetland.

The Prime Minister: I have no plans to do so at present, but my right hon. and noble Friend the Earl of Caithness visited Shetland on 29 and 30 March.

Mr. Wallace: I know that that reply will dismay my constituents. They will be dismayed to learn that, some 16 weeks after the Braer went aground, the Prime Minister has neither visited the area nor indicated any intention of doing so. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Wallace: I shall resist the temptation to ask what would have happened if a ship had gone aground on the white cliffs of Dover. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order and hear the hon. Gentleman out.

Mr. Wallace: If the Prime Minister came to see at first hand a community's remarkable, practical and vigorous response to the adversities that affected it on 5 January, he would be very impressed indeed. If, in the attempt to restore the economic fortunes of that community, it is necessary to embark on a marketing exercise to restore Shetland's good name for good-quality produce, will the Prime Minister repeat that the polluter should pay? If so, will he give the International Oil Pollution Compensation Fund a nudge in the right direction?

The Prime Minister: I can certainly say to the hon. Gentleman that the response of the people in the area was indeed remarkable. That was noted by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, and by a number of my other right hon. Friends, all of whom visited the area in the period immediately following the tragedy.

What the hon. Gentleman neglected to mention was that an economic impact study is being mounted under the direction of Shetland Islands council, and with the participation of Shetland Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise. That will help to target resources where they are most needed, and I think that it is the right way in which to proceed for the present.

Fox Hunting (Abolition)

3.31 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make the hunting of foxes with dogs illegal.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. May I seek your guidance on the tabling of the motion in the name of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks)? It refers to the hunting of foxes with dogs. Given that anyone who knows anything about fox hunting knows that it takes place with hounds, is the motion in order? [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. That is a matter for dispute for the House. I want to hear what the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) has to say.

Mr. Banks: As a matter of fact, Madam Speaker, the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) is absolutely correct. As it appears on the Order Paper, the wording is wrong. The hon. Gentleman will soon find out, however, that I am begging to move that leave be given to bring in a Bill to make the hunting of foxes with hounds illegal.

I last attempted to make progress with such a measure on 18 July 1990. That, in turn, was the first time that a ban on fox hunting had been tried since the second world war. Since my effort in 1990, a private Member's Bill has been presented by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara). It sought, among other things, to give wild animals the same protection against cruelty as domestic animals. It would have banned fox hunting, and a number of other disgusting so-called sports.

My hon. Friend's Bill was narrowly defeated on Second Reading, following—[Interruption.]

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Order!

Mr. Banks: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend.

Madam Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) that there is no vacancy in this job. He seems to have forgotten that it is just a year today since the House elected me.

Mr. Banks: My hon. Friend clearly has unrequited ambitions in that respect.

The Bill presented by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, North was narrowly defeated on Second Reading, following what I must concede was a spectacular whipping exercise on the part of that cross between Sir John Falstaff and Bertie Wooster, the hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames), who is sitting on the Government Front Bench.

I have detailed those various attempts to secure legislation as a clear indication that those of us on both sides of the House—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I am interested in hearing what the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) has to say. I hope that the House will come to order.

Mr. Banks: I am giving the background details of the attempts that have previously been made in the House to ban fox hunting as a way of showing that those who oppose the so-called sport will never let the matter drop until this anachronistic, barbarous sporting activity has been declared illegal.

A few weeks ago, the British Field Sports Society sent out a video to every Member of Parliament in what can only be described as a desperate attempt to vindicate its wretched activities. The video was introduced by Ludovic Kennedy, a man of great reputation who, I am afraid, sullied it by agreeing to front such an obviously fraudulent presentation. I trust that his fee matched the scale of the attempted deception. May I inform those who discarded the tape unseen, or used it to tape a showing of "Blind Date", that the film has been reported to the Metropolitan police on the grounds of possible offences under the Protection of Animals Act 1911, the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 and the Cinematograph Films (Animals) Act 1937.

The film shows a fox being seized by the stomach. It is then subsequently ripped to pieces, although the latter sequence has been edited out. Another shot is of a fox deliberately snared in order to demonstrate the cruelty of snaring. I certainly agree that snaring is cruel, but when the House considered a ban on snares, the Bill was blocked by Members of Parliament who support the British Field Sports Society. So to fraud they add hypocrisy.

It is difficult to understand how anyone can claim to derive pleasure from hunting another creature to death in the name of sport. I try to understand the psychology but, for the life of me, I can find no point of contact whatsoever. For me, those who hunt foxes are no better, in the final analysis, than those perverts who bait badgers, course hares, hunt steers, stage dog fights and inflict mindless suffering on domestic pets and wildlife.

There seems to be a close correlation between those who take pleasure in hunting and hurting animals and those who inflict violence on other human beings. Those who ride to hounds would no doubt be outraged at such a linkage, but respect for life is indivisible. Anyone who derives pleasure from the pain and suffering experienced by a fox being hunted by a pack of hounds is on a continuum which, like it or not, ends up, in its most extreme form, with the hideous cruelties of a Bosnian massacre or a Nazi death camp.

There might be reasons for culling wild animals or controlling foxes, but to use such reasons to derive pleasure from killing them is pandering to a blood lust. To take any form of life dehumanises all of us. It lowers the threshold of our resistance to further and more objectionable forms of violence. In recent months, we have heard of appalling violence being inflicted by hired thugs on those seeking to protest against fox hunting, including the tragic deaths of two young men. Regrettably, fox hunting is still a legal activity, but protest against fox hunting is also legal, and the police have a duty to enable protest to take place without hunt-hired thugs assaulting protesters.

According to all public opinion polls, the great majority of people in this country—and, I dare say, all foxes—oppose fox hunting. It is not a town versus country argument, either. A clear majority of country dwellers also support abolition. Despite this weight of public opinion, the vile practice has survived and there is substantial, albeit declining, support for it in this House—and, no doubt, in the House of Peers.

The fact is that, although fox hunters are guilty of babarous behaviour, they are neither fools nor without political influence. Indeed, champions of the so-called sport are to be found at the very highest levels of influence and status in our society. I only hope that whoever encouraged the young princes to slaughter a few harmless rabbits recently does not go on to introduce them to the organised barbarity of fox hunting.

The fox hunters know that their days are numbered, and their arguments are becoming increasingly desperate. They say that people like me loathe the type of person who hunts. I readily confess that, in the main, they are not my favourite people, but who could loathe the hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames), however much one might detest the colour of his socks on Friday or discreetly laugh at his Mr. Toad wardrobe? It is not a campaign against middle-class people—[Interruption.] Obviously, no one could deny the middle-class antecedents of the hon. Member for Crawley, but one often hears the argument that there are hunts up in the north-east that are based on the old mining collieries. I do not know whether hunts continue in those areas—if they do, perhaps they would prefer to hunt the President of the Board of Trade—but I condemn those hunts as much as I condemn those in the south and elsewhere.

The use of environmental and conservation arguments by the fox hunters makes me reach for my sick bag. It is no argument for fox hunting to say that foxes sometimes kill livestock and are pests. The fox is a carnivorous predator and scavanger, but far more lambs die of hypothermia, for example, than are ever taken by foxes, and those the fox takes are usually either dead or unlikely to survive.

However, the great majority of foxes live largely on beetles, frogs, rabbits, wild birds and carrion, and they are the most significant destroyers of rats and mice. They do not constitute a pest, but, if they did, there are more humane and efficient methods of controlling them other than having a bunch of yahoos on horseback, a pack of hounds and assembled motley villains charging over the rural landscape.

Of the estimated 300,000 foxes killed each year, fox hunting accounts for some 7,500 dog foxes, and cub hunting, which is especially despicable, for another 8,500. The final lie given to fox hunting as a method of pest control is that, in some parts of the country, foxes have been deliberately encouraged to provide a quarry for the hunt.

The hunting mob is running out of valid arguments and time. Only the Labour party is officially committed to banning fox hunting at the next general election. However, given the number of Tories in the House and the country and the number of Liberal Democrats, I hope that, one day soon, those two parties will also embrace the same policy of banning fox hunting. I ken we shall shortly welcome the day when we hear the last "tally-ho" and when John Peel will have to find something else to do with his horn in the morning.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Tony Banks, Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, Ms Dawn Primarolo, Mr. Andrew Bowden, Mr. Elliot Morley, Ms Diane Abbott, Mr. Kevin McNamara, Mrs. Alice Mahon, Mr. Alan Meale, Mrs. Anne Campbell, Mr. Simon Hughes and Mrs. Maria Fyfe.

Fox Hunting (Abolition)

Mr. Tony Banks accordingly presented a Bill to make the hunting of foxes with dogs illegal: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 7 May, and to be printed. [Bill 186.]

Orders of the Day

Non-domestic Rating (No. 2) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

3.42 pm

The Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities (Mr. John Redwood): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill will freeze business rates in real terms for a further year. It honours the pledge given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget speech on 16 March to protect businesses from the most serious consequences of the 1990 revaluation. A similar measure, which we introduced last year, was welcomed by the House, and I hope that the Bill will be equally well received.

Under the current law, business rates cannot rise each year by more than the rate of inflation if the property's valuation stays the same. The Government's success in tackling inflation means that the rises this year will be no more than 3·6 per cent. following increases of only 4·1 per cent. last year—and, of course, inflation is now lower again.

For 30 per cent. of the businesses, however, the 1990 revaluation implied larger annual increases last year and this year. Although the increases were being phased in gradually, some businesses would still have faced real-terms increases of up to 20 per cent.

Bearing in mind the effects of the recession, the Government decided last year not to add to the burden on businesses. The 1992 Act therefore froze all rates increases in real terms for 1992-93. Last year's measure was intended as a one-year respite. However, although the economy is now recovering, a full resumption of the transitional arrangements would be premature, so the Bill extends the freeze on transitional real increases for a further year.

About 250,000 shops and offices, mainly in the south of England, will benefit from the measure to the tune of more than £190 million. About 85,000 factories and warehouses, mainly in the north of England, will benefit from reductions worth more than £30 million. A further 165,000 properties will gain relief worth £120 million. Businesses in Wales will save about £9 million. The total savings for business will be £350 million this year and £225 million next year.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): I am aware that the Bill does not cover Scotland, but can the Minister tell a good Scottish Member such as myself what the Scottish Office is doing by way of an equivalent to the Bill?

Mr. Redwood: I am happy to oblige the hon. Gentleman. As he says, there are different arrangements in Scotland. Through regulations, a comparable reduction of 2·6 per cent. in rates bills overall—the English level—will be achieved in the 1993-94 rates poundages, at a cost of £32 million. Derating has not been adjusted in line with reduced poundages, so the ratepayers will get the full benefit. I hope that that satisfies the hon. Gentleman.

The benefits in England come on top of the benefits of last year's freeze, which was worth £1,250 million over the years of its impact on its rates bills.

Many of the businesses that fared worst as a result of the recession were those facing the largest increases following the 1990 revaluation. In the six months following that revaluation, 633,000 ratepayers appealed against their valuations. I want the backlog of appeals to be cleared, as I am sure the whole House does. Of the initial 633,000 appeals, more than 525,000 have now been settled, and I am told that valuation tribunals are well on target for clearing the remainder by the end of the current year. I am sure that the House will welcome that.

In 1995, a new revaluation, based on the property market at 1 April this year, will come into effect. Rental values in depressed sectors are likely to be significantly lower than they were at the time of the previous revaluation. If that is so, the rateable values concerned will fall. That means that, as I promised last year, some businesses still in transition may never have to face the full rates liabilities implied by their 1990 valuations. I am sure that that will be most welcome to many businesses, especially the small businesses that faced the largest increases.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes): I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and I am sure that many businesses in my constituency will welcome what he has said. However, does not what he has said reveal one of the difficulties of the present non-domestic rating system, in that what a business pays effectively depends on the general economic situation, and therefore on the value of the property in which it operates, rather than on anything to do with the nature of the business itself?

Not immediately, but at some time in the future, will my hon. Friend examine the basis of local taxation of businesses to find out whether there is a fairer way of assessing what they should pay for local services?

Mr. Redwood: I am afraid that I cannot promise any immediate action along those lines. We are happy with the basis of property taxation for some element of businesses' tax bills. Of course, businesses also contribute to the national exchequer through VAT and through the income tax and national insurance that their employees contribute, which businesses originally pay in employee remuneration. We feel that there is a balance in the taxation affecting businesses, their employees and their turnover. That is Parliament's and the Government's chosen method of taxation to support local authority expenditure.

However, my hon. Friend has a good point when he says that problems were caused by the 1988 valuation. The main problem arose because that valuation took place at the peak of an extremely active property market, especially in the south, and especially for shop and office properties. We trust that the valuations based on 1993 values, which do not allot such extreme relative values as between different types of properties, will remedy that.

I hope that the results will be more acceptable across the country than the results were when they were based on the high values of certain properties in 1988. A further pause in increases this year should help to smooth any changes to bills resulting from the 1995 revaluation.

We believe that the Bill will provide another valuable fillip for many businesses, and will give a further boost to our economic recovery. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will be happy to deal with any issues that arise in the debate when he winds up. I have great pleasure in commending the Bill to the House.

4.9 pm

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): The Opposition support the general thrust of the Bill, and we shall not oppose Second Reading. However, we are concerned that businesses are becoming dependent on artificially held-back increases in rates.

Since the revaluation in 1988, which was implemented in 1990, businesses have, in addition to the original transitional limitations in 1990-91 and 1991-92, been protected by a further limitation in 1992-93. The Bill proposes another limitation in 1993-94. Businesses potentially face a large hike in business rates when the transitional arrangements expire and the next revaluation takes place in 1995.

The late Lord Ridley, who was Secretary of State for the Environment at the time, announced in 1989 the terms of the original transitional arrangements which were intended to be self-financing.

Mr. Roy Thomason (Bromsgrove): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, in referring to the 1995 revaluation as potentially increasing the liability of the business rate payer, he is assuming a continuing increase in rental values, because the rates are based on rental values? In fact, most business rents have been stagnant over the past few years; consequently, the increase in valuation which is likely to take place in 1995 should be quite limited. The hon. Gentleman's point therefore has a limited validity.

Mr. Henderson: I do not accept that. If I replied at this stage, I should have to do so at some length. I shall give the hon. Member a flavour of what I propose to say later. Whether businesses face a hike after the implementation of the 1993 revaluation in 1995 depends very much on what happens elsewhere.

It depends on whether the real level of local authority expenditure is maintained. It depends on whether the rate poundage, as originally outlined in the Local Government Finance Act 1988, is maintained in relation to inflation. It also depends on what happens to businesses that have already had their rates bills artificially held back—I support this—because of the recession over the past two or three years.

The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is that it very much depends on what the Government do between now and 1995, and on whether the revaluations in 1995 are based on what people actually pay in rates or on what they would have paid if there had been no transitional arrangements. I shall develop that point at a little more length later. If more hon. Members had wished to catch your eye, Madam Speaker, I might have restrained myself a little on the matter. In the circumstances, it may help the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues to be a wee bit more appreciative of some of the difficulties that they may face in the near future.

I return to what the late Lord Ridley said. He believed that the original transitional scheme would be an incentive to many businesses to flourish in the late 1980s. I realise that he had no more access to the future than any of the rest of us had. He said:

"The Local Government Finance Act provides for a uniform business rate in England and in Wales and for a revaluation of non-domestic property . . . This will provide a welcome incentive for businesses to expand in the currently less economically buoyant areas."—[Official Report, 15 February 1989; Vol. 147, c. 315.]

It is clear that he did not anticipate the economic events of the post-1989 period. Indeed, he predicted the opposite of what has transpired: he argued that northern business would be helped by rate reductions that could stimulate the more depressed parts of the country. The late Lord Ridley did not foresee the depth and length of the recession that would sweep through the country at the time that the business rate was introduced.

The year 1990 was a bad one for the economy, with 28,935 businesses collapsing. In 1991, the position was even worse, with 47,777 business failures during the year —an increase of 65 per cent. on the previous year. The pace of collapse quickened in the last quarter of 1991: from 900 collapses a week to 995, or 199 business collapses each working day.

All parts of the country suffered. The south-east recorded 9,722 business failures that year—an increase of 68 per cent. The east midlands recorded 2,189 failures—an increase of 79 per cent.—and the south-west had 5,415 failures—an increase of 76 per cent.

The position grew even worse in 1992 as the recession deepened, with business failures reaching an all-time high. A total of 62,767 businesses failed—a 31 per cent. increase on the previous year. London and the south-east were the areas worst hit by the hurricane of collapsing business. The south-east recorded 14,000 business failures during 1992 —a 46 per cent. increase. In 1992, 9,132 bankruptcies took place and liquidations increased by 20 per cent. to 5,000 plus.

The eastern region also recorded a dramatic increase in business failures—a 22 per cent. increase on the previous year. In London, there were 9,121 business failures in 1992 —15 per cent. of the total for the country.

Despite all the self-congratulation from the Government Front Bench, 1993 has continued to be a disastrous year for business. In the first quarter, 15,444 businesses collapsed—a rate of almost 1,300 a week. A total of 5,297 limited company liquidations were recorded, and there were 10,000 individual insolvencies, compared to 9,200 in the same quarter last year.

Dun and Bradstreet pointed out that the latest overall figures represented a 4 per cent. increase in business failures on the same period last year. London and the south-east are still suffering the worst. But beyond this region, the record of failures has also worsened, despite the soothing words of Ministers on this matter. For example, in the west midlands, there was an increase of 5·5 per cent. in the number of business failures compared to last year. In the south-west, there was an increase of 9 per cent. compared with the same period last year. In my own region, the north-east, 1,176 business failures were recorded—an increase of 3 per cent.—but bankruptcies increased by 8 per cent.

Not only did the late Lord Ridley get wrong the level of aggregate demand in the economy: he and the Government completely failed to predict that the 1990-93 recession would hit the southern parts of the country worse than the north. Yet many areas in the south face the largest increases in business rate bills arising from the introduction of the national business rate in 1990.

The original transitional release scheme was therefore wholly inappropriate in the economic circumstances of the country. The limitations and reductions of rate bills in the north acted against northern-based companies holding on in the recession because they needed the full stimulus of any reductions. Even with the original limitations contained in the original transitional arrangement scheme, the increases in the south served to put great pressure on many companies which faced extremely serious problems and could ill afford even the limited increase.

I want to be fair to the Minister by saying that, during the Second Reading of the Bill on non-domestic rates which was before the House last year, he recognised that the Government had allowed the country to sink into a deep recession and that, as a consequence, the original transitional scheme was wholly inappropriate and therefore had to be modified. He told the House on 19 May:

"I know that the recession has created difficulties for many businesses and some of those that would have faced the largest increases this year have been particularly hard hit in the recession. The Government have therefore decided that their costs this year should not be worsened by any real increases in the business rates."—[Official Report, 19 May 1992; Vol. 208, c. 204.]

The Minister's proposals to limit increases in rates to inflation will be welcomed by businesses throughout the country. Businesses look to that assistance to help them recover from the battering that they received from the recession. They also recognise that the net cost to the taxpayer will not be as has been suggested in the accompanying papers, for every business that is saved by the measure will continue to contribute rates and other taxes on which the Exchequer depends. The multiplier effect in local economies will help other companies.

The Minister's proposals might excite the ashes of John Maynard Keynes. However, to save the hon. Gentleman's blushes among his erstwhile friends and colleagues, I shall not press the point too far. I would hate to be responsible for any provocation that might compel the hon. Gentleman to renege on his conversion or to make his task of getting the Bill through another place more difficult, even if it receives the support of the House of Commons.

As the Minister knows all too well, some noble Lords and at least one right hon. and noble Lady in the other House currently delight in opposition to Maastricht but might re-focus to delight in opposition to the Non-Domestic Rating (No. 2) Bill. I am sure that the business community, the Government and the Opposition would not want to incite such opposition to the Bill.

Another worrying impact of the recession is the general and projected decline in business rate revenue. That partly addresses the point raised by the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Mr. Thomason). The aggregate business rate revenue fell from £12·4 billion in 1991-92 to £12·3 billion in 1992-93. In 1993-94, according to the Government's figures, it will fall to £11·6 billion. Does the Minister agree that that has serious consequences for Government revenues in general?

Does the Minister acknowledge that, if local authority resources are to be maintained, one of several things must happen? The shortfall must be made up by central Government grant, by raising more revenue from council tax or by increasing the poundage beyond the rate of inflation to compensate for the impact of the narrower business tax base—that avenue might create additional problems—or the books will have to be squared by forcing a cut in local authority resources.

Does the Minister agree that there are, indeed, severe potential major problems ahead? Does he agree that, if there is to be stability in the business community, it is important that the Government state their future policy well in advance, so that business can plan accordingly?

In his statement on local authority finance to the House in November last year, the Secretary of State said that there would be no cuts in services if councils were run efficiently. The Minister and I discussed the matter at some length only a week last Friday in a debate in the House. There were arguments about whether services were cut by councils which were efficient or only by councils which were inefficient.

Setting aside that argument, I said in that debate, and I repeat today, that cuts were made by councils in many parts of the country, and severe cuts were made by some Conservative authorities. Even if the Minister has been unable to meet his stated policy this year, can he give us some assurances for the future?

Mr. Redwood: Clause 2 makes similar arrangements to those last year, to ensure that the rates pool does not suffer from the decision to forgo the extra increases on properties suffering from the revaluations. So we have made our position clear. The rates pool will be compensated through that mechanism. But is the hon. Gentleman saying that it is Labour party policy not only to support that compensation but to urge higher real rates increases for businesses in order to allow higher local authority expenditure? That would be interesting, and the House should know.

Mr. Henderson: It is always interesting to be questioned about Labour party policy. I do not intend to detain the House all afternoon, but I shall mention Labour party policy later, and I shall consider the local determination of rates—a method which, as I shall demonstrate, is supported by some Conservative Members.

The basic issue is what the Government's policy will be if cuts are made. Can the Minister assure the House that the Government will maintain the real level of local authority expenditure as a proportion of our gross domestic product? If so, will he assure the House that, if business rate revenue continues to fall, as the Government's own figures predict, the Government will increase their subventions to local authorities in one way or another to compensate for that shortfall?

If the Minister cannot give that assurance, is he prepared to commit himself to making that argument to the Chancellor, with a view to a relevant announcement in the joint Budget and expenditure statement in the autumn? Will he stress to the Chancellor the need to maintain the real level of local authority resources?

If there is a shortfall as a result of the existing way in which revenue is gained and as a result of a fall in business rate revenue because of the recession, will the Minister make proposals to allow the Government to compensate for any subsequent losses?

On the question of the transitional arrangements covering business rate increases, will the Minister give a commitment that there will be no sudden elimination of the limitation on increases? Does he accept that, if that were to happen, many companies, especially in the south, would face a sharp hike in their rates?

If the Minister accepts the case for a stable and predictable business rate, which is especially important to the small business community, is he prepared to say how the 1995 revaluation in the business rate will be approached? The small business community considers such stability to be crucial to its economy, and I hope that the Minister will accept the strength of its argument, which is frequently presented to politicians and others, and rightly so.

I hope that the Minister will recognise—if he does not, his officials certainly will—that, even if the transitional arrangements had been allowed to work through, about 160,000 businesses would still have had the increase in their rates deferred until the end of 1994-95. The Association of Metropolitan Authorities estimates that, following the two-year freeze in real increases, which the Labour party supports, about 350,000 businesses will not even pay full rates under the 1990 revaluation when the new 1995 revaluation comes into force. The London Chamber of Commerce and Industry has stressed that point, and noted:

"The Uniform Business Rate still presents enormous problems for London businesses, particularly when the new valuations are brought in."

Can the Minister tell us whether there will be transitional arrangements after 1995? Are the Government prepared to contribute additional funds to the national business rate pool to assist businesses that face sharp increases? If transitional arrangements are intended after 1995—this relates to what I said in answer to the hon. Member for Bromsgrove—will they be based on the actual rate payments made under the various schemes in 1994-95 or will they be made on the basis of what the bills would have been had the full effects of the 1990 revaluation worked through the system?

That also relates to the point that the Minister tempted me to discuss when he intervened, and what was said by his hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), who is sitting to the rear and left of the Minister—perhaps that hon. Gentleman is to the left of the Minister in all senses: he certainly used to be when he was on the other side of the border.

Is the Minister prepared to review the system? Is he prepared to consider giving local councils full responsibility for setting the business rate? Over the past two or three years, it has sometimes been suggested that anyone making such a proposition must be off his head and would not receive the support of the business community. But that is not really what the business community believes. It recognises that there is considerable advantage in the business rate being determined by local councils.

I do not want to detain the House for too long, but I have quotes from two representative business organisations. I do not necessarily concur with their views on other matters, but I think that they speak much sense on this issue. In its recent submission on local government affairs, the Institute of Directors said:

"We consider that on balance there is more to be gained than lost by reverting to non-domestic rates being determined by the individual local authorities".

In its submission on local authority policy, the London Chamber of Commerce and Industry states:

"The Chamber would like to see a return to local revenue raising and accountability for at least 50 per cent. of all local government expenditure. This could be done if both the council tax and business rate were controlled locally. The voice of business could then be heard, and in a real sense accountability could be reintroduced . . . Changes along those lines would ensure that locally raised rates were spent in the areas of need, and reflect the local economy . . . the Chamber strongly recommends that the Government includes a fundamental reassessment of the present arrangements as part of its overall view of local government finance."

It is not only Opposition Members who subscribe to the cause of determining rates at local level. Conservative Members who are closely associated with such organisations make the same submissions, and many in the business community have made it clear that they do not want to be determined by central Government, but want to allow reasonable local discretion.

Does the Minister agree that it is advantageous to allow local councils to make decisions, as they know more about their business community, and they know how much the business community can afford to pay in rates? It would be extremely stupid of them not to take that into account when setting the rates. It would be counter-productive in economic terms, as, if they made the rates too high, companies would run into difficulties, which would produce a lower net revenue. That would be a pointless exercise, and local government would be stupid to make such a mistake—indeed, it is not doing so.

Not long ago, the Minister was praising the way in which local government approached many issues. He has done so at political conferences, in press releases and elsewhere. Some of us have sometimes been tempted to question the authenticity of his apparent conversion to local government. Setting that aside, the Minister—and, indeed, the Prime Minister—have made the case for local government.

The Opposition support the measure, but would it not be wise to consider the longer term to discover whether there are better and more flexible ways of determining business rates, so that local communities and local business needs can be taken into account? The London Chamber of Commerce and Industry also referred to democracy. If local democracy is to mean anything, local people must have the ability and right to determine the level of services they want, and how much the business community should contribute to them.

It is clear that the Government are intent on pressing on with seemingly endless changes in the rules governing local authorities. It is no surprise to me that the business community is still subject to the unstable business rate levels caused by the Local Government Finance Act 1988. It is also clear that the House will face further requests to support further legislation to change the rules relating to the business rate.

I am clear that a return to the local determination of business rate is a more democratic policy and will, in the long term, reduce the involvement of the House in such matters. But until then, business will need assistance in shielding itself from severe hikes in business rates. If the Bill gives a measure of support, it has our general approval.

4.15 pm

Mr. Roy Thomason (Bromsgrove): I had not intended to participate in the debate until I heard the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) say that Opposition Members intended to support the Bill. I was immediately filled with suspicion, bearing in mind their long history of changing policies, but always opposing the present rating system for businesses. I was minded to intervene on hearing that change of tack emerging from the Opposition.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North referred to the former Secretary of State for the Environment, Nicholas Ridley, and compared the differences between the rates charged in different parts of the country and the adjustments that would take place between north and south. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman forgot the horror that many business people felt when they saw their rates bills before the new legislation was introduced.

Perhaps the hon. Gentleman forgot, for example, that in Conservative-controlled Kensington and Chelsea, the rates for a business similar to one in Labour-controlled Sheffield would have been 117p instead of 347p in the pound. There was by no means a level playing field. A considerable additional burden was placed on businesses in a Labour-controlled authority such as Sheffield compared with businesses in Kensington and Chelsea and that situation could be replicated throughout the country. There was a wide variety of business rates.

The reason for that was the old valuation. The difference of two, three or even four times the amount of rates in the pound charged was related not to the ability of a business to make payments in relation to its turnover or profit. It followed that there was gross unfairness between businesses in different parts of the country as to what they were paying in local authority business rates and the amount that they were reasonably able to pay as a proportion of their gross profit. The issue had to be resolved.

Labour Members have said in the past that they wished to introduce a form of property tax and that they did not want the sort of measure that is now before the House. They said that their new property tax would be based on capital values and would be handed over for local government to determine levels of payment. For many years, as a former chairman of the Association of District Councils, I defended the role of local government and viewed with concern the removal of its right to determine business rates. But I concede that the change, made necessary by the wide discrepancies to which I referred, has been a success.

Under the old system, in many Labour-controlled authorities the majority of ratepayers were in receipt of benefits, which meant that they were cushioned from the charge, so the business proportion of the community bore a much heavier part of the rate charge. Would the Labour party advocate a return to that system?

The Liberals suggest that we could overcome the problem not by adopting the type of measure that is before the House, but by introducing site value taxation. How would that work? That question cannot adequately be answered because site value taxation is a totally unworkable proposition. For example, take a corner sweet shop and a large tower block adjacent to it, value the site of those two units, which per square foot might be identical, and charge a rate based on that site value. The little corner shop might be occupying an old building of limited capital value in total, whereas the office block might be a substantial and expensive block. But under the Liberal scheme they would both pay an identical amount of business rates on a square foot basis.

That is nonsense. It bears no relationship to ability to pay or to the use of the land and it often bears no relationship to the potential use of the land. The corner sweet shop may be occupied by a lessee who cannot redevelop the land and thereby release the capital values to justify the payment of a higher business rate.

It follows that there is no easy solution to the problem of business rates. There is no quick answer to the problem of how businesses should contribute, justly and equitably, to the costs of the local community. We need to find a fair and reasonable solution. The one before us is the best to date.

I am concerned that the Labour party's proposals will go back to the bad old days of greatly varying charges according to the accident of a local authority's political control. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North quoted with approbation various business organisations which had said that they wanted to participate in local government and saw the payment of locally based taxes as the answer. I question that because there is no connection between the charge and elections. There is no proper accountability if it is not electorally based.

A business man or woman may have business premises in one local authority, but be a council tax payer in a different authority, so the local authority in which his business is based will not be democratically accountable to him or her. The proposal to charge a business rate on their premises gives them no say or opportunity to participate in the decision making of the council of the authority in which their business premises are situated. That is a grave weakness of the Labour party's present position.

I welcome any proposition that will allow businesses to participate in local government. That must be a way ahead. But I am worried that democratic accountability may no longer be maintained through the ballot box. If the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North was proposing that business people had some business vote and that councillors received their franchise by virtue of the business rate, that might be an argument to be listened to, if not in the end supported. But he has not pursued that to its proper conclusion.

I am therefore left with concern that some authorities that have clearly shown themselves to be anti-business would use any new proposal to weaken the economic strength of businesses within their community.

It is true that some in the Labour party have belatedly appreciated the importance of a thriving business community. Sadly, that is not always reflected on Labour benches in council chambers throughout the country. A movement away from the present system must therefore be undertaken with great care.

I started by describing the important link between the rate paid by businesses in different parts of the country. I mentioned in an earlier intervention that the 1995 revaluation was not a factor that should be taken into account in assessing to any great degree the levels of business rates. We had to assume that there would be no substantial difference between the 1990 and 1995 values put on properties owing to stagnant rent levels.

There is of course the question of how much the Government should properly contribute to local government expenses by virtue of the lower yield that that will produce from business premises. It would be of assistance to those in local government if, in replying to the debate, or, more appropriately, on some future occasion after consultation, my hon. Friend the Minister could let us know the Government's long-term views on creating a balance between the yield from the council tax, grant and the business rate in supporting local government services.

There is no doubt that the yield from the council tax is excessively small as a proportion of local government income. Therefore, the gearing can create distortions and the element of democratic accountability to which I referred earlier may be weakened when such a large part of the total local government income is generated by resources outside those determined by people elected to their council. However, those are wide issues and perhaps it would not be appropriate for me to spend long on them this afternoon, although there may be some who would prefer it if I did.

In joining colleagues in all parts of the House in supporting this measure, I hope that in future the Opposition will take a more realistic and fair approach to businesses and their relationship with local government. We commend the Government for once again protecting the interests of businesses this year at a time of critical importance to them. I trust that the measure will receive universal support.

4.26 pm

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I, too, am glad to welcome the measure, but I am particularly glad to welcome the terms in which the Minister introduced it. Unlike some of the cuckoos of spring from whom we have heard so much in the past 24 hours, who have been bawling the fact the whole economy is now on the road to recovery, the Minister was frank enough to say that a full resumption of UBR increases would be premature. He made it quite clear that, as far as the universal business rate and its impact on businesses were concerned, recovery has not taken place, is not taking place and is not likely to take place in the near future. I welcome the more realistic, if slightly more pessimistic, way in which the Minister introduced the measure.

This is our annual occasion to take stock of where the uniform business rate has led us and I shall touch on three aspects, the first of which is accountability. That was mentioned by the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Mr. Thomason), who was a notable leader of the Association of District Councils.

I recall a criticism of that body, the Association of County Councils and the Association of Metropolitan Authorities at the time of the introduction of the non-domestic rate, the uniform business rate and the poll tax in 1990 in the interests of accountability. It was claimed that the link to the electorate was destroyed because so much of the decision-making was centralised in London and so little was left to the council chambers of which the hon. Gentleman was such a spendid ornament. That argument must bring us to the test of how the average elector, an individual or from a business, actually influences the UBR for his or her area.

Next week there is to be an election in all the shire counties of England and Wales. Can the elector, by putting his cross against a particular candidate, influence the level of UBR?

Of course not. He cannot make any difference to the way in which that particular council approaches the problem of raising revenue from the business community. The only thing that he can do next week—the Government may regret this—is to demonstrate his contempt for that inelastic system by voting against the governing party. If the elector considers that the system is unfair or is being misused, that is the only way in which the elector can fight back.

The system was introduced because of the ludicrous antics of a small minority of loony left Labour councils. The idea was that businesses needed to be protected against a minority elected under the first-past-the-post system, which then abused their majority position.

The accident of political control mentioned by the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Mr. Thomason) is entirely the product of low turnout and an inefficient, non-proportional election system, but to use the UBR and centralised control as a way of getting back at the vast majority of conscientious local authorities which are run by Conservatives, Liberal Democrats, or the saner parts of the Labour party—or a combination of them—seems an extraordinary way of using a sledgehammer to crack a particularly cracked nut.

Mr. Redwood: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that a vote for his party is a vote for site value rating, which means slaughtering our high street greengrocers, bakers and butchers by forcing them out of business by inappropriately high levels of tax, because their sites would be more valuable for other uses? What does the hon. Gentleman have to say about that? Does he agree that our proposals are much better for the business community, which is why people will vote Conservative?

Mr. Tyler: That is patent nonsense, as the Minister knows full well. I wish that it were possible next week to change the Government of the day, but we shall not be able to do that. I do not know whether there is an election in the Minister's area next week.

Mr. Redwood indicated assent.

Mr. Tyler: There will be in my own. As an elector, I shall have a clear choice between electing representatives of the three main parties. One party's candidate supports the status quo, as represented by the measure before us, but we have no way of amending, altering ameliorating or changing the application of that policy in our area. My party is prepared to fight for more local accountability —not just for businesses but for the whole community.

I will not be drawn into the argument about site value taxation. The hon. Member for Bromsgrove—who has left the Chamber—knows full well that he was talking nonsense when he said it was impossible and impracticable. He denied not just the evidence of professional local authority valuers who have made sure that it would be possible to introduce the scheme, but the experience of many countries, including New Zealand and parts of the United States, which operate it most effectively. It is nonsense to suggest that the system would have the effect he claimed.

Mr. Redwood: If the Liberal Democratic party is interested only in local issues, why does its manifesto for the county elections devote a great deal of time and energy to making the case for proportional representation and local income tax—which are clearly national issues that the hon. Gentleman's party is trying to influence? Why will not he come clean about the Liberal Democrats' proposals for small businesses which would be deeply damaging to many small firms that provide excellent services in the high streets of this country?

Mr. Tyler: If I launched forth on a restatement of our manifesto, I would be called to order. We have made it clear on successive occasions in House and outside that the main basis for local authority funding at local level should be based on a local income tax.

We do not believe that the current system—be it the council tax, or the wholly discredited poll tax that the Minister and his colleagues foisted on the country on a minority vote—is appropriate. Our system would be much more appropriate. In addition, land value taxation is a much more effective system for identifying the benefit given to the individual, commercial ratepayer by the council services and planning consents given. If there is no outstanding planning consent giving an enhanced value to a particular property, it does not release that value and engage the land value taxation at a higher level. It is nonsense to suggest that the system would squeeze out small shopkeepers.

I also wish to refer to the anomalies in the present system. I am especially concerned with the holiday industry, having some responsibilities for the matter in the House and in my constituency. It is extraordinary that, since the introduction of the uniform business rate, the inflexibility of the system has meant that hotels and guest houses which have been pushed by the recession into reducing their months of opening find that there is no change in their rate burden. If an hotel in Newquay was operating on a 12-month basis in 1988, employing people and letting its rooms all the year round, but has now, as a result of the recession, had to cut back and close for perhaps eight months of the year, such is the absurdity and inflexibility of the UBR system that the hotelier still pays the rate for the full 12 months' opening.

The argument, in case the Minister thinks that I have not heard it, goes thus. Because the hotelier is in theory sitting beside his telephone in January waiting for a booking to be made for July, August or September, it is suggested that the whole hotel is therefore in business and must still be rated at the full valuation set in 1988 and introduced in 1990. It will be obvious that in such circumstances the relationship to his ability to pay—his profitability, turnover or whatever may be the test—is absolutely nil. There is no connection whatever.

The hotelier's attempts to appeal against the system, based on experience in our area, seem doomed to failure. The only way in which some change may be made is if there is a material change of business. I know of a case in my constituency of someone who has had a tea room in the front room and, in days gone by, was able to operate it every week of the year has now decided that, because of the recession and the consequent reduction in the disposable income of visitors, the room will be used for domestic purposes during the winter months. There is then a possibility of some form of appeal. Otherwise, the inflexibility of the system is extraordinary.

Another anomaly has been brought to our attention by the Confederation of British Industry, usually very supportive of Government policy. It points out in its current brief that the setting of half rates on empty shops and offices in England and Wales is absurd. It says:

"The rationale behind this practice is flawed, going against the principle that rates are a tax on beneficial occupation. Moreover, in current market conditions its application is penal. Many businesses, in all sectors, are facing empty rates bills amounting to about £450 million in addition to other onerous costs of holding properties which they are trying to rent or sell, hitherto with little success."

Another cause for serious concern across all parties, as far as I know, is the arrangements for hardship relief. Last week the Federation of Small Businesses, whose policy chairman hails from Torquay in the south-west of England, pointed out that huge numbers of smaller businesses have been badly affected by the uniform business rates that they have been called upon to pay and that the response of local authorities has been exceedingly patchy, to say the least, because the system is not fully funded by the Exchequer, is not fully understood and, as a result, is not fully operational.

The Minister will agree, I think, that section 49, on hardship relief, is not being adequately used by local authorities largely because, in very constrained times, when all their resources are restricted, even the limited contribution that they must make—which they must get from their council tax payers or by some other means—is considerable. As hon. Members know,

"remission . . . on grounds of hardship should be the exception rather than the rule".

I quote from the Department's "Non-domestic Rates Discretionary Rate Relief" practice note on the subject. As hon. Members also know, not only must the individual ratepayer prove that he is suffering hardship; but if the uniform business rate were imposed in all its rigour, the wider community—council tax payers in the area—would also suffer hardship. The example often quoted is that of a post office which, if the uniform business rate were imposed to the full extent, would disappear—and perhaps the only shop would go with it—and the whole community around it would suffer. That is a valid case, and I will come back to it in a moment.

At present, the hardship restrictions are being so narrowly drawn that many local councils are not using them at all. I note that authorities of all political colours include both the best, at the top of the league, and the worst, at the bottom. This is not a party political point and I hope that the Minister will look sympathetically at how the hardship relief can be more effectively defined so that all parties in local government can use it to better effect.

The Minister referred to appeals. That is my next "A". The Department was able to give my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) some figures. It is a staggering fact that there are nearly half a million outstanding uniform business rate appeals. I was pleased to hear the Minister say in his introduction that he is determined to remove the backlog by the end of this financial year. I am sure that many hon. Members will want to hold him to that.

The appeals system is extraordinarily cumbersome and very narrowly defined. I do not know if I am alone in the House—I suspect that I am this evening—but, just before the general election, I fought an appeal, not on behalf of a constituent but on behalf of a postmistress who ran a tiny post office at Trekenner, which is in Lezant, just outside my constituency. The experience of that appeal is one that I will never forget. I have never been subjected to such an extraordinary, surrealist exchange of non-information.

Let me illustrate it for the benefit of the House. The valuation officer produced a splendid tabulation of a number of comparative premises—post offices and shops from different parts of Cornwall—and it was on the basis of those calculations that he was proposing the entry in the rating list of some £300 for one room. The room had previously been the dining room of the postmistress and her husband. They had decided, in the interests of security, that it was no longer sufficient to use the dining room table and that, for obvious reasons, they should have some form of protection. They therefore decided to erect a screen and a counter, although the room still had in it the deep freeze, their records of dog and sheep breeding, and parish council minutes and other information. It was still, to all intents and purposes, part of the domestic premises.

Because there was a screen that could not be taken down at night, and therefore they could no longer have a dinner party there even if they wanted to, it was suggested by the valuation officers that that one room was effectively a business premise.

Our first argument that a post office which opened only for limited hours was hardly a business, but rather a social service, was kicked out by the tribunal—not because it was unsympathetic, but because of the inflexibility of the system. Our second argument was that, despite the position of the counter, the premises were still largely for domestic use and could be used for domestic purposes when the post office was not open. That, too, was thrown out.

I am shortening the long proceedings in the interests of brevity—I know that many Conservative Members wish to speak. The final session of the tribunal hearing was devoted to the actual figure to be applied to the premises and a schedule of different figures for similar premises was produced in evidence. I noticed in one column of the criteria to be used the magic initials "SPOT". I am not a professional valuer or an advocate—I am a mere politician—and I wondered whether I should draw attention to this form of description. I imagined that it meant "scientific and professional objective test", or some such.

I screwed up my courage and said to the chairman of the tribunal, "I do not understand what SPOT means. No doubt you and the other members of the tribunal fully understand." The chairman took counsel from his clerk, as was appropriate, and from other members, and they said, "Mr. Tyler, we have to confess that we do not know either." After a great deal of humming and ha-ing, the valuation officer admitted that SPOT meant that he had made it up on the spot. Nevertheless, I obtained a reduction.

The basis of the valuation and the inadequacy of the appeal system causing tremendous anxiety, confusion and anger in the business community. The fact that it is still taking so long to get a hearing and an answer—despite the Minister's assurances—makes the position worse.

To show that I am by no means parochial, I shall refer to an example from another part of the country, and go from north Cornwall to Newbury. It is a random example, but it may be of interest to members of other parties.

Newbury was an area of considerable economic success, but small businesses in Berkshire are suffering, as in many other parts of the country, from the delayed reaction to the effects of the recession. As a result, registered unemployment has risen from 861 in February 1990 to 4,033 in February 1993. It is clear from the continuing business failures in the area that a large number of newly unemployed come from the small business sector. We cannot be sure of the exact numbers of small businessess that are now failing in the Newbury constituency, but the local chamber of commerce reports no let-up whatsoever in the recession in the past few weeks. Its monitoring suggests that 16 local firms went under in February this year, compared with an average of 10·5 in 1992.

Councils throughout the country have been trying to mitigate the worst effects of the uniform business rate and I am delighted to note that Newbury district council—which, like my own in north Cornwall, has a strong Liberal Democrat presence—has used the hardship relief to the full. But how much more could be done if it were more effective than it is at present?

We all look forward to the revaluation and the effect that it will have on the 1995 figures, but unless the three As—accountability, anomalies and the appeals system—are addressed, we may end up with just a revamp of the present system. Meanwhile, the lack of local flexibility, the lack of willingness to tackle the sort of anomalies I have described and the continued lack of realistic assessments in the valuation and appeals procedure are doing great damage to small businesses throughout the country.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): I have taken on board much of what hon. Members on both sides of the House have said about how the business man should be represented in local authorities. In the mid-1960s, there was a local government vote for business men. It seemed to work very well and I have no criticism of it. I fought a ward in which local business men voted. I was not elected. Nevertheless, they exercised their democratic right to pay rates and at the same time influence the local authority. That influenced the local authority in many ways, although it did not disregard local business men completely.

It is a totally different story now. My Labour-controlled local authority definitely disregards local business men. It has many schemes afoot. Behind closed doors, it formulates economic and planning policies without consulting the local business hierarchy. For years, the Southampton chamber of commerce has said that it would like more representation in the civic centre, but it just does not get it. However, there will come a day when business men rise up and say, "If we are expected to pay a considerable uniform business rate, we must have a voice in what is being planned by the local authority."

As we know, the introduction of the uniform business rate came as an extreme shock to the business community. It came in at a very high level. Business men were shaken to the core. It was introduced halfway through the recession, so it was impossible for them to find the additional money. I am pleased that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has listened to the pleas of various chambers of commerce, the Confederation of British Industry and other bodies such as the Institute of Directors, with the result that, for the second year running, the uniform business rate has not been increased.

That is very satisfactory for business men who run small businesses. I am not so concerned about the multinationals that can open or close factories at the stroke of a pen on paper, but I am very concerned about the man who runs the local greengrocery or newspaper business. To him, the uniform business rate is another heavy burden of taxation.

The Chancellor in his wisdom has relieved the burden on such businesses in England by £329 million. Taken together with the help in last year's Budget, nearly £1·8 billion has been provided to help to reduce the bills of business ratepayers. Much of the help, I am pleased to say, is going to businesses in the south of England, which has been hit particularly hard by the recession, for unemployment in the south is well over 10 per cent.

Under the Bill and the transitional arrangements, the bills of 530,000 properties will rise by no more than 3·5 per cent. in 1993-94. When the Government decided to grasp the nettle, they found that the bone of contention was that the old rating system was unreliable. Councils used the business rate to subsidise increased spending, at no political cost to themselves, and obscured from voters the true cost of local authority expenditure.

Business rates were also unfair. Neighbouring properties with equivalent rating valuations but in different authorities, found that their business rate bills were not the same. That led to the complete distortion of trading competition. Business rates increased dramatically year by year, often at short notice. Notice amounted to only a few weeks and the business rate bore no relationship to the services provided.

I hate to say this, but Labour councils that set high business rates drove businesses and jobs from areas that could not afford to lose them. I have figures for Labour-controlled councils, but we do not want to get involved in that debate, because in this one we ought to congratulate the Government on ensuring that the uniform business rate is to be held at a level that businesses can afford.

Businesses in England will, overall, pay £800 million less in 1993-94 than they would have paid if business rates had risen in line with council spending, as they did before the introduction of the uniform business rate. I hope that I have got that point over to the media. In 1990-91, savings amounting to £1 billion were made; in 1991-92 they amounted to £850 million. If business rates had risen in line with council spending—I must admit that my council is probably one of the worst councils to which to refer —business bills since 1990 would have amounted to more than £2·5 billion extra. Business rates nationally rose by some 37·4 per cent., in real terms.

Market rents and rateable values are inextricably linked. No one can get away with saying, "I can pay a high uniform business rate and a low rent." It is amusing to note that the Southampton, Test Conservative association headquarters paid far less in rent than it did in uniform business rate. That was the position at the beginning, but the two are now beginning to square up.

As we have heard several times during the debate, local authorities have the power to reduce or remit rates when businesses face hardship but, dare I say it, some councils, or even individual councillors, have no great liking for business. They exploit the poor. They take money out of the pockets of those who earn and put it into their own. The very smell of business makes them adopt a very poor attitude towards it. We must ensure that local councils implement the hardship provisions to the full.

Today we have heard something about the policy of the Liberal Democrats. I do not know why, but there is an enormous burst of Liberal Democrat propaganda at the moment. I cannot understand it. The Liberal Democrats virtually go to sleep for four years between each general election, but they are wide awake again now. Site value rating was a nonsense. It was proved categorically, even to a Liberal Democrat council, that the Institute of Fiscal Studies and the Institute of Revenues, Rating and Valuation have explicitly rejected site value rating as unworkable and have warned that,

"as with rental revaluation, there may be little market information on site values in some areas."

If a tobacconist's shop has a rather large garden, one can say with certainty that its site value is not the same as that of a factory that has a rather large garden alongside.

The expansion of a business depends on the capital that the business can expend. A small business man cannot explain to his bank manager that, if he would only give him another £250,000, he could develop the land on the site, so the site value rating system is particularly unworkable and, after a short time, would be regarded as completely unfair.

I have had strong dialogue with my local chamber of commerce, which is very aware that the difference between profit and loss could be in the rating system itself. It is not possible for businesses always to make profits of several hundred per cent. or, indeed, anything like that amount. Many small businesses could be teetering on the edge of bankruptcy simply because of high uniform business rates.

We have made a good stab at solving the problem. The Chancellor has made an excellent effort to control it, and it must be controlled. Local authorities must use the hardship provisions available under their mandate and all councils, whether Labour, Liberal Democrat or Conservative, must appreciate the fact that chambers of commerce and business men should be involved in all dialogue about plans whether for the city centre or for the transportation infrastructure.

The proposals are excellent, and I shall have no hesitation in voting for them.

5.1 pm

Mrs. Angela Knight (Erewash): This is an appropriate debate for today, as the headlines in so many newspapers are telling us that the recession is over. Indeed, the figures for sales, output, productivity and growth all point in that direction. Unemployment is also down, not only in my constituency of Erewash but in Newbury.

Mr. Simon Burns (Chelmsford): Has my hon. Friend had the opportunity to read the Newbury declaration of the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) in which he states that the Liberal Democrats wish for honesty in politics, among other things? I am not sure whether the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) deliberately sought to mislead the House or whether he merely made a mistake. In his catalogue of gloom and doom, which was aimed not at the Chamber but down the road in Berkshire and Newbury, he quoted an unemployment figure of 4,033. It was typical of the Liberal Democrats because that was the figure for February. March's figures show a fall in unemployment of 77 to 3,956 in Newbury, which is a bit of good news that the hon. Gentleman was not prepared to share with the House.

Mrs. Knight: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point, and I hope that the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) will withdraw his remark.

Mr. Tyler: I am sorry that the hon. Lady has been so misled by the hon. Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns). The change from March 1990 to March 1993 is almost precisely the same figure as that to which he referred, so my argument stands. If the hon. Gentleman makes the comparison, he will see that I am right. There has been a substantial increase in the past three years. The figure may have marginally decreased over the past month but, as Ministers keep telling us, one month does not make a whole year.

Mrs. Knight: The hon. Member for North Cornwall has made it clear that he does not welcome a fall in unemployment, whereas my colleagues look forward to further falls in Newbury, Erewash and elsewhere.

In the east midlands, companies, institutions and organisations—be it the Confederation of British Industry, the chambers of commerce or the businesses themselves—have quietly been saying for some time that the recession is over. In my constituency, lace manufacturers, car component and iron pipe manufacturers, and the retail and housing sectors are all improving. They now have fuller order books and they are anticipating continuing improvements in the economy.

I listened carefully to the speech by the hon. Member for North Cornwall and I was sorry that he did not elaborate on his party's site valuation proposals. My hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) made it clear why the hon. Gentleman had kept quiet. It is very important to consider those valuation proposals carefully because, under the Liberal party's system of site value rating, smaller businesses could be charged the same rate for a one-storey shop as a multinational corporation will be charged for an office block. If the same rate is charged for an economically under-utilised site such as a garage as for an office block, which the Liberals propose, it will create a strong incentive to overdevelop land. That is not what I would wish to see, and I suggest that the Liberal Democrats re-examine their proposals more closely.

I should like to consider UBR from another angle. I represent an area that has made substantial gains as a consequence of the introduction of the uniform business rate. Companies in the midlands and the north were very highly rated for many years because of the way in which their local authorities chose to levy excessive rates on local businesses. Often, companies in the midlands and the north despaired of anything being done to prevent such excessive rates being levied, and when the late Lord Ridley introduced the uniform business rate, they welcomed the fact that it would enable them to expand in the historically more depressed parts of the country. Last year, there were accelerated gains for the gainers, and companies in my constituency and across the east midlands welcomed the changes.

I have a personal interest in these matters because of the many years I spent working in industry. I have a further interest because I come from the north and now represent a constituency there. It is not an exaggeration to say that, for many years, businesses in that area were badly affected by high rates or that companies were leaving and taking with them the jobs that they would otherwise have created.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Mr. Thomason) gave some examples of the variations in rates between one authority and another. However, the problem was not only the rates themselves but the fear of what would happen next year. Local authorities would decide how much they wanted to spend and, once they had decided that, would levy a high rate, much of the burden of which would fall heavily on the business community. That meant that the business community was unable to plan ahead properly. Of course, the high-rated areas were Labour controlled, so the move to the uniform business rate was absolutely essential.

I was very worried by the proposal by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) that the business rate should once again become the responsibility of local authorities. He presented his case in a moderate, reasonable and restrained manner, but many of his colleagues in local government are not reasonable or restrained individuals. Those people, whose actions penalised companies, cannot be allowed to regain control of the business rate and therefore over the economy of the local area.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall—[HON. MEMBERS: "Where is he?"]—has sadly seen fit to leave the Chamber rather than listen to the debate on the rating system proposed by his party.

Mr. Burns: Does my hon. Friend accept that, given the importance of the Bill and the impact that it will have on businesses, it is rather strange that the Liberals seem to care so little that they cannot be bothered to be in the Chamber for the whole debate?

Mrs. Knight: My hon. Friend makes a good point. The Liberals' absence shows the contempt with which they treat business.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall said that all local authorities should not be condemned because of the failings of a few. He has now returned to the Chamber, and I tell him that it was not just a few local authorities that failed. Too many failed their areas by levying too high a rate. In any event, what would the hon. Gentleman's proposals, or those of the Labour party, do for companies in areas where the local authorities continue to penalise companies in that way? They would leave companies to suffer the sort of interference and penalty through high rates, which would prevent businesses from expanding. It is essential that the business rate be kept independent of local authorities.

I shall examine briefly local authority expenditure in my area.

Mr. Tyler: Is the hon. Lady saying that the Conservative councillors elected next week—if any are elected—are not to be trusted to decide the level of the business rate in their areas?

Mrs. Knight: The hon. Gentleman has deliberately chosen to mislead the House by misrepresenting my argument. I shall return to the subject of local authority expenditure in my area.

Mr. George Mudie (Leeds, East): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Knight: If I may expand my argument for a moment, I shall give way later.

What exercises my constituents and other residents of the county is their concern for the way in which the county council spends money on education or; in some parts it fails to do so. They are also worried about the way in which the local police force has been hampered in the excellent job that it does by the county council's failure to give it the funds that it requires. That is what is happening now, and that is why business rates should not be put back into local authorities' hands.

There are many competent local authorities in this country but, sadly, there have been too many excesses and too much mismanagement.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Does my hon. Friend agree that the county council's policy of paying for nuclear-free zones is of no advantage to business men in Lancashire?

Mrs. Knight: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. We all know how well she speaks for Lancashire, how supportive she is of local people in that county, and how well she exposes the failings of Lancashire county council, as she has just done.

In an ideal world, everyone would have a say in local government and in how money raised locally should be spent. However, we all know that that is not the reality. In practice there are low turn-outs at election time and many areas have been held year after year in the grip of the same group of councillors. I do not believe that the House could seriously propose to leave business to its fate under local authorities, as the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) has suggested.

I do not think that there is any such thing as welcome taxation. Surely no one would put up his hand and ask to be taxed more heavily. But in local taxation as in national taxation, there has to be fairness, and there is fairness in the uniform business rate, which has been seen across the midlands and the north of England. If one talks to the business community and to business organisations, as my hon. Friends and I do, they tell us that their overheads must be kept down. They say that interest rates, too, must be kept down, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer has achieved that over the past few months. Business men also want their rates bills to be frozen, which is what the Bill proposes.

Mr. Mudie: Does the hon. Lady agree that those same business men are the first to criticise, vocally and in the press, the standards of the children coming through our education system? Are they not the first to say that those standards should be improved? Yet the same business men who criticise the education system are those who tell the hon. Lady that although they want standards to rise, not only will they not contribute more, but they wish to contribute less.

Mrs. Knight: The hon. Gentleman is correct to say that the business community criticises education standards; that is why it is so important that tests take place this summer in our schools for seven-year-olds such as my son and for 14-year-olds. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will support his business community and join my hon. Friends and myself in urging all the teaching unions to forget about the boycott and to get on with testing those children. However, we had the education debate last week, so I must return to business rates.

It is stability in the rating system that is so important to businesses. That gives them the opportunity to plan for their future. It is important to ensure that there are no big increases, and no big changes year after year in companies' business rates. The UBR and the changes proposed today make an important contribution in that respect.

5.16 pm

Mr. Paul Murphy (Torfaen): I am pleased to be able to say that the Opposition will support the Government on the Bill, and I am pleased, too, that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire), is present, as he was a year ago almost to the day, when we dealt with the Non-Domestic Rating Act. I suppose that this is his annual foray into matters Welsh. I shall not go too deeply into such matters, but I shall make one or two general points about what has occurred in this interesting if short debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson), and the hon. Members for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) and for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) all, rightly, referred to the recession and to the fact that small businesses—and, indeed, other business—had been seriously affected by it over the past few years. The newspapers this morning all say something along the lines of, "Recession is over—official".

However, in Wales there are still some 50,000 young people unemployed, we have lost 30,000 manufacturing jobs, unemployment costs us £1·2 billion and there are 17 claimants chasing every job, and businesses have gone under at an alarming rate—there were 2,425 business failures recorded during 1992, which represents an increase of 26 per cent. on the 1991 figure, and there were 1,728 bankruptcies, which represents a 38 per cent. increase. I fancy that, if the journalists came to Wales and wrote headlines saying that the recession was over, the idea would be seen to be nonsense.

None the less, we welcome the Bill, as we welcomed last year's Non-Domestic Rating Act, because it will ease the burden on small businesses. But we must ponder the amount of money that will be made available. For example, the Government can now find £9 million this year and £5 million next year to make up the shortfall to local authorities. That contrasts significantly with the statements and debates that took place in the Chamber some months ago when we debated the revenue support grant settlement for Welsh local authorities.

The counties and districts in Wales agree that that was the worst settlement ever. There have been cuts in education, in social services, in the police force and in all the services that are vital to the business community—and vital too, of course, for inward investment.

The hon. Member for Erewash (Mrs. Knight)—[Interruption.] The name of her constituency is as difficult to pronounce as the name of my own. The hon. Lady mentioned stability. Businesses in Wales are yearning for stability in the local government system, yet stability is the very thing that we have not had in local government finance. In 1988, the Under-Secretary of State and I served on the Committee that considered the poll tax during its three-month passage through the House. We agreed then on the issues—as, in a sense, we agree today.

There have been enormous changes to local government finance in just a few years. The hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Mr. Thomason) referred to changes that my party might want to introduce in local government financial institutions. When we consider the huge change that occurred as a result of the fiasco of the poll tax, any change that we might bring about would pale into insignificance. Billions of pounds were squandered on having first to prop up the poll tax and then to replace it altogether.

My fear is that the local government financial system in Wales, and in Britain generally, is becoming discredited. In Wales especially, but also in England, one aspect is the so-called "gearing" effect. It means that local councils can do virtually nothing unless they increase their local taxes dramatically. That has distorted local government finance, and has meant that local authorities no longer have a proper revenue-raising function. In Wales, a 1 per cent. increase in expenditure means an increase of about 9 per cent. in the council tax.

Yesterday, for the first time ever in the Principality, the Secretary of State for Wales announced his ideas about which local authorities should be capped. Only one authority out of 45 in Wales has been capped and it is the authority of the Minister of State, Welsh Office. It is an authority that is not controlled by any one political party. The decision has meant that the whole subject of capping has been discredited in Wales, as has the fact that the Secretary of State is having to take Gwent county council to court over its budget. The whole thing is a sorry mess, and the sooner we get some stability in local government finance, the better for businesses and the better for our communities.

In many parts of the country, business rate arrears are high. Local authorities find it increasingly difficult to collect business rates. There is an increasing gap between business rate payers and council tax payers. In Gwent, for example, business rates over the past three years have increased by 1·6 per cent., whereas local council tax payers have had to face a 53 per cent. increase.

The chief question, which has exercised the minds of hon. Members who have contributed to this short debate, concerns the nature of the business rate and what we want it to be. It is not a local business rate; it is a national business tax. It bears no relation to the way in which rates used to operate, or to the way in which the council tax operates.

I believe that there is a vital link between local businesses and the local community, and that the link has been broken by the new business rate. All local authorities provide for businesses an educated work force, roads and infrastructure. In Wales, local authorities play an especially important role in economic development and inward investment. All my experience in 15 years as a member of a local authority was that local authorities and the business community saw great advantages in that direct link.

Large multinational companies in my own constituency agreed tremendously with what the local authorities were doing. They were very much involved in local authority matters, including the sponsorship of council activities. The sooner the link between business people and local authorities disappears, the worse it will be for democracy.

The business rate is no longer related to commercial activity or to a particular district. There may be a great steelworks or a massive factory in an area. It may provide employment, but it may also disturb the area. The fact that the business rate is now collected centrally in Cardiff or in London means not only that there is no link between business and the community, but that there is no link between commercial activity and the business rate.

The business rate should relate to the ability of business people to pay it. There should be a system of rebates related to the profitability of businesses with an annual turnover below a specific level. We are firmly of the view——

Mr. Simon Burns (Chelmsford): I have listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman speaking up for businesses. The Labour party speaking up for the interests of business is about as convincing as Herod being in charge of a nursery.

Mr. Murphy: All I can do is describe my experience over many years, since local government organisation, of the relationship between my local authority, whether the county council or the district council, and the businesses in the area. I believe that the relationship has been healthy. That experience may not be repeated throughout the length and breadth of the country, but local government and local democracy are all about diversity. The great harm that has come from having a uniform business rate is that individual local authorities cannot determine their rate locally; they cannot set it, and they cannot collect it.

I am not the only person who makes that point. Sir John Banham, for example, said recently that the present system

"reflects neither the ability to pay nor the level and quality of the local services businesses receive."

He has a role to play in local government reorganisation in the months ahead.

Mr. Thomason: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it was this Government who introduced a consultative procedure on local authority budgets with businesses, and that that procedure was opposed by many in the Labour party?

Mr. Murphy: Opposition comes to different things in different ways. The Under-Secretary of State was a firm opponent of the poll tax when it was introduced in 1988. The Government saw the error of their ways and rightly appointed the hon. Gentleman to be a very good Minister. There are differences in view on all these matters across the country.

As I said, it is healthy for a diversity of views to be held on these matters by local authorities in England and in Wales. That is what local accountability and local democracy are all about. Businesses play a vital role in our communities, and that is why we support the Bill.

The Secretary of State for Wales acknowledges that belief, because he appoints many business people to quangos in the Principality. The White Paper on Welsh local government reform is the only indicator of how the Government intend to develop their ideas on the future shape of local government. They propose a system of unitary local authorities which will be responsible for raising their own revenue.

When the Secretary of State for Wales reforms local government, he has a golden opportunity to set an example to the rest of the country, and to have another look at the system of local government finance. I am not saying that the Government must change the council tax —they will not—but there are changes to be made. The simplification of the grant system would be something that hon. Members on both sides and members of local authorities throughout Britain would welcome.

There is a case for the business rate to be examined, as my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) said, and to be brought back into the local community. That opportunity should not be wasted. I urge the Secretary of State for Wales and the Government generally to rethink the whole question of local government finance when the reforms are introduced.

We support the Bill, but we recognise that it is a short-term expedient. It does not answer all the problems that face the country and local government in terms of how to finance local government, and it does not explain what the relationship between businesses and local authorities should be. I hope that the Government will address those matters in the months ahead.

5.29 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Robin Squire): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy). As he said, we have followed each other for several years both in our previous role as Back Benchers and as "Box and Cox", or whatever the phrase is. It is nice to do so. He raised points to which I shall refer in my speech, as have other hon. Members.

I shall start by reminding the House that the Bill will provide a further £350 million boost to businesses this year on top of the £1·25 billion package that was introduced last year. We calculate that it will ease rate bills for some 400,000 small business premises and 100,000 larger ones.

As with the changes we made last year, local authorities will not suffer from the reduction in non-domestic rate income brought about by the Bill. The Government are committed to refunding the national pool to the extent of the estimated loss. We will also allow local authorities to net off their reasonable costs of re-billing from their national non-domestic rate payments.

We will need a short period—about a month—after enactment to introduce regulations governing the adjustment of rate bills that have already been issued and to enable local authorities to recalculate their contributions to the non-domestic rating pool. We will bring the Act into force in parallel with those regulations. Once in force, the Act will have retrospective effect to 1 April and authorities will be required to give refunds to ratepayers who have overpaid instalments in the meantime.

The debate was interesting, and I shall refer to some of the earlier speeches. The first Opposition speaker, the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson), highlighted some of the sad realities of the recent recession. There is no division between Conservative Members and Labour Members on that. The recession has had a terrible impact on a number of businesses and on many individuals.

In the context of the Bill, let us not forget—as some of my hon. Friends rightly reminded the House—that before the uniform business rate, many businesses were being hammered year after year by Labour councils up and down the country. The figures are clear. Between 1979-80 and 1989-90—the last year of the old system—locally set non-domestic poundages rose by 37·4 per cent. more than inflation on a compound basis nationally. Some of my hon. Friends who spoke today were councillors in opposition and saw that at first hand. My hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mrs. Knight) immediately comes to mind.

By replacing locally set non-domestic rate poundages with uniform national poundages which cannot increase faster than inflation and by pooling and redistributing the proceeds of the business rate on a per capita basis, it is no longer possible for authorities to increase expenditure, knowing that businesses will meet much of the extra cost.

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Squire: I shall willingly give way to the hon. Gentleman when I have finished this point. Although he has just come in, we would not like to disappoint him. If the uniform business rate had not been introduced, businesses would have paid £842 million more in 1992-93 and £797 million more in 1993-94.

Mr. Turner: I shall simply make this point. It is the height of cheek and hypocrisy for Conservative Members and the Minister to blame Labour local authorities for increasing rates during the period to which he referred, when in fact it is a direct result of the Government's failure properly to fund local government. The Minister should tell us how much was lost to local government in rate support grant settlement over that period. Every year, your Government cut support for local government. When Labour and Conservative local authorities had to increase rates, it was a direct result of your Government's policy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. It is the hon. Member's Government, not "your" Government or my Government.

Mr. Turner: Indeed, I am referring to the Minister's Government. How can the Minister use such cheek to imply that it was Labour local authorities' fault that rates increased during the period he quoted, when he knows that it was a direct result of his Government's failure properly to fund local government?

Mr. Squire: The hon. Gentleman was entertaining but not factually correct. I recommend that he go to the Library. He will find that the amount of support for local government during much of the period to which I referred increased rather than decreased. To help him a little more, I suggest that, if he looks under S for Sheffield, he will find a prime suspect in the area to which I was referring.

Mr. Henderson: I refer the Minister to his figures about the savings to business as a result of the introduction of the business rate. Does he accept that those figures must be put in the context of a subsidy from central Government and taxpayers generally? During the debate on the Non-Domestic Rating Bill on 2 June 1992, the Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities made it clear that the cost to the central Exchequer of protecting the business community from the introduction of the national business rate was £1,250 million, which is almost greater than the figure that the Under-Secretary of State claimed was saved by the business community. What has happened is that, generally, the taxpayer has subsidised the business community. I do not necessarily disagree with that, but the figures must be put in that context.

Mr. Squire: That is an interesting interpretation. I think other hon. Members will agree that there is a significant difference between the amount of Exchequer support which we are debating now, and which we debated on an almost identical Bill last year—the hon. Gentleman quoted the correct figure—and the tendency, until recently, for a number of local authorities to let rip as far as the private sector was concerned. That is the context in which I am speaking.

Before I leave that aspect of the debate I shall refer to the democratic argument. I note that Labour Members want to revert to such a system and suggested that in some way it would bring greater accountability. Frankly, I do not accept that. My hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) has said that there is no such thing as a business vote—nor is there any intention of introducing one. In the absence of such a vote, the concept of accountability as I understand it would be sadly lacking if such a proposal were entertained.

Mr. Murphy: It is important to understand the point that we made earlier about the gearing effect. Having taken control of the business rate away from local authorities, the amount of money that is left for local authorities to control is limited. That distorts the local government finance system.

Mr. Squire: It is an arithmetical fact that there is a gearing effect in England, Wales and Scotland—I cannot deny that. That does not, in itself, deny the advantages which the concept of the uniform business rate has brought to businesses in general.

I was referring to the speech of the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North. I welcome his welcome for the measure, which was echoed by hon. Members on both sides of the House. He rightly said that the measure would be welcomed by businesses across the country. He then tried to get me to estimate the national non-domestic rate for 1994-95. His tongue might have been slightly in his cheek at the time. He knows that it is unrealistic to estimate that rate at present. Obviously, we must continue to be guided by the state of the economy and the impact of residual increases on big and small businesses. The hon. Gentleman will know that, under legislation previously passed, the maximum will be limited to the inflation rate, rather than the impact of past revaluation.

It is a little early to say what transitional arrangements may be needed to phase in the results of the 1995 revaluation. We have always said that we will examine the outcome of the revaluation before deciding whether transitional relief will be needed. By April 1995, many businesses will not have reached their full bills under the 1990 rating list, as the hon. Gentleman said. That is one factor that we will need to take into account, although many businesses may well find that their post-1995 bills are much reduced, reflecting relative changes in business rates between the valuations.

I can reassure the hon. Gentleman on his specific point. If any business which faces an increase under the 1990 revaluation does not reach its full payment, any increases under the 1995 revaluation will be by comparison with the amount paid in 1994-95 rather than the amount that would have been paid if protection had not been available.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) referred to the fall in business rate revenue. The distributable amount of business rates has fallen since 1991-92. That is, indeed, partly the result of the recession, which has led to an increase in empty property relief. A second factor which is equally important is the effect of rating appeals. Increasing numbers of appeals are now being decided, as my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities said.

Repayment of rates following appeals may relate to the whole period from 1 April 1990, but the entire cost falls in the year in which the repayment is made. Therefore, the yield of business rates is likely to rise again once the peak of appeals has passed. Any changes in business rate yield will, of course, be compensated for by revenue support grant pound for pound within the published plans for external finance.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Mr. Thomason) spoke with all the experience of a former senior local authority councillor. I assure my hon. Friend that, notwithstanding his nervousness at the appearance of support from the Opposition Front Bench, he is right to support the Bill. He pointed out how much impact the measure would have and how welcome it would be to business ratepayers in general.

My hon. Friend was the first hon. Member in the debate to highlight the failings of site value rating, which subsequently became almost a separate debate in itself. I wish to put on record just some of the reasons why site value rating would be a poor system and a poor substitute for the current system which is the subject of the Bill.

Site value rating would be a tax on a small number of owners rather than on many occupiers. It would be a hidden tax on the latter through rents. We would need a register of beneficial owners. Site value rating would involve indentifying the development potential of each and every parcel of land. It would require detailed evidence of land sales and prices in each area. It would be unfair to owners if existing convenants and contractual arrangements meant that land could not realise its development potential.

Perhaps as importantly, if site value rating was limited to where planning or zoning permission had been obtained, any competitor, other developer or business could apply for planning permission on someone else's site. The consequence could be to drive the business out. That seems a strange way to encourage business. I urge the Liberal party to rethink.

Mr. Tyler: I am grateful to the Minister and his colleagues for paying so much attention to my party's policies. That is a new experience for me. I wish to pursue the Minister's last point because I know something about planning. Is he aware that it is now widely regarded as unacceptable for someone who has no interest in land to be in a position to make a planning application for it? If that is the Minister's main objection, as it seems to be, does he accept that there is in any case considerable anxiety about that feature of the planning system?

Mr. Squire: I listed several reasons why site value rating was inadequate. On the hon. Gentleman's specific point, he will be aware that it is likely that more than one person will have an interest in any site, land or property. It could be a tenant, the landlord or a putative purchaser. A range of people could have an interest. The hon. Gentleman described the existing law. I was simply interpreting his remarks. It was not clear whether in the event of a Liberal Democrat Government being elected—the House should not hold its breath—site value rating would be introduced.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for North Cornwall for welcoming the measure, in company with the other hon. Members who spoke. However, it was a bit rich, virtually in his first minute and the day after quarterly GDP figures were announced showing an increase for the first time in three years, for the hon. Gentleman to suggest that my hon. Friend the Minister had denied a recovery. It is simply untrue. My hon. Friend not only highlighted it, but put it in context, as a re-reading of Hansard will show.

It is possible that the recovery is badly timed for the Liberal Democrats whether in the context of the county council elections or that of the Newbury by-election. However, the hon. Gentleman will understand if I say that the vast majority of people welcome the recovery notwithstanding any difficulties that it may give the hon. Gentleman.

The hon. Gentleman said that it was interesting that, out of all the figures for Newbury, we mentioned the figures for only one month. But the figures have fallen for two months and Newbury's rate of unemployment at 7·1 per cent. is well below both the Great Britain and EC averages. I shall be delighted if the hon. Gentleman's speech is widely circulated in Newbury in the next two weeks. It will not add one vote to the Liberal Democrats' likely haul.

Mr. Tyler: Of course we all welcome any reductions in unemployment, even if they are only in one or two months. I wish that we had a dramatic reduction in unemployment in my constituency, but sadly that is not the case. In my speech—I am sure that the Minister was paying careful attention—I compared the position of small businesses before the introduction of the uniform business rate in 1990 with now. That is why I picked 1990 and 1993. I made a comparison over a three-year period. I know that the Minister is an honourable, honest and fair-minded man. He will accept that over a three-year period there has been a substantial increase in business rates, whether one takes February, March or any other month.

Mr. Squire: I am not sure whether I should continue with my modest, up-beat comments based on fact or look backwards to what has happened in the past three years. I judge that on balance most people prefer to look forward rather than back, so I shall keep going with my speech.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall made some comments about tourism. Seasonality of use is taken into account in rates assessments. If a holiday resort is open for only a limited period in the year, that will be reflected in rents and hence in rateable values. Any change in economic circumstances such as a shorter summer season is taken into account at revaluation. Any change made within the life of an existing list would cause a loss of revenue from rates which would have to be made up elsewhere in the tax system. That would be unfair.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall correctly pointed out that several local authorities under all forms of political control had been rather slow in applying section 49 and providing hardship relief. I underline from the Dispatch Box that hardship relief is available where there is genuine hardship. I was not sure whether the hon. Gentleman suggested that because the take-up had been low, the Government should centralise hardship relief. I hope that he was not suggesting that. If he was, it runs counter to the actions of the Government in devolving decision making to local authorities. It also runs against what his party normally stands for.

Mr. Tyler: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way yet again. As he seems to be so interested in my speech, I hope that he will forgive me for interrupting. The point that I made was clear. If the Government were prepared, within the criteria, to fund hardship relief 100 per cent., clearly local authorities would feel a great deal less inhibited in providing the hardship relief which he and I agree should be available.

Mr. Squire: The whole point of the system—I know that the hon. Gentleman knows this—is that it gives local authorities discretion to determine hardship. If we provided 100 per cent. support, we would do precisely what I thought that the hon. Gentleman would not support and take the decision into central Government. Hardship is better determined by a local authority. I join the hon. Gentleman in urging its wider use by local authorities.

My hon. Friends the Members for Test and for Erewash made strong speeches, drawing on their experience of small business and local government. They correctly spelt out the gain that businesses will make under the measure.

The hon. Member for Torfaen spoke, as I expected him to do, about the gearing effect and the relationship especially in Wales between central and local government support for local government expenditure. He will know that prior to setting the levels of total standard spending and aggregate external finance for 1993-94, the Secretary of State for Wales took account of the view expressed by Welsh local authority associations that the proportion of revenue raised locally in Wales should be increased. The lower level of increase in the additional aggregate external finance of 1·7 per cent., relevant to that of the total standard spending, means that Welsh local authorities are able, on average, to raise about 10 per cent. of their income from the council tax, which represents an increase of more than 1 per cent. on the figure for 1992-93.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the spectre of further reform of local government finance. I beg the hon. Gentleman as a Minister and as an individual, although I am not allowed to hold a separate view, to ignore that siren call. The hon. Gentleman and I have sat on many Committees and we know perhaps better than other hon. Members just how difficult it is to reform that system. I believe that the system now in place for the collection of local business and personal taxation will last and will be welcomed by the overwhelming majority of people.

The overall effect of the Bill is that no business will end up paying more rates in real terms this year than it did last. The Bill is important and worth while. It is well targeted on those businesses that have borne much of the brunt of the recession and I urge the House to support it.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee, pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills).

Non-Domestic Rating (No. 2) Bill

[Money]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

5.51 pm

The Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities (Mr. John Redwood): I beg to move,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Non-Domestic Rating (No. 2) Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any increase attributable to the Act in the sums so payable out of money so provided under any other Act.

It gives me great pleasure to move the resolution so that the money is available to provide the relief that business is seeking—the relief that the House seems to favour.

The Bill has two main financial consequences. The big one is the reduction in the amount of money to the rates pool, which the Bill will make good. The second is that there will be some additional expenditure to local authorities in implementing the Bill, and we are proposing to allow authorities to set that expenditure against the pool to adjust the rates bills. I hope that the House will welcome those two features, which are reflected in clauses 2 and 3.

The cost of making good the shortfall for the pool in England is estimated to be £340 million in 1993-94 and £220 million in 1994-95. That is on top of the substantial relief that was made available last year as a result of a similar Bill to which my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment has already referred. In Wales, which has separate pooling arrangements, the cost will be £9 million in 1993-94 and £5 million in 1994-95.

The money issues were given prominence on Second Reading. It is interesting that the Liberal party in particular favours a different approach to the financing of local government—one which would be deeply damaging to many businesses. The hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) seemed to be particularly interested in Newbury and in Berkshire. He failed to tell the House, or the people of Newbury, however, about the impact of his proposals upon the butchers, the greengrocers and the grocers of that town.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancashire): It would be disastrous.

Mr. Redwood: Yes, my hon. Friend is correct. It would put such businesses under intense pressure. We are glad that Liberal policies are not threats but spectres, or their effects would be considerably more serious.

We can always tell when there is a by-election, county council election or even a general election in the offing, because it is then, in spring time, that we begin to see the first "Focuses". They come out of the woodwork after a year of absence and a year of neglect and appear in Newbury or wherever else containing all sorts of claims about how the Liberals have done everything that has, in fact, been done by the Conservative party for the good of local people.

The Liberals claim the credit, but they do not do the work, as is evident from the "Focus" publications. I am sure that another "Focus" will be issued to say that the Liberals were behind the money resolution, which is so instrumental in helping local business.

Site value rating should be condemned by all men and women of good will and by all sensible parties in the House, because it would be extremely damaging. It is symptomatic of the Liberal party that it usually supports the Labour party in local government. Recently, I believe that the Liberals have encouraged the Labour party to withdraw candidates from the county elections in Berkshire. Obviously, they have struck some kind of deal.

When we hear about Liberal party policies, they seem to be Labour policies in fiscal drag. They are dressed up in a new kind of style, with local income tax and site value rating on top of the other imposts that the Labour party would like to impose. As always, it is the Liberals who want other people's money. They may well vote for the money resolution today, but, secretly, they would like to impose far more taxes and to waste far more money.

As my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary has already said, it is a curious paradox, some might say that it was a two-faced approach, that the Liberal party reveal. It claims that it wants much more devolution and local autonomy, but as soon as any measure offers such autonomy to Liberal councils, the Liberal party will not use its local discretion and gets its spokesman to come to the House to say that the Government must order councils to exercise such autonomy.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): The Minister's claims are erroneous, as is his interpretation of his colleague's remarks. The Under-Secretary said that parties of all colours in government in local councils throughout the country have used the hardship relief. In my speech on Second Reading, I was able to quote the impeccable record of Newbury district council and North Cornwall district council on their use of the hardship relief. The Under-Secretary was right to acknowledge that.

Why is the Minister trying to stir things up? He said that election time was when "Focus" appeared, but that is not the case in my part of the country. It appears throughout the year. We always know when the Government are expecting a defeat at the hands of the electorate, however, because they attack us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. We are actually debating the money resolution.

Mr. Redwood: I thought that a little circumlocution about the money might be appropriate at this stage. As I understand it, there is no great pressure on our parliamentary business, and I thought that it was important to elucidate these crucial——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair allows no circumlocution dependent on time. I am afraid that the Minister must stay in order regardless of the time factor.

Mr. Redwood: I shall, of course, endeavour to do that —and with your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, how can I fail?

The money issues at stake are clear. The hon. Member for North Cornwall has said that more use should be made of hardship relief. He said that that should be incorporated in Government proposals in a Government mandate to local government. I am sure that he would like that proposal to be added to the money resolution, if that were possible.

The answer to that request is that the powers are there, and councils can use them if they see fit. That is local judgment and local autonomy in action, and I cannot understand why the hon. Gentleman wanted us to insist that that power be used. Now he is, as always, backtracking on this very point. He now accepts that there is local discretion, and he is trying to claim that Liberal councils use it well.

The money resolution is important for business and the continuing economic recovery. It is an important means of building on the improved figures and prospects that we have seen in recent weeks. It is important that the House now gives more stability to local authority taxation and expenditure measures. The resolution is part of that process, and it will mean that local government has the money for the job so that the burden on business is not unacceptably high. I have pleasure in commending the resolution to the House.

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): We have witnessed a somewhat unorthodox approach to a money resolution. I did not intend to speak, but I feel bound to make some response to some of the Minister's remarks. I shall endeavour, Mr. Deputy Speaker, not to circumlocute; I am sure that, if I do, you will bring me back into line.

A number of cuckoos have been flying around Westminster and Fleet street, and Wapping, I suppose, over the past two days, and it seems that one of them has got into the House. Claims are being made about the recovery from which the country is now beginning to benefit. The Opposition want to see the economy recovering, business pulling itself out of recession and output picking up. We want jobs to be created in our economy.

The statistics announced by the Government yesterday —a 0·2 per cent. increase in output in the first quarter of 1993—have been mentioned. There has been a 0·2 per cent. increase in output in the first quarter of 1993, but does that constitute the beginning of a recovery? That is the question that businesses will be asking as they face business rates.

It is interesting to note the way in which the Government claim that a 0·2 per cent. increase in output —if my arithmetic is correct, that means a 0·8 per cent. annual increase in output—constitutes a recovery in Britain. When Germany and France enjoyed increases in output of 1 per cent. and 1·5 per cent., the Government said that those statistics represented part of the world recession and constituted a recession in those countries. There seems to be some contradiction in the Government's position. I hope that the House will reflect on that when it considers the money resolution.

The Opposition supported the Non-Domestic Rating (No. 2) Bill as a means of assisting the business community, and they also wish to extend their support to the money resolution. However, we wish that the Government—and, perhaps, the Liberal Members——

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: There is only one.

Mr. Henderson: Yes, there seems to be only one Liberal Member. I wish that they would stick to the business before us, not squabble over one election that will take place on 6 May. The country and the business community will look to the state of the country on 6 May, and the verdict delivered in the other county council elections may be different from that given in one specific part of the country.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Non-Domestic Rating (No. 2) Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any increase attributable to the Act in the sums so payable out of money so provided under any other Act.

Disability (Grants) Bill

Not amended (in Standing Committee), considered.

[MR. MICHAEL MORRIS in the Chair.]

Clause 1

GRANTS TO CERTAIN ORGANISATIONS CONCERNED WITH DISABLED PERSONS

6.2 pm

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, leave out line 13 and insert 'to enable payments to be made to or for the benefit of people with disabilities for the purpose of promoting their independence and freedom of choice.'.

In Committee, we were disappointed that we were not successful in amending the Bill despite the debate that we had on Second Reading and the obvious shared concerns expressed in Committee. When it came to the crucial act of voting, the Government were not flexible. On a Bill that covers many aspects on caring for the severely disabled, we hoped for some compromise and flexibility from the Government.

The key words in the amendment are "independence and freedom of choice".

I note that the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People agrees with me. In the foreword of the Greenwich personal evaluation scheme, which was published recently, he said:

"This report on Personal Assistance schemes shows that as well as being cost-effective, some schemes offer disabled people a greater degree of independence."

The Minister will know that the amendment is designed to reintroduce into the debate the important change in the way in which disabled people view the sort of help and support that they need and receive, and the way in which they receive it. That merely scratches at the surface of a fundamental change that has taken place in the sphere of disability in recent years. The debate is continuing, not only in the form of the Bill that we are discussing, but in another place, where a different Bill was recently debated which was designed to address the same subject: how people receive the help necessary for them to continue to live lives that are full and give them the opportunity to use all their potential.

I do not wish to speak merely as the shadow Minister and say what I believe to be the main concerns of disabled people and those who support them. I prefer to act as a mouthpiece and tell the House the comments that have been made in favour of direct payments by the people affected by them. They have expressed their views far more eloquently than I could hope to do.

Two disabled people were quoted in Anne Kesselbaum's report, "Cash for Care". They said:

"It makes us feel in control of our lives; gives us back the feeling of being people and not a pathetic handicapped family . . .

If you have a carer you feel safe with, you know your quality of life is better. It opens things up. Your personality changes, you laugh."

Some of those comments go to the heart of the subject.

Jane Campbell, a disabled person, said in conversation with Lord McColl:

"Employing your own personal care assistants places negotiations on a very different plane. You are not asking for favours or desperately attempting to change the (statutory) home carers rota so as to enjoy another hour at that party. Instead, you are setting your schedule for the day, which you know will be adhered to by your employee, with whom you have agreed a one to one contract of employment.

Whereas my traditional form of help gave me no privacy, and was often loaded with what people thought 'best for me', I now decide my own priorities, and I feel I have an equal say in how my home and my family life is run."

Those are moving words from disabled people who want the sort of care on which the amendment focuses. She concludes:

"This is, I believe, fundamental to one's dignity and sense of belonging and contributing."

A young lady, Maria, was interviewed by Jenny Morris for the Rowntree trust's report, "Community Care or Independent Living", and said:

"It means I can get up in the morning when I want to, go to bed in the evening when I want to, and lead the kind of life that I want to."

That is a true testimony of the power given to the disabled when they can receive money from the independent living fund. I should be out of order if I strayed too far, but that example shows the amount of power that is handed to disabled people when a local authority social services department can provide cash for disabled people to allow to make their own decisions and to draw up contracts of employment to meet their needs. In the same interview, Vicky, a disabled person, said:

"Independent living means that I employ people, and basically that they are here to do the physical things that I can't do, which allows me to have the lifestyle that I choose."

The important common factor running through all the quotations is that, given the money to employ their own care assistants, people with disabilities enter into a one-to-one, employer-employee relationship with their helper. They can specify exactly the sort of care that they want, and in what form they want it. They can specify the exact hours when they want that help. Last, but certainly not least, they can ensure that the person helping them, who spends much time in their house—and sometimes lives in it—and helps them to perform intimate functions, is someone with whom they feel happy and comfortable. Surely that is something that every hon. Member should want for the severely disabled people of our country.

I do not wish to delay this stage of the Bill. I give a final quotation which illustrates the sort of horror story that can occur when a disabled person does not have full control over the care contract and those who fulfil it:

"The home help came to me one day when my bed was wet and I asked her to change the sheets. She refused. She said, 'Today is not the day we change the bedlinen.' I asked if she expected me to go to sleep in a wet bed. She said, 'Well, I'm not changing it.'"

Clearly, that is untypical. We appreciate that the vast majority of local authority carers are genuinely caring and compassionate people. I simply point out what can happen. When it happens, the disabled have fewer powers to seek redress and prevent the atrocity recurring than if they employ their own helpers.

In a recent Friday debate, my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) introduced a Bill that would have established a commission for disabled people to have their grievances inquired into and righted. That measure was voted down at the behest of the Government, so the disabled do not even have that avenue to pursue. When such a ghastly experience occurs and a disabled person is unable to have carried out by her carer the sort of basic task that I have described, it is regarded by many of us as a minor atrocity, because it combines physical discomfort with personal humiliation to a quite intolerable degree.

In his Second Reading speech, the Minister referred to local authorities being in the driving seat. As the Bill proceeded through its brief Committee stage—we did not prolong the proceedings; it went through in two very civilised sessions—we got the impression that the Minister made a slip of the tongue or, if that was not the case, that he regretted what he said when he referred to the need for local authorities to be in the driving seat.

The thrust of our argument in Committee—unfortunately, we were not successful in getting it accepted—was that disabled people should be in the driving seat. The experiment conducted by the independent living fund showed that empowering people to make their own arrangements costs dramatically less than providing the service direct. In other words, when people can choose and draw up their own contracts with the people of their choice, the Exchequer can make a saving of between 20 and 50 per cent. of the cost. People make more sensible decisions than bureaucracy makes for them.

The Minister has seen the evidence. He saw much of it in the debate on cash payments in another place. Apart from the case made by the Minister in that debate, the view was unanimous, on the evidence before the other place, that cash payments are effective, are empowering and save money.

The argument adduced throughout our debates leads us to believe that, secretly, the Minister is on our side. Indeed, it is rumoured that some of his colleagues are on his side. Clearly, if they were not whipped, many Conservative Members would be with us—I have particularly in mind the all-party amendment that was voted down by the Government majority in Committee.

We are willing to believe that, but for some evil power lurking in the Treasury, many Ministers and Conservative Members would be with us. I give the Minister the benefit of the doubt on that issue. But if that is not the case, we deserve a thorough explanation today. If I am right, and it is the fault of the Treasury, we are left to wonder what sort of people are making decisions in the Treasury under Conservative rule. What kind of Treasury official or Minister would consider the research and the figures and say, "This is not permissible because it would save money"? Let us be clear: as I have explained, it would save money.

I am talking of an innovation that is tried and tested. The independent living fund tried it for five years, and local authorities have tried it to good effect. Suddenly the Government realised that some local authorities were giving direct cash payments, and said that that was outside the letter of the law. What sort of Treasury official, in this day and age, could look at the facts, which clearly show a saving to the Government of 20 to 50 per cent., and still refuse to make a change in the law that would bring about such a saving?

Are we not, in the closing years of this century, enlightened enough to ask who the people are who are making such decisions behind the closed doors of the Treasury? Why are they allowed to be in the driving seat? This is not a question of local authorities or disabled people being in the driving seat. Treasury mandarins are in control. That is why we believe that they are the evil influence. They are stopping the acceptance of consensus for an obvious sensible way forward.

The amendment would give the Government at this late stage a chance to make a change. We hope that they will respond in a positive manner.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): I apologise for arriving late for the debate, which started earlier than I had expected. Even so, I hope that I may crave the indulgence of hon. Members and make a contribution because it is an extremely important subject and I hope that, as a result of the consensus that undoubtedly exists across the Floor of the House, the Government will find it possible to concede the case for direct payments, and will respond positively.

The case for the amendment is well rehearsed and familiar. The arguments for it are so solid and the case against it so insubstantial that it seems strange that it remains necessary to debate it, but we must do so. The moral case is too important to neglect and the case in terms of practical efficiency and good value for money alone should be recognised and accepted by the Government.

The moral case should be restated, being the most important part of the argument. The principle at stake is the dignity of the individual. The argument essentially is that direct payments by local authorities to severely disabled people would enable them to enjoy as much as possible of the autonomy that able-bodied people assume as a right for themselves. The point was eloquently expressed by Lord McColl, Baroness O'Cathain, Lady Darcy de Knayth, Lady Masham and others in the debate last week in the other place on the Disabled Persons (Services) (No. 2) Bill:

The issue for us is whether we are to empower those of our fellow men and women who happen to suffer from severe physical disability to live as independently as they may and on terms as equal as possible with everyone else. What do we mean by policies of care? Is care merely to be an expression of an authoritarian and patronising attitude that says, "We who are in charge will take care of your problem. Indeed, we will take care of the problem that you are"? Or is care to be a manifestation of compassion, of a fellow feeling that impels us to act imaginatively to help someone who faces exceptional difficulties to meet his or her needs?

To give the simplest instance, are we to enable a physically disabled person to make his own decision about when he gets up in the morning and goes to bed at night? Or are we to decide that for him? Or for her? In an impressive and moving account of the transformation rendered to her life as a result of direct payments, Jane Campbell recently wrote:

"Almost overnight I gained full control over my physical and to some extent mental being. Can you imagine that until the age of 29 everything I wanted to do from getting out of bed to attending an important meeting had to be negotiated? . . . . Employing your own personal care assistants places negotiation on a different plane. You are not asking for favours or desperately attempting to change the (statutory) home carers rota. . . . Whereas my traditional form of help gave me no privacy and was often loaded with what people thought was 'best for me', I now decide my routines and I feel I have an equal say in how my home and my family life is run. This is, I believe, fundamental to one's dignity".

Ann Kestenbaum, in the case studies that she describes in "Cash for Care", quotes Mr. M's wife, aged 48, suffering from rheumatoid arthritis, heart condition and leg fractures as saying that having control of their own resources

"makes us feel in control of our lives. Gives us back the feeling of being people and not a pathetic handicapped family."

Ms K, who suffers from a spinal injury, says:

"Having the cash to pay for the things you need means you have standing."

Jenny Morris in "Community Care or Independent Living?" quotes Jack as saying:

"I am a husband, a father and a breadwinner. And 10 years ago I was in an institution where I could not even decide when I would go to the toilet. . . . You know you can't really understand it if you haven't done it. . . . Your whole life changes."

Jane Campbell endorses Jack's point impressively. She says:

"Contributing, of course, is the biggest gift that direct payments has awarded me. . . . I have been able to take up a demanding full-time job that is equal to my skills."

She works as a training director and she chairs the British Council of Organisations of Disabled People.

The moral, practical and financial arguments all reinforce each other. Jack and Jane contribute their skills to the betterment of society. They pay taxes. Jane attests that less stress as a result of less dependence on others and more control over her own body has had beneficial effects on her health.

Lord McColl, whose view on the point must carry particular weight, observed in last week's debate:

"a high morale directly enhances the body's defences against illnesses of all kinds. As a result, people have fewer illnesses and thereby save the National Health Service money."

The arguments in favour of independent living are familiar to the Government. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People inaugurated the independent living fund, something of which he is proud, and justly so.

The Under-Secretary of State for Health, Baroness Cumberlege, replying to the debate in the other place last week was emphatic when she said:

"We fully support the aim of enabling disabled people to live independently and to exercise choice. We wish to give local authorities freedom and flexibility to meet those choices in innovative ways and to see disabled people placed at the centre of decision making."

That statement is consistent with numerous other ministerial utterances and, I believe, truly reflects the spirit in which Ministers have sought to establish care in the community. What, therefore, is puzzling and deeply unsatisfactory is that Ministers, who express enthusiasm for independent living and scepticism about bureaucratic procedures and solutions, continue to refuse to allow local authority social services departments to make direct cash payments to severely disabled people.

I shall examine the objections that Ministers have put forward to direct payments by local authorities. The speech by the Under-Secretary of State in another place last Wednesday was the fullest and latest rehearsal of those objections.

The Minister made the point that social services departments and the social security system have different roles. She said:

"Social services departments arrange exactly that—services. The Benefits Agency provides cash benefits. It is the business of the social security system to provide cash to support individuals in need. It is not the business of local authorities."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 21 April 1993; Vol. 544, c. 1663-64.]

That seems to me a descriptive observation rather than an argument against change. Moreover, it is not entirely accurate as a description of the status quo. Local authorities make cash payments in certain instances and they do so under recent legislation—the Children Act 1989. Local authorities make payments to children leaving care. They make cash payments to foster parents. They also make cash payments to voluntary organisations. So, the Government cannot pray in aid as a principle of administration that local authorities should not make cash payments.

The Government have themselves legislated to enable local authorities to make payments to children and to able-bodied adults. I cannot imagine under what principle of administration disabled people alone should be excluded from receiving cash payments from local authorities.

In any case, even if the Minister's descriptive statement is broadly valid, that is not an argument for persisting slavishly with a fixed conception of the respective roles of different public service organisations. The Under-Secretary of State talked of the Government's fear of "imbalance", as if the existing bureaucratic structure were a thing of such beauty that its preservation had to be the paramount consideration, more important than finding better ways to help disabled people. Doubtless there were powerful reasons for that broad division of labour in the past, but society and its needs and our conception of how to meet them have moved on.

Throughout the 1980s my right hon. Friends have encouraged us to think of Government as enabler rather than provider and have encouraged those in the public service to think in terms of outputs and value for money rather than inputs.

Only yesterday, in an article in The Times, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster inveighed against the bureaucratic top-down model of governmental provision. He condemned the inadequacy of "rule-bound, hierarchical, uncompetitive old style service providers".

He went on:

"Any organisation that governs its employees by detailed rule books in the end will promote only the best operator of rules, not the innovator or the creator. Any organisation that believes it is accountable only upwards, to those who set the rules, will treat its citizen customers as troublemakers".

My right hon. Friend is right. For corroborative evidence, he need only read "Squaring the Circle", a study of needs assessment by Kathryn Ellis of the university of Birmingham for the Rowntree Foundation. She demonstrates the procrustean approach of social services staff, fitting clients into rigid categories of need, defined by pre-existing bureaucratic structures and assessment categories. Disabled clients who did not fit in and who expressed views of their own were dismissed as "demanding", "fussy", and "manipulative".

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster went on to emphasise the need to delegate financial responsibility down and measure outcomes.

In The Times today, my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury is reported as saying of the Government's review of the welfare state:

"We will consider all options . . . which will have the purpose of meeting our objectives, one of which is to focus benefits increasingly on those in need . . . we wqant to ensure people have greater control of their own resources".

[Mr. Alan Howarth]

So Cabinet Ministers are actively repudiating the status quo which the Under-Secretary of State was briefed to pray in aid last week.

The Under-Secretary of State went on to say that local authorities are providers, enablers and facilitators of care services. That is right and as it should be. But if local authorities are to be enablers and facilitators, the Under-Secretary of State undermined her own argument against them making direct payments to clients because enabling and facilitating is exactly what that process involves.

As the House knows, the Association of Directors of Social Services is unanimous in its support for direct payments by its departments. It passed a formal resolution to that effect last autumn. It is keen to move with the times.

I spoke yesterday to Mr. David Mason, director of social services for Warwickshire county council, who confirmed his urgent hope that the Government will change their mind on this subject. As he said to me,

"choice and empowerment come through purchasing power".

The Under-Secretary of State raised, however, another objection, which the Government have advanced repeatedly. She said that it would be difficult for local authorities to define eligibility for direct payments. I find that a singularly unpersuasive argument in the context of the Government's policy of care in the community. The essence and great virtue of the policy is that local authority social services departments are to lead in assessing the needs of individual clients. Their daily duty and activity, enjoined on them by the Government, will be to assess need and, therefore, eligibility for help of one kind or another.

But the Government have another argument to show that it could not be done. The Minister said that it would be difficult for local authorities to manage a general system of cash payments. That is an Aunt Sally. We are not talking about a general system. We are talking about a strictly finite and relatively small number of cases. In "Cause for Concern", published in March, Pauline Thompson provides the number of clients of the previous independent living fund authority by authority.

The largest number was in Birmingham, where there are 424; in my county of Warwickshire, there are 79; the smallest number was in Barking and Dagenham, where there are nine. Nor need the Treasury fear any opening of the floodgates. Mercifully, there are not large numbers of severely disabled people in this country and, of them, only a limited proportion want to handle their own budgets and employ their own assistants. When Kingston-upon-Thames social services department made inquiries as to how many severely disabled people might wish to take advantage of such an option, 12 said that they would.

6.30 pm

The Treasury continues all the same to fear that costs would run out of control. Last week the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State said the local authorities would find it difficult to carry out the necessary monitoring to keep control over public funds. Again, that is an odd assertion. It would be easier for local authorities to monitor and control individual budgets assigned to clients than it is for them to keep control over the costs of their own in-house services. There is no problem whatsoever in requiring clients to keep funds provided by social services departments and the ILF in a separate bank account and to be provided with regular statements, receipts and timesheets.

If the Treasury did not spend its time inventing imaginary difficulties, it would see that direct payments enable a given level of care to be achieved at less cost than the cost of publicly provided services. Evidence for that has been impressively marshalled by Jenny Morris, Ann Kestenbaum and Victoria Phillips. I shall not elaborate that part of the argument except to make the obvious point that there is far greater flexibility in pay rates and job descriptions for people employed directly by clients than there is for local authority employees.

My right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People, in his foreword to the "Evaluation of Personal Assistant Schemes" in Greenwich by Mike Oliver and Gerry Zarb, endorsed their cost-effectiveness. That report suggests that, for its £5 million-plus home help budget, Greenwich council could have purchased 665,912 hours of work; for the same amount the personal assistant scheme could have brought 1,450,569 hours. Similarly, the personal assistant scheme could have bought twice the number of care attendant hours.

Under the scheme that the Government are now introducing, there will be an incentive for councils to inflate their costs, to bring the cost of care packages above the £200 threshold for a contribution from the ILF 1993 fund.

In the debate in another place, the Minister also raised as an objection to direct payments that they would be at odds with the idea of a flexible response to individual circumstances and that somehow they would entail the creation of a separate social security system within social services with its accompanying rigidity. That would seem to be a through-the-looking-glass argument. A wealth of evidence demonstrates that cash payments which enable clients to manage their own arrangements for assistance provide enhanced flexibility. It is one of the strongest arguments in favour of direct payments.

Ann Kenstenbaum writes:

"Some of these arrangements are very flexible. Although the ILF award is assessed on the basis of regular hours of need, clients very often see their care needs in much less rigid terms. This is certainly true where care is essentially respite, allowing a family carer to have a break and get out of the house. It is also the case where a client's state of health and therefore care needs vary from one week to the next, or where a client leads a relatively active life engaging in different activities for which different hours of help are needed."

She goes on to describe the problems of rigidity in the provision of services by social services departments.

Mrs. B, with rheumatoid arthritis, is quoted as saying:

"Home helps are bound by too many rules. . . . You couldn't expect a home help to be so flexible because of the other people they have to see."

Mrs. J says:

"As a home help, she had to refuse to clean windows. Now (employed privately) if she is asked to do something, she just does it."

Miss C sums up the problem of rigid practices among local authority employees:

"They canna do this, canna do that.".

Those complaints take us into the arguments against yet another objection by the Government. The Under-Secretary of State said that cash payments by the social services department would be unnecessary because the new scheme ensures that in future the two parts of the package, cash from the ILF and services from the local authority, will be brought together

"so that the client receives a coherent package of care agreed jointly by the disabled person, the local authority and the new fund."

But this could have been designed as a model of cumbersome, time-consuming and expensive bureaucracy. I do not believe that care packages can be most cost-effectively designed if they are made up of £200 of services and extra cash put in from the ILF.

The Minister went on to emphasise that she would expect the disabled person to have

"as great a say as possible as to who is to be employed to provide the care."

She added:

"There is no reason why a care assistant should not be personally chosen by the disabled person."

I find it hard to credit that disabled clients will actually decide who is to be employed by local authorities. But if they are to have a say, why not go the whole way to autonomy? Would it not be less costly, administratively simpler and morally better for disabled people to employ their assistants?

The argument to which the Minister appeared to attach the greatest weight was that, while "in individual cases disabled people may be able to use money more effectively than certain authorities"— a grudging but useful acknowledgement—there is a risk that they will

"adversely affect authorities' ability to match their resources to all local needs, not just those of people receiving direct payments."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 21 April 1993; Vol. 544, c. 1664-65.]

That would be a powerful argument if it were true, but the Association of Directors of Social Services does not believe it to be valid. The truth is that many social services departments will find it extremely difficult to play their part in providing services to severely disabled people. To do so requires specialist resources and expertise.

One of the most important and worrying findings in Pauline Thompson's recent survey is that only a minority of severely disabled people receive services from their local authority. The case for allowing severely disabled people who wish to do so to design and manage their own care arrangements becomes all the more powerful. To the extent that social services departments do not have to commit staff and time to detailed organisation of care for people with complex needs, so they will be able to address themselves more fully to the huge range of their other responsibilities.

The Minister's one other argument was that it would not be right to expand authorities' "already very full agendas" by asking them to take on responsibility for cash payments. Would that the Government had always been so concerned not to impose on local authorities. But they need not be fearful of doing so in this instance. They would be easing the enormous burden that they have laid on local authorities with care in the community.

I apologise for having dealt with these arguments somewhat laboriously. But it is an important issue, and they are the arguments that the Government have so far invited us to accept. I cannot accept them, because they disintegrate as one looks at them. I do not think that the Ministers who have advanced them believe in them either. Lady Cumberlege said that she was sad to have to reject the case made by every speaker in last week's debate. She asked their Lordships not to shoot the messenger. I certainly have not meant to do that; she is held in warm personal regard.

However, it is our duty to debate the policy. If parliamentary debate is to count for anything, I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will heed the arguments that have been put forward from all parties and in both Houses. Early-day motion 1673 on independent living has been signed by 146 hon. Members of all parties. I hope that Ministers will respond positively to those arguments and views now because it is an urgent issue. My hon. Friend the Minister the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt), has said that the Government's position is not irreversible. Care in the community and the new independent living fund must be established on a sensible basis. We cannot continue to defer to the obstinate obscurantism of a departmental tradition which dates from 1948.

Ms Liz Lynne (Rochdale): I shall not detain the House for long, as the arguments have been well rehearsed by hon. Members on all sides of the House.

Direct payments to people with disabilities will help them to lead individual lives in the same way as everybody else. We all know that, and I believe the Minister is well aware of it. I hope that the Government will change their mind about the amendment, as it will empower people with disabilities and help them to feel as if we treat them as normal human beings, because that is what they are. If we do not allow them to manage their own lives, we are saying that they do not have the same rights as us.

One of the arguments was that it is not cost-effective, but it is very cost-effective. If people with disabilities do not stay in their own homes and cannot manage their own budgets, they will probably have to go into residential accommodation and that will cost a great deal more. I hope that the Government take that on board. If disabled people do not go into residential accommodation, yet again the carers will have to cope. The carers, who carry the burden all the time, will have to meet those needs. Under new community care legislation, much respite care will be cut because of insufficient Government funding. I urge the Government to change their mind.

I do not accept that there would be a lack of accountability. It will be far easier for an individual to liaise with his or her local authority than for the local authority to liaise with the provider of services. The individual can be in constant contact with the social services department as to his or her needs and the services that it is buying in. That argument also goes by the board.

Only a small number of people are involved, and for the Government to deny them a proper standard of living is extremely heartless. Cash payments are already made under the Children Act 1989, so a precedent has been set. I hope that the Minister will tell the Treasury that costs will not run out of control. There are too few people involved for that to happen. Disabled people should be able to enjoy their dignity and to manage their own lives. That is why I put my name to the amendment.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): There is unanimity on this issue on all parts of the House, and I will emphasise some of the points made with great force by other hon. Members in the belief that, as we say in Wales, "Dgtal donc a dgrr y garreg"—constant knocking breaks the stone. The stone that we have to crack is a strange and uncharacteristic stubbornness among Ministers.

[Mr. Paul Flynn]

Clause 1 gives the Secretary of State the power to make grants to the funds

"for such purposes as the Secretary of State may determine."

The amendment would define those purposes as

"promoting . . . independence and freedom of choice"

among the disabled. I am sure that we will share that aspiration.

The importance of the disabled receiving cash payments wherever possible is that they can make their own decisions—something very much with the grain of Government thinking on so many other issues—as to how the money should be spent and the services needed can best be provided.

The old ILF made payments direct to the person concerned, and that was a successful arrangement. The extension fund will continue to make such payments to those already receiving them, and the 1993 fund will make payments to the disabled and to third parties—and is likely to do so in most cases. The reason is that part of the money required will be provided by local authorities, which cannot make cash payments to the disabled but only provide services.

The 1993 fund trustees will probably feel that it makes more sense to deliver the full package in kind rather than part of it being paid in cash and the rest in kind. The solution is to give local authorities the power to make cash payments, as they can in Scotland. Ministers virtually conceded that that will have to be done sooner or later but, for reasons that perplex us, they have refused to do it now.

On Second Reading, the Minister of State said:

"Whatever may happen in the future, at a time when local authorities are taking on so many extra responsibilities in relation to community care, it is surely a mistake to add to those responsibilities a duty to manage cash."—[Official Report, 15 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 42.]

However, local authorities will have to "manage cash", whether they are making payments to their own employees, other organisations, or the disabled themselves. Making it possible for local authorities to pay money to the disabled where they think that is right will not add to their burdens. On the contrary, it will make their task easier if some people can organise their own services rather than rely on their local authority to do that for them.

In Committee, the Minister was even more forthcoming:

"No one who has stayed in close touch with the work of the independent living fund can be unaware of the importance of cash, as opposed to services, to empower disabled people to have control over their lives . . . current legislation does not enable local authorities to dispense cash . . .I suspect that that argument will be pursued with vigour by my hon. Friends, as well as by Opposition Members, who hold strong views on the matter, which will not go away. I recognise that the provision of cash maximises the freedom, the choice and the empowerment of disabled people. Current legislation does not provide for that and the Bill does not deal with it. However, I have noted carefully the hon. Gentleman's remarks."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 25 March 1993; c. 52.]

The Bill cannot deal with that point because of the narrow drafting of its long title—hence the amendment's indirect wording. However, there is nothing to prevent the Minister from giving an undertaking tonight that that point will be dealt with by suitable legislation at the earliest opportunity. We are only asking the Minister to confront the logic of his own persuasive arguments.

The Minister for Social Security and Disabled People (Mr. Nicholas Scott): I recognise the importance of debating this subject, which is in many ways central to community care. However, a number of problems confront me in respect of particular amendments. As the House will be aware, we are four weeks into the new care in the community arrangements. It would be unrealistic for the House to expect me to accept this evening amendments introduced at such an early point in those new arrangements.

Nevertheless, I acknowledge the debate's importance and the powerful speeches made by hon. Members on both sides of the House in support of the narrower point—although I understand why the amendment was drafted in the way that it was—of whether cash alone, a mixture of cash and services, or just services should be the response to meeting the needs of disabled people.

If I were tempted to accept the amendment and it were passed, that would involve changes to the activities of the trustees, who have all been appointed, and would involve the Charity Commissioners. That would not be an overriding consideration, but it would present problems, given that the trustees have held their first meeting and are deciding the way ahead. For those narrow reasons—I will come to the broader issues—it would be inappropriate to accept the amendment.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I appreciate my right hon. Friend's point about the practical difficulties of altering the terms of the trust just after it has been established—clearly the new trustees and their staff want to get on with the job on the terms already defined. However, is not the important issue of parliamentary accountability in question, in establishing the rules of the fund by way of a trust deed? Does my hon. Friend agree that it is important that there should be accountability to Parliament for publicly provided funds and that there should be scope from time to time to change the trustees' terms of reference?

Mr. Scott: There may be occasions during the life of the fund when, if there were strong and overwhelming feelings in the House, it would be necessary to alter the terms on which trustees settle matters. But it would be somewhat premature and untidy if, four weeks into the new arrrangements, we were to be persuaded to go down that route. Incidentally, I am not saying that I necessarily believe that the arguments being advanced at the moment will in due course be necessary, but at least for the time being I can rest on the fact that the timing would be singularly inappropriate at the moment.

The main debate that we have had today, however, is on the question of cash. Illumination has been provided by the debate in another place and by debates in Committee and the debate this evening has brought home how cash delivered by the predecessor independent living fund empowered people to make choices about the care with which they were provided. I, too, have read the reports and views of Ann Kestenbaum, Pauline Thompson and others. Nobody can read them without being impressed by the power of their arguments. They are extremely moving as well as persuasive. But I hope that the House will be prepared to accept that, persuasive and moving though the arguments may be, we are at present in a new situation, with care in the community operating in its infancy.

The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) and other hon. Members have made the point that, all too often in the past, the provision of care services by local authorities has tended to be inflexible. Sometimes, as in the example quoted by the hon. Member, it has even been uncaring and unresponsive to the varying needs of disabled people. I accept that such cases are in the minority and that many social service workers and carers employed by local authorities are immensely committed to their task and carry out their duties carefully and with flexibility.

Overall, however, I believe that the attitudes of local authorities have been changing and will continue to move away from what one might call the rather authoritarian attitude that has characterised some provision in the past, with local authorities deciding the disabled persons' needs and how they will be met. That is not a total caricature of the attitude of some local authorities to the provision of care, whether it be because of budgetary constraints or because of attitudes among some professionals, who believe that they can say what is best for those in their care.

We must recognise that, under the new community care arrangements, local authorities will increasingly become enablers rather than providers in the care business. They will be looking to organisations, private organisations, perhaps specially set up to provide care, perhaps voluntary organisations that can move into the business of providing care. We already know of some national organisations that are establishing schemes for looking after the group of disabled people in their particular remit; in some ways that could be a better path than local authorities seeking to provide all the services themselves. Local authorities becoming facilitators rather than providers will therefore be a very important part of this new approach. The fact that they must spend some 85 per cent. of the ring-fenced money in the non-public sector will be an important encouragement to move in that direction.

As we discuss this matter today we share a common aim: that the people who need help and caring services receive them. I do not apologise for repeating what I have said before: my colleagues in the Department of Health and I, as Minister for Disabled People, are anxious to see that package of services are arrived at after proper consultation with the recipient of the care packages and that local authorities will assess the needs through their own social workers and will then explain to the disabled person what they feel able to provide, but ask for his views and offer to make such changes as they feel they can.

Above that package of care, if the needs are in excess of the benchmark, the independent living fund, the 1993 fund, will be able to come in and provide the necessary extra cash. That will introduce the element of flexibility which has been so important.

The cash argument is unlikely to disappear simply because I am unable to accept these arguments. I am trying to deal with the matter on its merits at the moment. I believe that we should give the new arrangements a fair and clear run-in. But nobody who has been involved in the workings of the independent living fund over the whole of its life could fail to understand the importance of cash in the lives of many disabled people. It is important that instead of the fund coming entirely to an end when community care was introduced a month ago, we were able to have both the extension fund and the 1993 fund, in order to preserve this concept.

The Government will certainly monitor the impact of the new arrangements. Bearing in mind the strength of the views expressed across the House this evening, I have a feeling that I will be constantly reminded of the arguments that have been put forward and that the Government will have to reconsider this from time to time to see whether the new arrangements are bearing up or what changes may be necessary.

I thank all those who have contributed to the debate this evening. I end by reminding the House that although some examples have been put forward of local authorities being able to make cash payments, in general—Scotland is an exception—it is illegal for local authorities to make regular cash payments to individuals. They can make one-off payments in certain circumstances, but the concept of regular cash payments inherent in the arguments put forward this evening is at present generally illegal. If local authorities can devise schemes that are lawful, I will certainly not oppose their working with disabled people to work out innovative ways of giving disabled people more control over their care packages.

I have tried to respond to the debate, but, because I am unable to accept the amendments or the idea of introducing changes so early in the life of the community care arrangements, I must ask the House to reject the amendments. I hope that I do so with some tone of sympathy in my voice and some understanding of the arguments that have been put forward.

Mr. Sheerman: We are disappointed that the Minister has been unable to accept the amendments. Sometimes one listens to the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman and one tries to decode them as he is speaking. I feel that what he has said this evening needs some decoding. There is a sense in which he seems to be saying to the House, in a very quiet voice buried somewhere in the speech, that he is convinced of what the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) said in a very good speech and that he accepts that the moral case, as debated here and in Committee, has been made for accepting the principle embodied in the amendment. So I am encouraged by that voice in the right hon. Gentleman's speech.

However, we are not very impressed by some of the reasons for failing to act now. I am tempted to quote the immortal bard and say, "It's not our fault, guv," when the Minister points out that we are a month into community care and it is all too late. He could have prepared for this a year ago. He knew that the independent living fund was coming to the end of its five years and he had plenty of time to prepare. He has had a year since the general election. So he has no excuse not to have all this up and running, thought through and implemented a long time before now. He says that it is all very difficult because we are a month into community care and all the problems there.

There is an argument to be made—I will not elaborate too much, because we will come back to it on Third Reading—that the independent living fund was seen pragmatically as a great success, a great empowerer of disabled people. The independent living fund ran with great success for five years and the principles embodied in it could have been part of the doctrine that has now been introduced.

Another point about planning is that the Government —knowing that the independent living fund was coming to the end of its five-year life and that the community care package was coming in at the same time—could have extended the independent living fund for a short time until the community care package had bedded down. That is an argument that we have heard time and again from professionals—allow community care to bed down for a period and assess the match or mismatch between that and the independent living fund. I know that the Minister has heard that argument many times from many quarters.

The Minister said that his imagination had been illuminated by the debate, but he has given a catalogue of reasons for not being able to implement any of the suggestions at the present time.

My final point concerns the changed nature of local authorities. It is interesting that a Minister in the present Government should acknowledge that local authorities actually can and do do a good job. The Labour party has been saying that for 14 years, long and hard. Local authorities believe that cash payment is the best way to enable and facilitate this group of severely disabled people.

Consequently, local authorities, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the Association of Directors of Social Services and all the other organisations that have been quoted by hon. Members on both sides of the House are telling the Minister that the most effective way for severely disabled people to be helped is by the provision of cash by local authorities. I was encouraged by the Minister's closing remark—and I will be reading his speech very carefully tomorrow—that if arrangements were made by local authorities, by way of a trust or whatever, which will facilitate certain kinds of payments, he would not wish to stop that.

That is the only encouragement that I have been given, however, so we will be pushing this amendment to a vote.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington): I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 1, line 16, at end insert—

'(2A) Any grant made to the Independent Living (1993) Fund shall be subject to the condition that the Secretary of State shall have exercised his power under Clause 15 of the deed establishing that fund to revoke Clause 4(1)(d) of that deed.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that it will be convenient to discuss at the same time the following amendments: No. 3, in page 1, line 16, at end insert—

'(2A) Any grant made to the Independent Living (1993) Fund shall be subject to the condition that the relevant maximum sum referred to in Clause 4(1)(a) of the deed establishing the Independent Living (1993) Fund shall be not less than £500.'.

No. 4, in page 1, line 16, at end insert—

'(2A) Any grant made to the Independent Living (1993) Fund shall be subject to the condition that the Secretary of State shall have exercised his power under Clause 15 of the deed establishing that fund to revoke Clause 4(1)(c) of that deed.'.

Mr. Bradley: I am pleased to explain amendments Nos. 2, 3 and 4, which have been grouped together. As with amendment No. 1, it will be noted that these amendments command all-party support. Because of that, I hope that the Government will yet again listen carefully to the arguments on the amendments and that they will view their consequences sympathetically, with a view to accepting them and incorporating them in the successor funds to the independent living fund. [Interruption.]

The three amendments cover three important areas of consideration, which—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. A few sub-committees seem to be taking place throughout the Chamber. I am having difficulty in hearing the hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley). Will those hon. Members who are leaving the Chamber please leave quietly, and will those who intend to remain here please listen to the hon. Gentleman?

Mr. Bradley: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The amendments are extremely important for disabled people. I hope that those hon. Members who stay in the Chamber intend to make a contribution to the debate and to support the needs of disabled people, since the passing of these amendments would improve their lives in the future.

The amendments cover three different areas, but they have been linked because of the detailed debate in Committee on these issues. At this point, we should pay tribute to the many organisations that represent disabled people. They have done an immense amount of work in support of the amendments. I must also thank the Committee and those who spoke on Second Reading. I pay tribute to Age Concern, the Alzheimer's Disease Society, the Carers National Association, Caring Costs, The Spinal Injuries Association, the all-party disablement group and many other organisations that have worked so hard to ensure that there is detailed and informed scrutiny of the legislation, in particular these amendments.

The amendments cover three crucial matters. The first is the outrageous fact that the successor 1993 fund will not apply to anyone over working age, which basically means anyone over 65. The second is that a £500 limit is to be set on the total package of care from the local authority and the independent living fund together. The third is the important fact that, if the total package of care exceeds the £500 limit, the total burden of care falls back on the local authority. The problem is that there is no opportunity for the local authority to top up the care package above the £500 limit, and I shall deal in more detail with that issue later. I want especially to talk about the important concept of the sandwich, which was introduced in Committee.

Amendment No. 2 deals with the appalling situation identified by all the groups that represent disabled people in any way—that the successor fund will not apply to anyone over the age of 65. There is absolutely no justification for excluding older people from help with the extra costs of disability. The Government's decision amounts to unwarranted discrimination and penalises people for being old and for being disabled.

Statistics relating to the old independent living fund show that one in three—or 34 per cent.—of people who received help from the fund were over 65. Therefore, under the old fund the Government recognised the needs of people over 65 but are now denying them future help from the successor fund. That must be severely condemned on Report.

Disability should not be considered an inevitable part of aging. The majority of older people are not disabled. The Office of Population Censuses and Survey's disability study showed that only a third of people over 60 have a disability and that many older people live full and active lives into their 70s and beyond. For the minority who are disabled, their special needs and extra expenses do not decrease as they grow older.

The Government have made their own estimates of the cost of extending the fund to the over-65s. It is staggering that they estimate that extending the successor fund to new cases to cover people over retirement age will cost only £2 million in 1993-94, £6 million in total in 1994-95 and only £9 million in total in 1995-96. That information was provided in a written answer on 5 December 1992. In the context of the overall needs of disabled people, they are extremely modest sums in terms of the Government's total expenditure, and I urge the Government to think again about extending the scheme to the over-65s.

Again on their own estimates, the Government are expecting a total of only 1,500 cases a year to benefit from the fund. Extending the fund to the over-65s is hardly going to take public expenditure through the roof. I know that the Government have had to reign in public expenditure but, surely, the modest sums that I have mentioned could be included in that expenditure and the total package of care for disabled people.

On Second Reading and in Committee the Government argued that they thought it right to target resources on those who had become disabled earlier in life, who have higher care costs than older people and who have not been able to build savings or acquire pension rights. The Government have repeatedly stated that pensioners have had large increases in average incomes and that more people have had an opportunity to build sufficient income for their retirement to be able to afford the extra costs of disability. That is why the Government believe that they should not extend the fund to the over-65s.

However, many older people have not had that opportunity or the opportunity to benefit from the state earnings-related pension or the growing availability of occupational personal pension schemes. Many older people have been unable to acquire significant entitlement for their retirement because of unemployment, low pay, caring responsibilities or illness, so the evidence refutes the Government's argument that people over 65 have extra resources and will be able to look after themselves. That is clearly not the case. The Government should think again and try to include the over-65s in the successor fund.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is ironic that, because of the recent reduction in interest rates, some elderly people who have made personal provision by way of savings are finding that their savings are generating much less income and that they are now in difficulty? Does not that support his argument?

Mr. Bradley: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. It is ironic that, as inflation comes down, the amount of money on which people have become used to living also falls dramatically. Many elderly people have come to my advice surgeries recently, asking how they will manage on a reduced income which they have no way of boosting. They have their total capital on which they can receive interest and they have no other resources to help them with the escalating costs of disability as they get older. I hope that the Government will listen carefully to our arguments with a view to extending the fund to the over-65s.

As we made clear in the debate on amendment No. 1, we believe that the decision to limit the fund to the under-65s was Treasury-led. The Treasury has limited the amount of money and told Ministers that they must find a way of fitting the number of claimants into the pot. I do not believe for a moment that Ministers have done so with any great optimism or welcome, but they have used age as the cut-off mechanism for reducing the money involved. I hope that Ministers will put pressure on the Treasury to allow them the meagre extra resources to extend the fund to the over-65s.

I deal briefly with amendments Nos. 3 and 4, which would avoid the arbitrary limit of £500 being set on available care. We believe strongly that such a limit flies in the face of the purpose of the successor fund, which is to allow people to live independently. If there is a £500 limit and if it is exceeded, local authorities will obviously have to consider the relative and comparative costs of independent living and residential care. If it is found that the latter is cheaper than the costs that exceed the £500 limit, there will be pressure on local authorities to push people into residential care which flies in the face of the philosophy behind community care and any continuation of the independent living fund.

There was absolute uproar about the comments by the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People in an Adjournment debate on the independent living fund, introduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) on 25 February. The Minister said:

"I do not believe that . . . there is anything offensive in our setting an upper limit beyond which it is not unreasonable that people who need help should have to look to other sources to maintain their independence in the community, or to decide, sometimes reluctantly, that the time has come for them to go into residential care."—[Official Report, 25 February 1993; Vol. 219, c. 1126.]

The Minister may regret his words because of the outrage expressed by many groups representing disabled people. They know that those resources do not exist and that residential care is probably the only option. We should be doing all in our power to ensure that that is not the consequence of limiting to £500 the amount that can be spent.

7.30 pm

It is crucial that we consider how the allocation will operate within the £500. There was much debate about that in Committee, but I believe that there is still confusion among local authorities, care groups and disabled people's groups about how things will work in practice.

As I understand it, the £500 care package is split into two key elements, one of which consists of £200 worth of services provided by the local authority. The previous debate has thrown a little light on that matter, and it may now be possible for local authorities to translate that £200 into cash. We shall work closely with local authorities when we have carefully read the report of the debate, to work out how the arrangement will operate. The second element is a top-up of £300 in cash from the fund.

However, if the total package of care assessed for an individual will cost more than £500 the whole cost of that care falls back on the local authority and no contribution will be made from the independent living fund (1993). We believe that the concept of the sandwich that the Government have introduced is not real. As we said in Committee, it may be a Danish sandwich—an open sandwich with no slice of bread on the top. It will certainly not be a good British sandwich with a piece of bread, a filling and another piece of bread on top. I know that we are all moving into Europe, and that Maastricht is almost behind us, but there is a limit on how far we shall push our European credentials tonight.

I want the Government to be clear about the fact that the sandwich concept does not exist, because there is no opportunity for the local authority to come back and put a top layer on to the £300 element from the independent living fund. There is no opportunity for the local authority to top up the bread base—the £200—again. It is absurd not to allow the local authority to top up the sum to £600 or £700 if the cost goes beyond £500.

I emphasise again that, if that does not happen, the real consequence may be that the individual—we are talking here about the most disabled people, whose care packages may be the most costly—and indeed the whole group will be forced into residential care because of the comparison between the costs of the package of care put together by the local authority and the costs of residential care. Because local authorities are working within cash-limited budgets they will be forced to consider seriously the residential care option rather than the option of real independence, which we should all strive to bring about, and the empowerment of the individual—that is a phrase that we have heard many times—to ensure that he or she gets the best care possible in the community.

We have advanced strong arguments both in Committee and on Report about why the Government should think carefully again about the amendments. When we discuss the future of community care and how the independent living fund relates to it we all have the interests of disabled people and their carers at heart. I hope that the Minister will respond in the spirit in which the amendments were tabled, and according to the spirit in which the Government are shifting rapidly towards agreement on cash payments. I hope that he will recognise that, within the assistance provided by the local authority, there should be a cash element and also an opportunity for the local authority to come back and top up the total package, while the £300 contribution from the independent living fund continues to be made. Most crucially, all those arrangements should be extended to cover people over 65.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): For the severely disabled people they seek to help, every one of this group of amendments is profoundly important. They are all about protecting independence and freedom of choice for people whose claim to the attention of this House should be the priority of priorities.

Amendment No. 2 gives the House an opportunity to debate again an upper age limit which the organisations that work to help severly disabled people over 65 condemn as discriminatory and in conflict with natural justice. The Alzheimer's Disease Society, of which I am an honorary officer, says:

"We believe the age-limit for applications to the successor bodies of the ILF penalises people for being old".

It makes that sad comment by reference to the cases of elderly disabled people of very high dependency which the Bill, as drafted, will totally exclude from the help they need, and the Society adds:

"Such age discrimination is a crude example of a Government minimising public expenditure at the expense of an extremely needful group of people".

Some of the organisations that speak for elderly disabled people of high dependency feel so strongly about the age limit imposed by this Bill that they are already said to be thinking of involving the European Court of Human Rights if the Bill reaches the statute book in its present form. That must be of deep concern to right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House. I hope that it will also persuade the Government to think again about their stance on this issue both at Second Reading and in Committee.

[Mr. Alfred Morris]

Ministers will know that there is equally strong feeling in the voluntary sector about the maximum sum of £500 imposed by the Bill on help for personal assistance services to enable severely disabled people to live, as they undoubtedly want to live, in their own homes instead of being shut away in institutions. The Government have been told by the British Council of Organisations of Disabled People, for example, that it is actively considering a reference of this further issue to the European Court of Human Rights if the Bill goes unamended into law.

In the Adjournment Debate I initiated on the future of the independent living fund on 25 February, the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People said—I make no apology for recalling his words again—that in cases where severely disabled people need more than £500 to retain their independence, there is nothing

"offensive in our setting an upper limit beyond which it is not unreasonable that people who need help should . . . decide, sometimes reluctantly, that the time has come for them to go into residential care."—[Official Report, 25 February 1993; Vol. 219, c. 1126.]

All the major organisations of and for disabled people, as my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) said, have reacted with anger and disbelief to that statement. The Spinal Injuries Association, for example, which is held in the highest regard on both sides of the House, has described the statement as "most shocking" and asks whether "£500 is now the going price for freedom in this country?"

Mr. Scott: That has been quoted twice, but the fact is that that is not the only option available at that juncture. It is still possible for the local authority that would resume responsibility for the provision of care at that stage to decide, taking account of the needs and of the finances available, that it still wishes to retain the independence of that person within the community rather than making provision for residential care. That is still a choice open to the local authority at that stage.

Mr. Morris: I have heard about the "sandwich" concept and even more about the resource constraints on local authorities. They put it to me, as they do to other right hon. and hon. Members, that they are already finding it extremely difficult to meet their legal duties under existing law. I shall come in more detail to the difficulties of local authorities as I proceed.

The Spinal Injuries Association is not alone in bitterly criticising the imposition of the £500 limit. Other organisations have described it as "forced incarceration" and "imprisonment without crime". At the very least, I hope that the Government will accept that it will be demeaning not only for them, but for this House as well, if the question of what is permissible treatment of severely disabled people in this country has ultimately to be decided not here but in the European Court.

There is widespread concern and dismay not only about the ceiling of £500 which the Government are imposing, but also the effects of this policy for severely disabled people who have been receiving direct payments from their local authorities to buy in the personal help they need to remain living in their own homes. Again as the Government must know, some authorities have been making direct payments for this purpose over a long period. Will they be allowed to go on doing so? If not, will they be required to provide personal assistance themselves or to arrange for a third party to do so in lieu of the direct payments they have been making to disabled people?

If provision by the local authority is to continue, will disabled people be able to select their own personal assistants as they do now under the existing ILF arrangements? If they are not to have this right, then ipso facto the Government are seeking to create two classes of disabled people. That local authorities overwhelmingly support direct payments, the House should be in no doubt. In a recent survey by the Disablement Income Group of 68 directors of social services, it was found that 58 supported the principle of direct payments.

There is, however, an even more fundamental objection to the Government's apparent determination to end the direct payments that local authorities have been making to disabled people. It is a legal one of which the right hon. Gentleman, if no one else here tonight, must be fully aware. I say this because he will have been advised, as I was as the Minister, that when a local authority has identified and accepted a disabled person's need, it is the legal duty of the authority to meet that need. That is the legal advice given to me as the Minister, as I informed the House in the debate on the Second Reading of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons (Amendment) Bill at column 1923 on 2 February 1979. I have checked, on several occasions since then, that identical legal advice has been given to all my successors as Minister since 1979, including the Prime Minister when he was Minister for Social Security and the Disabled in 1987.

The direct payments made by local authorities have been made, in each case, after identifying and accepting need. Moreover, for them now to reduce or withdraw that help could put them in conflict with the law. This is because, like me, all my successors as Minister have been legally advised that for a local authority to withdraw, or even to reduce, help it has been giving a disabled person is unlawful if there is no diminution in his or her needs.

Yet this is the position into which many local authorities may be forced by what the Government are proposing. Indeed the trustees of the independent living fund (1993) are being asked to participate with local authorities in the taking of decisions that could be legally challenged. Their power to provide financial assistance is strictly prescribed as follows:

"The Trustees will negotiate and agree the financial assistance they provide pursuant to the Power (in the Deed) on the basis that:

if the relevant local authority ceases to provide the Threshold Sum (as defined in the Deed) the Trustee will cease to provide such financial assistance . . . the Trustees may cease to provide all or any such financial assistance without notice if they think fit."

So if a local authority fails to provide at least £200 a week, the trustees will cease to provide assistance and the need the local authority has identified, and for which a disabled person has been assessed, could go unmet, in straight conflict with the legal advice given to me and all my successors as Minister. I am not being hypothetical but addressing an existing difficulty for many local authorities, and the legal implications are extremely serious. Indeed, in a recent survey of directors of social services, who were asked how confident they were that their local authorities would be able to provide help at the £200 level for everyone who was assessed as needing at least that much, only one director was "very confident", 25 were only "fairly confident" and 32 were "not confident".

Thus, many local authorities could find themselves in legal difficulties through no fault of their own. For this I do not directly blame the Minister; indeed, I was very kind to him at Second Reading in saying that this is, in truth, a Treasury and not a DSS Bill. It is incontestably a Treasury Bill in the sense that it was the Chancellor who decided how much would be spent on independence and choice for disabled people. He decided what Peter Large, speaking for the Disablement Income Group, has described as the "beggarly" sum of £4 million to be allocated to the ILF (1993); and it is the Chancellor who must take main responsibility for what the Bill proposes.

It is, however, for the Minister for Disabled People or his nominee to reply to this debate tonight and I trust that he will address the very real concerns of disabled people and their organisations, as well as those of local authorities, that I have raised. I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The House will be relieved to know that I do not intend to speak on this group of amendments at anything like the length I spoke on amendment No. 1. However, there are one or two arguments to which I wish to draw attention and others that have already been put forward which I wish to reinforce.

Amendment No. 2 concerns the ineligibility of people over 65. I appreciate my right hon. Friend's concern to provide better help to younger, severely disabled people. The whole House must endorse that objective. However, I say with respect that it is not clear to me that that provides an argument for excluding people over 65 from becoming eligible for receiving support from the new independent living fund.

After all, if the argument for supporting younger people is that they will not have had the opportunity to build up savings, we should remember that elderly people who would be eligible for support from the independent living fund would not have been able to amass substantial savings. As I understand it, they must be eligible for income support, and they would not be eligible for income support if they had accumulated substantial personal capital. I do not quite follow my right hon. Friend's argument on this point.

I find it hard—indeed, impossible—to see how we can justify denying people who become severely disabled after the age of 65 the opportunity for independent living. The Government's continuing insistence that they are not prepared to allow social services departments to make direct payments is relevant to this. I contend that independent living in the proper and full sense involves having control of one's own resources.

Although, as my right hon. Friend said during an intervention in the speech by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), it would be possible for social services departments to support people to live in the community, my fear is that if those severely disabled people who were so supported did not have control of their own budgets and were not able to design and manage their own care packages, they would be in danger of being effectively institutionalised in the community. That is not care in the community in the sense that any of us understand it.

I do not understand why the Government want to create two categories of people over 65: those who might in some sense—it is a strange use of the term—be regarded as "fortunate" because they became severely disabled before 65 and are, therefore, eligible for financial support from the fund, and the rest. It seems to be an arbitrary distinction and I cannot imagine any satisfactory defence for it.

If the argument is about cost, it does not seem to be a sufficiently powerful one because, on the Government's figures, the cost of extending eligibility to people over 65 to become recipients of grants from the new fund would not be exorbitant. On the Government's figures, it will be an extra £2 million in the first year, rising to £9 million in 1995-96. While I fully appreciate the importance of firm discipline in controlling the costs of the massive social security budget, the figure of £9 million of 1995-96 is effectively invisible in the context of a Department of Social Services budget of £80 billion.

Amendments Nos. 3 and 4 relate to the £500 limit. I put it to my right hon. Friend the Minister that he and his colleagues, especially those in the Treasury, need not fear the cost of lifting that limit because the numbers in question are small. In the context of total public expenditure on welfare, we are talking about something that will be hardly discernible.

Indeed, while we must always seek to find solutions that are cost-effective as well as humane, domiciliary care is cheaper and therefore more cost-effective than residential care in almost every instance. I cannot understand the argument for setting the limit, which seems to be an arbitrary one, on £500 with the combined value of the package of services from the Department of Social Services and grant from the independent living fund. On the contrary, it seems to be a waste of public resources effectively to drive people into residential care.

The most important argument is a morale one. Surely, if anything, there is a greater moral imperative to enable the most extremely disabled people to live independently in the full sense that I described earlier. I ask my right hon. Friend this question: has any similar ceiling been set for any other category of clients? I am not aware that it is so. If no such ceiling has been set, why do the Government propose to set a ceiling on the package of support from those two sources which would be available to severely disabled people?

Mr. Wigley: I shall intervene briefly because, unfortunately, I have had little opportunity to take part in this debate, not having been on the Committee. I support the amendments which have been tabled. I shall refer to a few points that have been made and perhaps elaborate on them.

The argument against an arbitrary cut-off at the age of 65 is strong. There is a growing concern among elderly people and those organisations campaigning on their behalf that there appear to be more instances of this approach—a cut-off at a certain age, at the age of 65 or thereabouts. We are familiar with a cut-off on age with regard to the mobility allowance in the past and the mobility element in the present disability living allowance. Such a cut-off causes considerable rancour. All hon. Members will have had constituents coming to them and saying, "I am aged 67 or 68. I have identical circumstances to another person who is a few years younger who has suffered a disability. He or she gets a mobility allowance: I do not."

A cut-off based on age can be unfair. We know, from the representations that we have received from organisations on behalf of elderly and disabled people, of the feeling that there is discrimination in the national health service against older people. There is an assumption that when people reach a certain point they are bound to start disintegrating and may well have to live with worse circumstances than would have been acceptable at a slightly younger age. That is causing concern.

For a cut-off at the age of 65 to be built in merely to make a modest saving of less than £10 million a year, the Government must re-examine the matter. After all, the policy relates to care in the community and the changes are meant to take into account the needs of individuals. Packages are meant to be tailored to individual needs and enable people to stay in the community. That should be equally applicable to a large number of people over the age of 65, as it is to people below the age of 65. Sixty-five is not an age at which one should expect life to come to an end or a significant deterioration to take place thereafter. Many people over 65 have an active life and a major contribution to make. The fact that some disabilities may impinge on some aspects of those lives should not mean that they are regarded as needing less support than those at a slightly younger age.

Reference has been made to the cost of disability in general. Certainly, it is a significant cost. However, many aspects of life cost more as people get older—for example, the cost of heating—and, inevitably, people of a greater age face a greater burden. That will not be helped by the imposition of VAT on fuels that the Government have introduced, which will hit elderly people especially hard. I had hoped that the Government would take on board the need to ensure that there is no unnecessary demarcation against people above a certain age threshold. The cut-off seems to be an unnecessary demarcation. I put it to the Minister that, perhaps in another place, the Government can re-examine the matter if they cannot accept the wording of the amendment tonight.

I was impressed by the argument put forward by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) with regard to the possibility of legal cases. The last thing that local authorities need is to be tied down with fighting legal cases. They have enough on their hands in ensuring that client groups get the necessary services and attention and the full focus of their attention, rather than being sidetracked into such cases. We seem to be spoiling this specific ship for a penn'orth of tar. I implore the Minister to re-examine the matter.

Mr. Flynn: The three fine amendments deal with many aspects of the Bill, which has been discussed at various stages. The Government's view is unclear. It is difficult to deal with this uncanny situation in which hon. Members from four parties are saying the same thing in remarkably similar speeches and only the Government are opposing them.

Amendment No. 2 provides an opportunity to remove the indefensible age limit. In Committee, the Minister of State defended the age limit on the ground of priorities, arguing that, first, younger disabled people were more likely to need longer-term care and, secondly, those who were disabled early in life had lost the opportunity to earn or save, have occupation pensions or provide for their own retirement. For the reasons given eloquently in previous speeches, I will not go into much detail about the faulty thinking behind those two conclusions.

The implication of the Government's thinking is still not clear. Is it that local authorities, in deciding what needs will be met, will give lower priority to those over 65 so that funding from the independent living fund is not required by that age group because their needs will remain unmet? If it is implied that local authorities will discriminate against those over 65, it makes a mockery of the whole community care strategy for elderly people.

There is an alternative interpretation—that local authorities will give equal priority to those over 65 but will bear the whole cost, rather than sharing it with the independent living fund. If that is the implication, it is unrealistic: it will not happen. In deciding what services local authorities can provide, they are bound to be influenced by the availability or non-availability of grants from the independent living fund. Therefore, in practice elderly people will receive less adequate services than younger people with precisely the same needs. That cannot be fair or just.

Where part of the domiciliary service is met by the independent living fund, the local authority will have less incentive to remove people from their home and place them in institutions. So the age limit on ILF payments will make elderly people more likely to be offered institutional care than younger people with similar disabilities. Can that be what the Government intend? Is it their view that institutions are a bad thing, but that they are good enough for the over 65s? I look forward to the Minister's reply to that question.

Amendment No. 3 deals with clause 4(1)(a) of the trust deed, which says:

> "No candidate shall be paid more than the relevant Maximum Sum in respect of any week".

The maximum sum is £300 or a larger sum fixed by the Secretary of State. That is on top of the £200 threshold sum paid by the local authority. That makes in total a maximum of £500 per week that can be spent on any individual.

8 pm

In Committee, an amendment was tabled requiring the Secretary of State to rescind clause 4(1)(a) of the trust deed, thus removing the maximum sum altogether. Sadly, the amendment was defeated. Hence we have tabled this more modest amendment, which would raised the maximum sum to at least £500, making a total of £700 when the local authority's £200 contribution was added.

The Minister of State told the Committee that there would be only a handful of cases in which the total cost would exceed £500. So the number of cases in which the total cost would exceed £700 would be very small.

Therefore, the effect of amendment No. 3 would be virtually the same as if there were no maximum sum. The consequences in monetary terms would be slight.

As all payments from the 1993 fund will be made at the trustee's discretion, doing away with the maximum would not mean that every application, however large, would be met in full. It would simply mean that the trustees would be allowed to decide each application on its merits. It would give them a little more flexibility, taking into account the size of their annual budget and the number of applications received. Amendment No. 3 is an eminently sensible amendment.

Amendment No. 4 deals with the concept that the Minister of State introduced in Committee. It would be helpful for the House to consider what happened on the two days of the Committee. During the first day, the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman moved an amendment to remove the £300 maximum sum. My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) concluded his speech at five minutes to one. The Minister of State proposed that the debate be adjourned so that he could give "a considered response" at the next sitting. Between that sitting and the next, the Minister had the vision of a sandwich which he introduced to us at the beginning of the proceedings at the next sitting on 25 March.

So the concept of the sandwich was not an off-the-cuff reaction but a carefully prepared response. He assured the Committee that the effect of the maximum payment would not be to force people into residential care. In introducing the concept of the sandwich, he said:

"I shall give the Committee a concept, which should be easily understood, of how the new system will work. The independent living (1993) fund will, in a sense, be the filling of the sandwich, with bread on both sides, which will be provided by local authorities. Below £200, the local authority will have the responsibility to provide the services that disabled people need in order to maintain themselves in the community. Once the £500 maximum is reached, the responsibility will again revert to local authorities, which will have to decide whether domiciliary or residential care would be the most appropriate support."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 25 March 1993; c. 36.]

Later in the debate, the Minister had to amend his concept. Perhaps it is fair to say that he admitted that there had been inaccuracy in what he had said. Certainly, he had got the concept wrong, even if it was not inaccurate. He said that if the total cost was more than £500, far from the ILF providing the filling in the sandwich, it would not be allowed to make any contribution. Instead of a sandwich there would be two slices of bread with nothing in the middle.

That is very different from the concept of the open sandwich—the rather non-communautaire suggestion made by my hon. Friend the Member for Withington. It would be a vegetarian sandwich, a dieter's sandwich or a Chelsea sandwich. It would be an entirely unsatisfactory sandwich, because it would have no filling. That is the effect of clause 4(1)(c) of the trust deed, which amendment No. 4 seeks to remove.

It is not surprising that the Minister got it wrong. The sandwich concept is a revealing visual aid. It not only makes sense but it is the only way in which the fund could operate fairly and effectively as a support to the most severely disabled people and to the local authorities responsible for providing them with community care.

Amendment No. 4 would not affect the £300 maximum payment. If the total weekly cost of care was more than £500, the ILF could still pay only the £300. But the local authority would be able to decide whether to provide the top slice of the sandwich or alternatively to offer institutional care. The Minister told the Committee that there would be only a handful of cases in which the total cost would exceed £500. So the sums of money involved are relatively small. The money would be spent on enabling a handful of severely disabled people to live independently. The view that they should be able to do so is shared by hon. Members in all corners of the House.

One hopes that the amendments, which are supported by all parties in the House except the Government—or one might say that they are opposed only by the Treasury—will be accepted.

Ms Lynne: Like other hon. Members, I shall not speak for long on the amendments. I cannot understand the reason for the age limit. There seems to be no rhyme or reason for it. The Government's figures, which have already been quoted, show that extending ILF to people over 65 would cost £2 million in 1993-94, rising to £9 million in 1995-96. That is hardly an enormous sum of money when one considers the budget with which the Government are dealing in the Bill. It can be classed as peanuts.

The Government argue that they should target resources on younger people. They argue that older people have had time to save. I argue the reverse. Many people with disabilities have not had time to save. Many of them have been unemployed. Many of them have not been able to work for their living, or they have been on low pay. Many have had caring responsibilities. It does not necessarily follow that someone who is older has been able to save a great deal of money, or even any money.

The income of older people with disabilities continues to be lower than that of people below pension age. Surveys have shown that the income of single disabled pensioners is 88 per cent. that of younger disabled people. Furthermore, older people have already suffered discrimination in the benefits system. For example, they cannot claim disability living allowance. They cannot claim invalid care allowance for the first time after reaching 65 and are thereby excluded from claiming carer premiums. Therefore, I urge the Government to change their mind.

I also urge the Government to change their mind on the £500 limit. Again, I cannot understand the reason for it. It would not cost the Government a great deal of money to remove it. The fund will assist only if local authorities provide £200 worth of services. I should like some clarification of that. It appears from Government guidelines that if the cost of meeting needs goes beyond £500, the ILF will not provide any money and the disabled person will have to rely on the local authority.

I see no justification for that. How was that £500 limit decided upon? Was it an arbitrary figure plucked out of the air? It certainly appears to have been. In an article on 4 February in Social Work Today, a Department of Social Security spokesperson was quoted as saying that fewer than 1 per cent. of current ILF clients claimed more than £500. The Minister has agreed that the number of claimants is small, so it would not cost the Government a great deal of money to remove the cash limit of £500.

Is there any evidence that residential accommodation will be a cheaper option? I doubt it very much. The

[Ms Lynne]

Minister also appears to believe that it will not be cheaper, so why will the ILF be cash-limited? I hope that the Minister will answer those questions.

In terms of caring for people with learning difficulties, the ILF client costs, on average, £140 a week. Those in residential care cost, on average, £272. Once again, no saving is involved. Surely the savings made in the vast majority of cases will more than offset the extra costs of a few exceptional cases.

I do not believe that people's civil rights should be cash-limited, but I fear very much that that is what the Government will end up doing unless they accept the amendments.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Alistair Burt): I am glad to have the opportunity to reply to the debate, which has, once again, been characterised by contributions from a succession of speakers who have a knowledge and understanding of disability and matters related to it.

Those hon. Members are beguiling in their different ways. I particularly enjoy the speeches of the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn). He sets up such outrageous false premises about what the Government intend to do that no reasonable individual could gainsay what he said if there was a ha'penny of truth in the case that he set out. That is why he is so beguiling. I shall seek to reassure the House that there was not a scintilla of truth in what he suggested were the Government's proposals. There is no need for us to be beguiled by his arguments.

A variety of hon. Members have spoken with their usual care and passion. The hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley), who moved the amendments, has good knowledge of this subject and we had good debates in Committee. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) is well known for his experience in this subject. My hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth), who made a significant contribution on Second Reading, also spoke, as did the hon. Member for Newport, West, to whom I have already referred. The hon. Member for Rochdale (Ms Lynne), my constituency neighbour, speaks well on these matters for her party.

Mr. Alfred Morris: The Minister has forgotten the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley).

Mr. Burt: I am a doctor's son and bad handwriting is hereditary. I did not see that I had written the name of the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley). I apologise to him. He always speaks with knowledge and great integrity on this matter. I enjoyed his comments.

I preface my remarks by repeating what I said on Second Reading, because the idea that community care does not exist tends to lie behind all the amendments. It is felt that the ILF is the only thing upon which people may depend when they are in need. I stress, once again, that the ILF is a sandwich—I shall talk about that in detail later—which is additional to care that is now provided in a different way.

Community care will provide individual, specialised care for those who need it. It will be based on an assessment of need. It does not imply residential care beyond a certain financial limit, but that local authorities and those responsible for the care of the elderly and the disabled will be able to consider people individually in a way that was not possible before. The ILF is a useful adjunct to that process, but the arrangements for that fund cannot in any way be considered as independent of community care. I sometimes feel that the misapprehensions about the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990 are based on that basic misunderstanding of Government policy.

Although the three amendments under consideration could be taken together, I shall deal first with amendment No. 2. That amendment would extend the eligibility of the 1993 fund to those over the age of 66. I am unable to accept that amendment. Once awarded, payments for the fund will continue until they are no longer needed. There is no cut-off to those who have been awarded that payment once they reach the age of 66 and they will continue to receive the payment for as long as it is needed.

The community care reforms which have been made since April 1992 are designed to ensure that the care needs of all disabled people, including those who are severely disabled, are catered for by local authorities. Those authorities have been adequately resourced to meet the needs. The right hon. Member for Wythenshawe made some disparaging comments about the amounts in the ILF budget, but it is wrong to look at that budget in isolation from the community care provisions.

As well as the £4 million for the 1993 fund, we will spend a further £120 million on the extension fund and an extra £26·8 million on local authorities. That amounts to spending of more than £150 million, a significant increase on current estimated expenditure on the ILF of under £100 million. In addition, the £565 million allocated for community care, once added to that total, creates a significant package. I do not believe that it is fair to isolate a small amount for the new fund and to say that that represents total funding.

Mr. Alfred Morris: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way and I shall intervene briefly. My main point is that local authorities have said that in very many cases they will find it difficult to find the sum of £200. If they cannot find it, the process of helping many severely disabled people does not even start. It is only what local authorities tell me and other hon. Members on both sides of the House about their resource problem that makes us speak as we do in debates such as this.

Mr. Burt: I understand the right hon. Gentleman's point, but, like me, he has some experience of local authorities and what they say to a Government when they ask for funds. I maintain what I have already said: that the total amount that has been put into community care is considerable. I have already cited the figures. All local authorities constantly wish for more. Recently, I listened to a radio programme in which the director of social services in Newcastle said that local authorities would always want more but that they would work with what they have. The Government have made a substantial commitment to community care and I do not believe that the right hon. Gentleman's concerns will come to pass.

Given the limited resources that remain available, we believe that it is reasonable to limit the scope of the 1993 fund to people aged between 16 and 65, because people in that age group are the most likely to have longer-term care needs. Those disabled early in life have often lost the opportunity to earn and save. We believe that the highest priority for independent living must be given to those for whom the usual pattern is to live and work in the community. That does not mean, however, that those over the age of 65 are abandoned in terms of receiving help or being given the opportunity for independent living.

There is no suggestion that, simply because an application to the ILF cannot be made after the age of 65, the sort of domiciliary care that might be needed or requested cannot be made available by a local authority. It can and will be. That is the raison d'être of community care. The care will be tailored more neatly to the requests of an individual. That will apply to someone who asks a local authority for care and assistance at whatever age, including beyond 65 years. The mere fact that the ILF is not available does not disqualify those over that age from the individual care and provision that they would want.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon said that he was concerned about parameters and the 65 age limit creeping in. There are good reasons and historical precedents for setting age limits. When mobility allowance was originally introduced by a previous Government, an upper age limit and a cut-off point were set, after which the allowance would not continue. This Government changed that rule to enable the allowance to continue beyond the upper age limit. There is nothing unusual or wrong in a Government setting upper limits or parameters. Bearing in mind the support mechanism that community care provides in itself, our policy of making the fund available before the age of 65, and allowing it to continue beyond that age for those who needed it, provides an answer to those who are worried about the age limit and eligibility.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My hon. Friend said that the independent living fund was a useful adjunct to the resources of social services departments to enable them to provide the necessary help to severely disabled people. Why is it a useful adjunct for some people over the age of 65, but not for others?

Mr. Burt: It is simply that there is a requirement to set parameters for the fund. For the reasons that I have given, we believe that it is right to target the resources between the ages of 16 and 65 for applicants, but we want the availability to continue, which is perfectly fair. The trouble with an adjunct is that, once set up, people see it, not as an adjunct, but as an integral part of the system. The basic system is community care, and we have produced something extra to help those who qualify.

Mr. Bradley: Part of the difficulty of denying the fund to those over the age of 65 is that they will be denied access to £300-worth of cash, which could be tailored to their own needs. That reinforces the argument and I hope that the Minister will reconsider the argument for allowing local authorities to provide cash so that there is no discrimination between under-65s and over-65s.

Mr. Burt: The hon. Gentleman seeks to reopen a previous debate on cash, and I cannot respond to him. However, I stress that we see the best of community care provision coming in the independent care package, which will be available to those of all ages, with or without the independent living fund. The necessity of limiting the age of eligibility in no way denies the opportunity for local authorities to provide just as individul, just as caring and just as home-based a package for those over 65 as for those under 65.

Amendments Nos. 3 and 4 deal with finance, the parameter of £500 and the sandwich of care. Amendment No. 3 would place an unreasonable restriction on the fund's operation. In the past, the ILF used to relax or restrict the rules according to budgetary constraints. It is quite proper that that flexibility should be available in future to the trustees. Trustees have a legal responsibility to ensure that the fund's resources are appropriately distributed in a manner consistent with the trust's purposes. The £500 limit is one of the parameters that has been set around the new scheme to help to focus the trustees' attention on the client group targeted by the 1993 fund. To remove their ability to reduce that limit would effectively remove some of their discretion. I cannot imagine that the trustees would want to reduce that limit, but it would be wrong to take away their power to do so.

Amendment No. 4 aims to undo the main feature of the new fund: the partnership with local authorities. Nothing stands still, but some hon. Members seem unwilling to acknowledge that, in the sphere of independent living, the world has changed and we have to move with the times. The old independent living fund had to work independently of local authorities, but now we have the new community care arrangements in place.

One of the problems that the old ILF faced was the fact that its existence provided an incentive to local authorities to offload their responsibilities on to the fund. At that time, local authorities were not ready to provide flexible and personalised care services and severely disabled people instead looked to the independent living fund for help. Now local authorities have been given a special transitional grant for community care, which in Great Britain includes an extra £27 million—rising to £100 million in 1995-96—to meet the costs of those clients who would have gone to the ILF under the old arrangements, and the costs of meeting the first £200 of services for those who receive help from the 1993 fund. That last point answers the question of the right hon. Member for Wythenshawe.

Mr. Sheerman: I know that the Minister may have a pressing engagement, but the Opposition take the new arrangements covered in the Bill seriously. The Minister should not gabble through his speech as though he had an important engagement. We want to listen to the arguments. It is not good enough for the severely disabled people in this country for the Minister to rattle through the speech with no feeling. It gives no hope for disabled people.

Mr. Burt: Every time I am tempted to give the hon. Gentleman the benefit of the doubt and presume that underneath that extraordinary exterior lies a reasonable man, I am proved wrong.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): I was appalled at the intervention of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman). The only passage of his speech through which my hon. Friend the Minister rattled was that giving the terms of the deed. The rest of his speech was given at a perfectly normal speed. We understood it, and if the Opposition did not, that is their bad luck.

Mr. Scott: Ignore the hon. Gentleman's intervention.

Mr. Burt: I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) and perhaps I would do best to take the advice of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People and simply ignore the intervention of the hon. Member for Huddersfield.

Local authorities have been properly resourced for their responsibilities and it would be wrong for the 1993 fund to find itself taking on the full burden of a task which is the primary responsibility of the local authority. The key feature of the new fund is the partnership arrangement with the local authority. The visiting social workers of the ILF have built up expertise in the assessment of needs for people with severe disabilities which is rightly admired. But it is the local authority's social worker who is best placed to identify the resources and services available locally to translate that assessment into a viable care package. The requirement for the local authority to pay for the first £200 of services ensures that the care package is one that reflects the best that can be provided for the particular client in his or her locality.

Clients coming to the old ILF had to take as given whatever the local authority was willing to provide, and the ILF social worker would suggest a package of care to fit around and supplement those services. Under the new system, the whole package of care will be designed as one, from the start, by the fund and the local authority working in partnership.

I was asked questions about the sandwich. I do not know how the hon. Member for Withington recognises a sandwich, but we in Bury recognise a butty when we see one. The butty that we are discussing is straightforward. It has a bottom layer—the local authority provision of care up to £200, which is the basic threshold—then the independent living fund, which can be included as a discretionary element, and the top slice of the butty is the local authority's responsibility to take on statutory responsibilities for the elderly over the £500 limit. The middle element consists of the provision that can be made up by the independent living fund.

Mr. Bradley: If a butty in Bury consists of two pieces of bread and a filling that is removed if it goes above the £500 limit, the people of Bury will be disappointed that their Member of Parliament does not feed them better. Clearly, if the ILF element goes beyond £500, it is removed. Someone cannot eat that element and then eat another part of the local authority provision. The Minister must recognise how the system will work. We cannot pretend that someone can pass through the £500 limit and still retain the £300 from the independent living fund. Everyone, including the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People, has made that clear, and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary is trying to confuse the issue yet again.

Mr. Burt: Culinary expertise is better in Bury than in Manchester. I always thought that a butty contained a bottom, a middle and a top. The bottom layer here up to £200 is covered by the local authority. The top layer, above £500, is also provided by the local authority. The independent living fund can be used in the middle and that is the middle of the sandwich. The care sandwich is made up of what the local authority provides top and bottom, with the ILF in the middle. That is as clear a definition of a sandwich as I have heard.

8.30 pm

Mr. Bradley: Is the Minister now saying that one can have £200-worth of services from the local authority, plus £300 in cash from the ILF, plus an element of service on top of that from the local authority? Is that the butty he has in mind?

Mr. Sheerman: That is a good butty.

Mr. Burt: What a Yorkshireman knows about a butty nobody can guess. The situation is as clear as I have explained. Whatever sort of concoction Opposition Members are trying to create, I have presented a straightforward sandwich of care—[Interruption.] The layer of care up to £200 is wholly local authority money. The layer over £500 is totally local authority. The middle of the sandwich is money available from the ILF. That is the care package.

I am referring not to an individual case, but to the total package of care. That involves local authority assistance below £200 and local authority assistance above £500, with the ILF working in the middle. That is the definition of the sandwich which came through in Committee and it is that which the hon. Member for Withington is seeking to distort.

Mr. Morris: I have some experience of living within reach of Bury. Is not it a fact that butties from Bury are usually filled with black pudding?

Mr. Burt: And they are grand. I am describing the package of care in the form of a sandwich and I am not relating it to an individual—[Interruption.]

Mr. Flynn: The Minister is making a meal of it.

Mr. Burt: I am talking about——

Mr. Bradley: A Bury sandwich?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. We must have fewer sedentary interruptions, or it will be a case of too many cooks spoiling the broth.

Mr. Burt: The case being made by Opposition Members is based on their perception that the failings of the new ILF, because of a failure of community care, will discriminate against those whom they wish to protect. I am describing where the ILF fits into the community care package for local authorities. It is only when the two are taken together that what the Government are doing becomes clear and that is the best way to reassure those who are concerned.

It is in that area that the analogy of the sandwich came into play in Committee. When it is viewed in that light, one appreciates that below £200 the cost is dealt with wholly by the local authority. Above £500 the cost is again, right the way through, dealt with wholly by the local authority.

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Gentleman is wrong.

Mr. Burt: I am not wrong. It is clear that we are at odds over the concept of the sandwich. I suspect that we shall not make progress on that front, even though I have described it as clearly as I can.

Mr. Bradley: I do not want to labour the point, but it is important for organisations outside to understand how the systems will work. Let us deal—this is the crux of the matter—with an individual disabled person. An assessment is made of such a person. That assessment in total of the care required is, say, above £500. Will the Minister confirm that the total package will have to come from the local authority and that there can be no element of ILF? In other words, there will be no sandwich for that individual. The filling of the ILF is removed, with the total having to come by way of services from the local authority. Is that correct?

Mr. Burt: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman now understands the position. What he says is exactly right. Over the cost of £500, it is dealt with wholly by the local authority——

Mr. Bradley: That is not what the hon. Gentleman said.

Mr. Burt: The hon. Gentleman must read the Official Report tomorrow to see that I said that the whole total for those who need care over £500 is dealt with by the local authority, in exactly the same way as those who need care under £200 have their care needs met totally by the local authority. In the band in the middle, between £200 and £500, the ILF comes into play. That is the filling of the sandwich.

I see no reason why we should be at odds over the matter. My description of the way in which the sandwich concept fits into community care is right and I have explained it to the point where we have made progress, to the point where the hon. Member for Withington understands the position. In any event, if his concept of a sandwich does not include a bottom, middle and top, I do not know what sort of sandwich he has in mind.

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North-West) rose——

Mr. Burt: I suspect that I should move on and not continue to give way. Does the hon. Gentleman have something substantial to say?

Mr. Wicks: I rise simply to suggest that, when the Department makes the training video on the ILF, it does not use the sandwich analogy, in the interests of clarity, because, like many sandwiches one buys that look good, they often fall apart in the hand.

Mr. Burt: I know that that intervention was kindly meant. I will just draw a veil over it.

The place of the ILF in the whole area of community care does not leave those about whom we are most concerned without support. It has been suggested on several occasions that the mere fact that there is a limit of £500 necessarily places those who need care above that level into institutional care. That allegation has been made by a number of Opposition Members. It is absolutely not the case.

When individuals are in the care of a local authority, it has primary responsibility for the community and residential care of disabled people. Local authorities will make the decision whether to opt for domiciliary or day care, bearing in mind the needs of the client and the costs of the option. If the disabled person would prefer domiciliary care and it is cheaper than residential care, that is surely what the local authority will provide. Where domiciliary care is more expensive, the local authority will need to decide whether it can afford to spend more to help that individual to remain in the community.

There is no logic in the argument that, because of insufficient funding, people will be forced into residential care. A recent report confirmed that caring for people in the community often proves the most cost-effective way of providing for their care needs, and that applies just as much above as below £500.

Ms Lynne: Is the Minister aware that, on discovering that it will cost more to keep people in their own homes, many local authorities will opt to put them in residential accommodation, whether or not the disabled person chooses that course? That will happen because of the cash limits on community care and the fact that the Government have not provided enough money for community care as a whole.

Mr. Burt: As the hon. Lady pointed out earlier, only 1 per cent. of current ILF grants are in excess of £500 per week. That shows that the majority of people who require that size of award are not living independently. But they can do so. Where it is cost-effective for a local authority to use its money to keep someone at home, it will do so. But, naturally, a local authority will come to a decision about whether it is cost-effective. Bearing in mind its own position and that of others whom it has to look after, it may be impossible to provide domiciliary care. But the sheer fact of a cut-off point at £500 can in no way be taken to imply that merely because a person is above that limit he must be in residential care. Time and again, the Opposition have implied that or expressed it directly. It is not correct and it is not fair for them to do so.

This has proved to be a more lengthy debate than was originally expected. It has taken us down a road that I suspect I shall remember for many years to come. I have tried to deal with why the amendments cannot be accepted by the Government. As I have sought to make clear, we do not believe that the age limit is detrimental to those who would not be eligible for the independent living fund. They will be covered by community care in a manner too often and shamefully neglected by Opposition Members.

The £500 limit and the need for local authorities to contribute up to £200 is not wrong. Taken in the round with the other aspects of community care that the Government have introduced, it is the right way for the independent living fund to proceed. This should be recognised as a package of individual care which is a considerable advance and improvement on social security care in the past. The independent living fund will continue to provide a more than helpful and useful adjunct to community care in Britain. Accordingly, I ask the House to reject the amendments.

Mr. Bradley: I am grateful to the Minister for his response, although I am clearly disappointed that he is not prepared to accept our amendments. I have listened to the excellent speeches from hon. Members on both sides of the House and from all political parties who support the amendments and it is a great disappointment that the Government do not see their merits.

The amount of money involved in accepting the amendments would be so small in terms of the total social security budget and so beneficial for disabled people that I find it difficult to accept that their rejection is not Treasury-led. The Minister's heart is in the right place, but he has clearly been overwhelmingly constrained by the Treasury tonight.

We shall not seek to press the amendments to a vote because it is important that these matters should be taken up again in the other place in order to clarify how the fund operates in practice in relation to the local authority. Their Lordships will read the proceedings of this debate with great interest and will take up the matters in their own inimitable way when they discuss the culinary delights of the independent living fund.

I am disappointed with the Government's response, but the quality of debate has made its own points. Therefore, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Order for Third Reading read.

8.43 pm

Mr. Scott: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

We have covered a great deal of ground this evening and I do not want to reiterate those comments in my closing remarks. The Bill fulfils a manifesto commitment which we gave at the general election to maintain a fund to meet the needs of disabled people. The Bill builds on the tremendous success—which has been acknowledged in all parts of the House—of the independent living fund, which operated under the arrangements pre-community care, in the new context that has now been provided from 1 April this year.

I am happy to report to the House that the new funds are now operational with a full board of trustees. The handover from the independent living fund to the extension fund went smoothly, with all clients continuing to receive their payments, as I undertook to the House when we discussed the matter earlier. The case load of nearly 22,000 people is now being operated by the new extension fund. The new director is in post and the director and staff are now building the bridges towards the relationship with local authorities which will allow the new partnership between the 1993 fund and local authorities to work smoothly in future.

I hope that, whatever differences there may have been between us in Committee, on Report, or now on Third Reading, we can all wish the trustees, director and staff well in the work that they will be undertaking to improve the quality of life of disabled people in Britain.

The Bill also seeks to put motability on a firmer statutory footing. The motability scheme, as we all recognise—I pay tribute to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) who launched the scheme in the first place—is an extremely successful joint enterprise with the Government, the voluntary sector and the clearing banks. It has served and continues to serve to increase the quality of life of an ever-increasing number of disabled people and commands widespread support throughout the House. I know that both sides of the House will wish to support the provision that puts motability funding on a statutory footing to ensure its continued financial support. Many hon. Members will remember my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister recently handing over to the recipient the keys of the 350,000th motability car, and that is a measure of the scheme's immense success and popularity.

The Bill is part of the Government's overall strategy for improving quality of life for disabled people in our society. I think that anyone would recognise that an immense amount has been done in the past 10 years. I do not disguise from the House, and never do, the fact that we have a long way to go. There is still much work to be done, but any fair-minded person recognises the improvements that have been made in terms of benefits, delivery of services, accessibility of our buildings—we still have a long way to go—and the growing opportunities for employment of disabled people as new technology, in particular, enhances their ability to acquire the independence that employment can give them.

The funds that the Bill provides are an addition to the overall provision—an important one. It is a small Bill, as I said when I launched it on Second Reading, but it is very important for a considerable number of disabled people. I commend it to the House.

8.47 pm

Mr. Sheerman: I, too, have no wish to delay the House long. We have had a good debate this afternoon and this evening. The Minister has just described the Bill as small. It is small, but it is also vital because, as the Opposition have tried to show, it goes to the core of how we treat severely disabled people in Britain—and moreover, how we treat disabled people.

Before saying anything controversial, I want to pay tribute to those who have so successfully run the independent living fund during the past five years. As a slight criticism, I would say that they have not been as well treated by the Minister as they should have been, because many of them should have been offered the chance to continue that success. However, we wish the new people running the two new funds well. We want them to do the job that has to be done for severely disabled people. There is no alternative.

I also add my voice to the praise for my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) who, single-handedly, did so much to get motability off the ground all those years ago. Perhaps, when we reach a really big number, such as the 500,000th, we will have someone important—not just the Prime Minister, but the initiator of the scheme—to hand over the key.

I shall end on a note that my right hon. and hon. Friends and Ministers will understand. It has been an important Bill and an important debate, but we consider it a missed opportunity. It was one of the few occasions when we tried something that worked. The Government introduced the independent living fund and it worked. In Committee and throughout the Bill, with no ideological preconceptions—indeed, we had cut off some of our shackles of previous years—and using only one criterion, we were asking the Government to consider how good it was for severely disabled people. The experience of the indpendent living fund left us with one important message.

Some of us have said that there are two things to which we shall never allude in any debate for the rest of our careers: we shall never talk about sandwiches—I think that the Under-Secretary of State will learn that lesson—or about empowerment. I shall mention empowerment one last time and say, yes, we have learnt through the independent living fund that we need to empower and to provide the enabling and facilitating role to which the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) referred in his excellent speech in Committee. That role is so important in the lives of individual severely disabled people.

In the last few minutes of the Bill, let me say what we would have accepted, what would have quietened our voices and our criticisms: if the Minister had come to the House with a different Bill, learning from that experience and building it into the new arrangement for community care and said that the Government had learnt their lesson and would empower people in a different way and that, having learnt the lessons of the independent living fund, they would now allow local authorities to give cash payments.

In other words, they should have taken the essence of the independent living fund and spread it like the mediaeval physic throughout local government social services departments, which would then have become mini independent living funds. If the Government had learnt from the lessons of the independent living fund and done the job for disabled people in our community——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. This is Third Reading. I wish that the hon. Gentleman would speak on what is on the Bill. That is what a Third Reading speech should be.

Mr. Sheerman: Absolutely. It was my peroration—the last gasp at the Dispatch Box—just to say that we opposed many aspects of the Bill constructively, we offered alternatives and tried to ensure that the Bill left the Chamber improved, having learnt the lessons of the independent living fund. We are disappointed that the Government missed their opportunity, because disabled people in the community will be less well off than they were under previous arrangements.

At the end of the day, we have had a constructive debate. Some of us learned a great deal about the opinions of the people that matter—the severely disabled people who increasingly are telling the country and the House that they want to be the vital essence in all legislation that affects their lives.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 131 (Liaison Committee),

That this House agrees with the Report [22nd April] of the Liaison Committee.—[Mr. MacKay.]

Question agreed to.

Maltby Colliery

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. MacKay.]

8.54 pm

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): I raise the issue of Maltby colliery for the third time since the announcement last October that the British Coal Corporation had different designs on the coal mine than those that had been planned for many years.

I should like to make it clear that, in raising the question of Maltby colliery I am in no way seeking to affect the future of any other colliery that has been either a victim of the recent review or is currently working without knowing where its market will be in the not too distant future.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House will agree that in recent months the Government have treated the British coal industry with contempt. Last October, the President of the Board of Trade, under pressure from what seemed to be the majority of the British public, promised a thorough review of the British coal industry and its markets. Those deliberations and that review took many months but produced what I and many others can describe only as a shabby compromise with no increase in the market for coal.

Now the Government hide behind the cloak of the British Coal Corporation to cover their failure to do their duty and carry out the wishes of the country. Through that lack of political will, thousands of miners and their families are bitterly disappointed and deeply concerned about the future. In Maltby colliery, more than 800 miners are still unsure about their future.

The colliery has been known for many years as a British Coal showpiece. It was sunk in 1907 and has extensive reserves. It was reconstructed between 1951 and 1961, the main features being the deepening of the shafts and the construction of a new pit bottom to serve the Barnsley and Swallow Wood seam. Production from the Swallow Wood seam replaced that from the Barnsley seam in 1969.

The current major project, the Parkgate project, was finally approved in 1981 and it is designed to increase the capacity of Maltby colliery to 2·5 million tonnes a year. The project is currently scheduled for completion in December. It has involved some major development work on a scale usually seen only at new coal mines. It included the sinking and equipping of a new shaft which has the biggest capacity in Europe, the deepening and equipping of existing shafts, the construction of a new pit bottom to serve the Parkgate seam, drivage to establish two faces in the seam and the installation of all the necessary equipment, the construction of a new coal preparation plant and all the associated surface works. The estimated total cost of the project is about £180 million.

The first phase came on stream in April 1992, and the second, retreat, phase was scheduled for completion in December this year. People working at that mine and at other coal faces were looking forward to moving to the new Parkgate seam, to begin retreat mining.

The colliery currently employs 1,300 people, including contractors. The threat to jobs is obviously felt deeply by them. The colliery is situated in the Rotherham and Mexborough travel-to-work area, which encompasses Maltby and has unemployment of more than 16 per cent. and male unemployment of nearly 26 per cent. There are already 42 people chasing every vacancy recorded at job centres. Many vacancies are located in Doncaster and Sheffield, which have serious economic problems of their own without a further threat of redundancies at Maltby colliery.

Since 1990, my constituency of Rother Valley, which covers one third of Rotherham metropolitan borough, has lost nearly 2,000 jobs either in coal mining or at a local coke works. One mine closed in 1991 was Thurcroft. Rotherham metropolitan borough council undertook a study last year, when Thurcroft miners were involved in an unsuccessful initiative to restart Thurcroft colliery as a mineworker-owned company. That study revealed that only one quarter of miners had found work outside the industry, and one half had not worked since becoming redundant after the colliery's closure in December 1991.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): My hon. Friend will be aware that Thurcroft is just outside my own constituency, and that many men from the eastern part of my constituency have long been employed at Maltby colliery. Many miners from the western part of my constituency and further afield moved to Maltby colliery in the past three or four years, having worked at as many as half a dozen other pits. Will my hon. Friend confirm that they moved to Maltby in the belief that it would do superbly well for a very long time? Does my hon. Friend agree also that every time that people glimpse from a great distance, as they can, the headgear of Maltby colliery, they and many others in South Yorkshire regard is as a monument to one of the most foolish and profligate decisions made by the Government for a long time?

Mr. Barron: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I visited the colliery last Friday and spoke to one young coal miner with a young family. He thought that he was moving to that investment to work there for the rest of his working days, in a trade that is exclusive in our particular region. He felt very let down and disappointed. No matter what happens to Maltby in the future, many families will feel that it is a monument to a disastrous decision.

The Minister will be familiar with the attempt to reopen Thurcroft colliery, because I corresponded with him frequently last summer on that subject. The study of ex-mineworkers from Thurcroft found that the average period of unemployment for miners was seven months—and the higher the job losses, the longer that period will become.

A study by Rotherham training and enterprise council was also made. After last October's statement, local TECs were asked to play a major part in finding employment for those likely to be made redundant from the coal industry.

A study commissioned from Sheffield Hallam university business school of total job losses resulting from pit closures, which was updated after the publication of the White Paper, estimates that in addition to 950 job losses in mining at Maltby, there will be 600 supplier jobs losses and more than 400 redundancies resulting from reduced local and national consumer spending—making a total of 1,950 local job losses.

That estimate does not take into account a possible further 1,000 job losses if the work force at Kiveton colliery, which is also in my constituency, do not secure markets for their coal and the colliery closes within the next couple of months.

Mr. Jimmy Boyce (Rotherham): Is my hon. Friend aware that on top of these particular job losses, which narrow the field of employment for people in the whole of the metropolitan borough of Rotherham, the figure that he mentioned of 2,000 in his own constituency is probably multiplied by more than 300 per cent. when the whole of the metropolitan borough is taken into account? Is he further aware that this narrowing of employment opportunities in the borough means that there are people who have never had a proper job and who now have teenage children who have no opportunity of ever having a proper job as a result of the loss of jobs not only in mining but in the associated industries of steel and mining engineering—skills that have almost disappeared for ever as a result of the profligate policy of this Government?

Mr. Barron: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention. He is absolutely right. In the past decade the job losses, not just in mining but in steel and engineering, in South Yorkshire as a whole and in our borough have been colossal. The major point that my hon. Friend rightly made is the loss of skills. We had exchanges at Question Time today about apprenticeships. They have disappeared from an area that was known to have some of the finest industrial apprenticeships in the country. My hon. Friend is also right to point out that such job losses always go a lot wider.

Last October, in announcing the Government's coal review, the President of the Board of Trade said in a written answer:

> This review will consider views and evidence on the future of each of the pits in question".

He appointed consultants to report to him on the viability of the pits,

> "including any alternative markets that may exist for coal". —[Official Report, 26 October 1992; Vol. 212, c. 522.]

The consultants were J. T. Boyd, a firm of independent consultants. They ranked Maltby colliery as one of the top five mines in the country, with the potential to achieve consistent profits of over £12·5 million each year. That is not just the top five of the 31 collieries under review but the top five including the 19 which were not in the review and which were to remain open.

That is not surprising. The coal that they have now opened up the roadways to get is, in the J. T. Boyd report, some of the best coal in Britain. the consultants ranked Maltby coal 14th for low sulphur content which, in an age of debate on the environment, is very important. It was eighth in low ash content. If Members want to know the value of that, they should talk to the electricity generators or anyone who burns coal in bulk. It was sixth in low chlorine content. It was second in high calorific value out of the 51 collieries studied. In other words, some of the best coal in Britain is being left under the ground, at least in the short term.

In its two tables of economic ranking, Boyd listed Maltby as first in both case 1 and case 2. These were of the 21 pits under review. Case 1 showed that 25 collieries had higher estimated costs—these included the 19 that stayed open—and 25 had lower projected profits. Case 2, if we put the 20 along with those under review, showed 31 collieries with higher costs and 36 with lower profits. Boyd reported that the colliery was primarily a producer of power station coal but also produced a minor amount for domestic use.

They are debating at the moment in the Department of Trade and Industry, I am sure, the question of energy in Northern Ireland. Maltby colliery supplies house coal there. West Burton, Thorpe Marsh, Drax and Cottam power stations all receive Maltby coal. There are never any problems in selling this coal. It is used as a sweetener for Selby coal. Everyone says that the great complex at Selby represents the future of the British coal industry. On occasion, it uses Maltby coal so that it can sell coal of the required quality to the available market.

Recent tests in relation to the coking market have proved positive. According to those tests, in March this year production costs in the coal faces in the Swallow Wood and Parkgate seams amounted to £1·20 per gigajoule. The Minister must have examined the markets to which Maltby sells its coal; he must know that no coal sold on the world market can be brought to the point of use more cheaply than the coal that is currently being produced at Maltby, given the transport costs involved.

Maltby also has a new, state-of-the-art coal preparation plan. It was the first in the United Kingdom to gain the British Standard 5750 quality assurance accreditation, which increased its potential for steelworks and other premium-price non-power station sales. The report prepared by the Government's own advisers gave Maltby a glowing reference, but that testimony to its future seems to have been ignored—certainly, in the short term.

In his statement on 25 March, the President of the Board of Trade announced that Maltby would be given "development status". He spoke as though a new plant would be involved. The investment programme was begun as a result of the Labour Government's plan for coal; as I said earlier, it is scheduled for completion in December this year. It is not a new invention of the current Government's review.

I am not sure how much the investment programme will cost. Last week, the Minister said that £29 million would be invested in the development phase of Maltby; the President of the Board of Trade mentioned £30 million, and, according to British Coal's Coal News, £40 million is to be spent on completing the programme. That, however, is not new money; it is money committed a long time ago to development of the reserves for retreat mining of the Parkgate seam.

The Minister shakes his head. Let me tell him that I spent 20 years working in that coal mine. I left it in 1983 to enter the House of Commons, but I had a vested interest in its future, and I know exactly how much was invested. I know that, in 1981, it was agreed that the Parkgate seam should be developed for retreat mining by the end of this year. I emphasise that no new money was involved in that agreement.

The most interesting feature is that, over the past two years, the colliery has been paying back from its profits some of the capital investment. It made more than £10 million in 1991-92, and more than £7 million in 1992-93. Now that production is to end, no revenue will be available for the colliery to continue paying back that investment. It does not make sense to throw away such profit margins and continue to favour capital investment on such a scale.

At the beginning of this month, I went with the leader of Rotherham council, Sir Jack Layden, to meet the chairman of British Coal. He failed to justify the plans for Maltby colliery then, and the Government have similarly failed to do so since. Surely savings to taxpayers would be secured by keeping Maltby in production, making profits and paying back some of its capital investment. That would also save public expenditure on state benefits: whatever redundancy arrangements are reached, if job losses on the proposed scale go ahead the people concerned will be eligible for unemployment benefit.

There remains only one justification for this decision —privatisation. That was flagged up in last month's statement. The Government had been sent away to find wider markets for the British coal industry; they returned to the Floor of the House with none, but, at the mention of the word "privatisation", all their Back Benchers' eyes lit up. They all started to cheer. That is what it is about; it must be. That is not just my view. The same view was expressed by the Dinnington and district branch of the Rother Valley Conservative association in its letter to the Prime Minister last October, in which it said—little has been done to disprove it:

> "In view of the fact that during the last few years the near-by Maltby colliery has had a multi-million pound modernisation packet . . . we are finding difficulty in arguing against the accusations that this money has been spent only with a view to privatisation."

The Minister's own political party said that last October, when the balloon first went up and the Government said that they were going to mothball the colliery. It is possible that privatisation has already taken place, since the bulk of the jobs that are to remain at the colliery during the development phase are likely to be done by private contractors.

The Government have told us over the years that privatisation is good for the work force. I had a go at the Minister last Wednesday at Trade and Industry Question Time. After I had sat down, he asked me to point to the advantages that lie ahead for my constituents because of this so-called development phase that Maltby is going through. I invite the Minister to come to my constituency, see the people at Maltby colliery and explain to the men —more than 800 of them—who face redundancy exactly what the advantages of privatisation are, when it looks as though they are faced with the dole.

Last week I wrote to the Minister about the prospect of redundancy payments for mineworkers at Maltby. The Minister responded that it was a matter for British Coal. However, on 21 October of last year the President of the Board of Trade told the House of Commons, from the Dispatch Box, that no miner should be disadvantaged by the consultation on closures. British Coal has suggested that 500 jobs could be retained to carry out the development work, but it will not specify the make-up of the reduced work force.

The only correspondence that the work force has had relating to these plans is a letter that was sent to the Yorkshire NUM on 9 April by the group director. Talking about the likely levels of redundancy, the group director said:

> "At present, it is proposed that up to the total number of employees presently employed at the collieries and when Rossington is placed on care and maintenance and Maltby on a development only basis. That will, of course, be subject to any employees being transferred to other collieries where there may be vacancies,".

The one thing that this area director has done is keep his sense of humour over the past six months, unlike most people who work in the British coal industry, since he referred to employees being transferred to other coal mines. Does the Minister think that mine workers who do not want to leave the industry will be able to transfer to other coal mines? He went on:

"or being required for a limited period for any salvage, maintenance or development work. Such employees will be selected on the basis of their skills and experience."

There was a meeting last week at local level, at which the work force at Maltby asked for the pit to go into the modified colliery review procedure. Since that request was made, it has been impossible for the work force to get any information about the pit's future.

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley) rose——

Mr. Barron: I know that my hon. Friend has a coal mine in his constituency that is in a not dissimilar situation. I shall certainly give way to him.

Mr. Redmond: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for allowing me to intervene. Rossington is one of the pits to be mothballed. I wrote to the Minister asking what mothballing meant. I do not know what it means but perhaps my hon. Friend can tell me. In any event, the Minister should be in a position to tell me although he did not do so in his one-paragraph letter in which he said that it was an operational matter for British Coal's chairman. Perhaps the Minister will now tell us what mothballing means, because the lads and lasses at Rossington colliery would like to know.

It is because the term was not clarified when the Government published the White Paper that there are now problems in the industry. The economics are now those of the madhouse. The Government apparently have no concept whatsoever of the industry on which they have published a White Paper.

Pensions are another issue that affects many people who have retired from Maltby. Before the election, we received assurance after assurance from Ministers and from the Minister for Energy since the election that pensions would be safe. Pensioners are not convinced that the Minister does not intend to dip in his sticky fingers and do a Maxwell-type operation on the pension fund. It is not good enough for a Minister deliberately to put such fears into the minds of retired members who have contributed over the years.

Mr. Barron: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention. I shall hazard a guess about what mothballing means. Under the original review in October last year, Maltby was to be mothballed. I asked the mining engineers there what it meant but they did not know. They had been told that the colliery was to be mothballed along with three others but they did not know what it meant.

For what it is worth, I think it means taking eight pits out of the closure programme to satisfy a few Conservative Back Benchers that everything possible is being done to keep the pits open. Rossington is to be mothballed, but the Government would have us believe that someone else could come along and run it if British Coal did not want to run it. Last week, the director of the south Yorkshire area issued a press release telling us that some people would be kept on at that pit to salvage equipment. How that is to be done is beyond me, but perhaps the Minister will tell us.

On my hon. Friend's second point, the Minister will know that the House has made it clear many times that we want any coal privatisation programme to include protection for people who pay into various schemes, such as those for pensions and staff superannuation. It is crucial that regulation is not so lax that people are able to buy into a business and, at the same time, into its pension scheme and use the money for purposes other than those for which it was originally intended.

Before my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond) intervened, I was talking about trying to find out what the plans meant for Maltby colliery. At a meeting this morning with local senior management, representatives of the work force were told that, if they went ahead with their request to go into the modified colliery review procedure, they would not be informed of the plans for the future and that only if they withdrew their request, with no prior knowledge of the plans, there might be enhanced redundancy terms for the men to leave the industry. It is clear that they are being bribed to accept the proposition that the Swallow Wood seam should cease production at the end of this week and the Parkgate seam at the end of next month. Clearly, that will create severe personal difficulties for the miners who are trying to decide what is best for themselves and their families.

I believe that it is for the Government to ensure that miners are fairly treated and that, if their jobs finally have to go, they get the best possible terms available. I have no dispute with that. The enhancement of redundancy terms for people who have to lose their jobs in the present unemployment situation in my area has my support, but it should be done without the duress that is now being brought to bear on people.

This morning I faxed the Minister two specific questions. The first was: given that all coal mines both develop and produce simultaneously, why is Maltby to be given development-only status? I am fascinated by that concept. Of all the coal mines that were under review, and of all those that have a future at some stage, only Maltby will have development-only status. My second question was: given that up to 500 men are likely to work on the development, why can the work force not be told who will remain at the pit if production ceases? I hope that the Minister will answer those questions, and respond to the other points that I have raised tonight.

There is a compelling case for continuing production at Maltby colliery. The onus is on the Government to produce equally compelling counter-arguments. There is still an opportunity to reverse their decision to stop production at that profitable, productive and modern pit, and to keep a highly skilled and motivated work force together. I hope that the Minister, and the British Coal Corporation, will seize that opportunity before it is too late. That would be in the interests not only of our constituents who work at that most modern of coal mines but of the nation as well. We should not squander the millions of pounds in revenue that could be earned from production at the colliery for the sake of a future prospect the main effect of which will be to line the pockets of people in the City and others who want to buy into the industry in two years' time, when we as taxpayers will have put more millions of pounds into development of the coal mine.

9.26 pm

The Minister for Energy (Mr. Tim Eggar): May I first say how especially appropriate it is that you should be in the Chair for the debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sure that you organised the preceding debates to fit in with your personal timetable. Of course it is appropriate that the hon. Members for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond), for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy), and for Rotherham (Mr. Boyce) are also present. I am acutely conscious of the interest of their constituents in the issue and in other issues relating to the mining industry and of the close personal interest that each of the hon. Members here—including you, Mr. Deputy Speaker—take in the mining industry and its future.

As the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) reminded me, we had a considerable amount to discuss last summer; the hon. Gentleman was so concerned, especially about Thurcroft, that I spoke to him several times when he was flat on his back in hospital. I am delighted to see that he has now fully recovered and can put forward a case on behalf of his constituents.

It might help if I begin by setting the debate in context. It is important to remember that we have to take a view on Maltby in the context of the overall energy situation in which British Coal finds itself. We should not forget that last year British Coal produced about 77 million tonnes of coal, of which just under 63 million tonnes went to the generators in England and Wales. British Coal thought that it was unlikely to be able to sell more than about 40 million tonnes of coal to the generators from this April, and of course there were already massive stocks of coal both at the generators and at the pithead.

That led to the announcement in October last year that 10 of the deep mines with no prospect of viability, and 21 pits with no prospect of a market, should close. As the House will remember, the Government accepted the proposals from British Coal. However, subsequently and in recognition of the concern expressed in the House and by the public more generally, we announced a review, to which the hon. Gentleman referred. That review and the report by the Select Committee on Trade and Industry led my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade to make a statement to the House late last month. That statement coincided with publication of the White Paper and with the debate on it.

Mr. Hardy: The Minister said that he intended to put the matter in a broader context. Will he consider the context that, 20 years ago, 16 collieries were mining under the metropolitan borough of Rotherham? Ten years ago, 14, if not 15, of those collieries were engaged in that activity. To plunge an area into the economic disadvantage that rapid closure would cause is unseemly and barbaric. Does the Minister understand that we and the people of our area are well aware that the reason for the difficulties which he has just identified is that, in recent years, the coal industry has been compelled to operate on a playing field that is far from level?

Mr. Eggar: The hon. Gentleman tempts me into a very much wider debate——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. This debate is about Maltby and is thus very narrow.

Mr. Eggar: I shall, of course, concentrate my remarks on Maltby. Immediately after the war, Maltby was one of 650 collieries. About 800 men are now employed at Maltby because about 400 have taken voluntary redundancy over the past few months. I imagine that many more were employed immediately after the war. Those men were part of a British Coal work force of 750,000 people. I make that point only to show that there has been a sharp and consistent decline both in the number of pits in this country and in the number of people employed in them.

To pay attention to the guidance that you gave me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, we must set the matter in that context, and we must also recognise that the future of Maltby is bound up with the recommendations which were included in the White Paper and approved by the House. The proposal in the White Paper was that British Coal, subject to consultation, was to close two pits which were nearing exhaustion; it was to cease coaling at six pits and place those pits on care and maintenance; and it was to put one pit, Maltby, on development only. That was in addition to the 10 pits that are the subject of consultation at present.

I do not wish to risk offending or annoying the hon. Member for Rother Valley, but I must emphasise that decisions about production and development at Maltby are matters for British Coal, just as matters at the corporation's other collieries are a matter for it. Opposition Members and some of my right hon. and hon. Friends overlook the fact that neither my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade nor I have any power to tell British Coal which collieries it should close, which collieries it should keep open or which collieries it should keep to develop in one way or another.

Mr. Boyce: If British Coal proposed tomorrow to close all the pits, are the Government really telling us that they would do nothing about it and that it would be a matter for British Coal? Surely not.

Mr. Eggar: I am saying, as the hon. Gentleman will be aware because the position is laid out clearly in the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act 1946, that neither I nor my right hon. Friend has the power to tell British Coal to take specific action. That action relates to specific collieries. The hon. Member for Rotherham may regret that. From time to time over the past few months, I have been tempted to regret it.

The Act was laid down under the Morrisonian approach to a nationalised industry. When introducing that legislation, it was a definite decision of the then Labour Government to keep Ministers at arm's length, so to speak, from the day-to-day management and detailed decisions relating to the then British Coal Board. That is the background against which both Ministers and British Coal operate.

Having said that—I note that the hon. Member for Rotherham smiled when I said it—I shall ensure that the attention of British Coal is drawn to this debate and its contents. The hon. Gentleman made some allegations about the pressure on miners to leave Maltby and other pits. The hon. Member for Rother Valley also hinted at that. That is an issue not just for British Coal: it is before the courts at present, so I cannot comment on that in detail.

British Coal has proposed a forward strategy which involves substantial capital investment to create a lower cost base for Maltby in the future. In recognition of the advantages of Maltby coal to which the hon. Member for Rother Valley referred, that pit has been chosen to be developed as a high-volume low-cost mine that is capable of producing more than 2 million tonnes of coal per annum compared to its current production of 1·2 million tonnes per annum. British Coal will invest up to £40 million in developing Maltby's extensive reserves for retreat mining over the next two years.

The hon. Gentleman rightly said that, at Question Time, I mentioned a figure of £29 million. The difference is the estimate of the proceeds of coal sold from the development phase. The £40 million is new investment which was not previously scheduled. The Government are reflecting that new investment in British Coal's external financing limit, so that comes into the negotiation.

Mr. Barron: If one is running a business, would it be wise to continue with the future investment plans and cut back on the revenue earning side of the business? That is exactly what British Coal proposes to do. If the proceeds from the development lessen by £11 million over two years, what would the figure be if it continued to produce one or two coal faces as well?

Mr. Eggar: That takes us back to where I started my remarks: British Coal must examine and take all its decisions in the context of the overall market for coal. Clearly, when it takes its decisions, it must look at all the collieries and the existing market—in other words, the market in which they have some contractual undertakings; the 40/30/30/30/30 contract—and then the possibility or probability of additional contracts.

If Maltby were run on full production—I cannot speak for British Coal, but I imagine that it is a possibility—it would effectively displace the coal being produced at another pit. The hon. Member for Rother Valley commenced his remarks fairly by saying that, although he wished to draw attention to Maltby, he did not wish in any way to do down, so to speak, the other pits in the area. I can understand that. It is very much in the character of the hon. Gentleman and the approach that hon. Members on both sides of the House have taken on the problem that British Coal faces. They do not want one pit to do well, only for another to do badly. When British Coal made the proposal to the Government as the most sensible way forward, we were prepared to make the necessary funding available and make investment approvals available.

I do not challenge the hon. Member for Rother Valley when he says that Maltby has extensive reserves. It came out well in the Boyd review in just the way that he outlined. That upside of Maltby made British Coal wish to put it into development and ensure that in the future it could be a world-class mine producing high-quality coal, as we all wish it to do and know that it is capable of doing at low cost.

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): A tremendous amount of finance—millions of pounds—is sloshing around. Will the Minister give an assurance to the Maltby pensioners and pensioners throughout the country in the various pension schemes that no funds will be used by the Government to subsidise any of the proposals in the White Paper?

Mr. Eggar: I do not think that that is the assurance that the hon. Gentleman wants me to give. He wants me to give an assurance that we will make subsidies available to help British Coal to compete. I give him an assurance, as I have given Opposition Members assurances on many previous occasions, that pensions will be safeguarded. I have said that frequently, and I give that absolute categorical assurance.

The staff superannuation fund has attracted some attention. I understand that the matter is to come before the courts for a decision. In other words, an agreement has been reached that a ruling should be given because the trustees and British Coal have received differing legal advice. The Government are absolutely content, as I am sure that British Coal is, to abide by the judgment of the court. Given the understandable attention that has been given to pensions and the references to Maxwell and others, I believe that that is the appropriate way forward.

I stress that British Coal's proposal is, of course, subject to consultation with the unions. Although the proposal does not involve closure of the colliery, it will inevitably entail some job losses during the period of development. It is right and proper that there should be full consultation with the unions on the proposal, in accordance with British Coal's legal obligations.

Both in his fax and tonight, the hon. Member for Rother Valley suggested that I should make an announcement to British Coal's work force about who would remain at the colliery if the development proposal was adopted. He gave the impression that that was a matter for me. I know that from time to time the hon. Gentleman has, shall we say, exhibited a certain amount of creative tension with the National Union of Mineworkers, at least nationally—we admire him for the stance that he has taken. I do not believe that he wishes me or anyone else to appear to circumvent or, indeed, to circumvent decisions which are a matter for consultation between British Coal and the unions.

Mr. Barron: I referred in my speech to what the President of the Board of Trade said about not disadvantaging any mineworkers while consultations went ahead. I put the facts to the Minister plainly and I put them to him now.

Why have the men at Maltby, knowing that people will continue to be employed in the development work, not been told who is likely to remain working at the colliery before being forced to take a decision? It is a matter of common decency. They were asked to withdraw from the modified colliery review procedure before the plans were put before them and that has put them at a disadvantage in the consultation process. The President of the Board of Trade stood at the Dispatch Box and said that that would not happen, so he should now do something about it.

There are things that can be done by those who stand at the Dispatch Box, no matter what we have heard tonight. The Minister and the President of the Board of Trade know that. That is why we had the review in the first place. My request should be met out of common decency, if nothing else—if there is any left.

Mr. Eggar: The assurance that was given by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade in October referred in particular to the 10 pits. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman recognises that; he can check the record after the debate.

I am in genuine difficulty in commenting on this matter. Not only is this, in practice, a matter for British Coal, in consultation with the unions, but it was also the subject of a court hearing today. I also understand that the area around Maltby, if not that specific colliery, is also likely to be considered by the courts next week or the week after. Tempted as I might be to respond to the hon. Gentleman in detail, I do not believe that it would be appropriate for me to do so. I hope that the House will understand that. I assure the hon. Gentleman, once again, that his views and the report in Hansard will be seen by representatives of British Coal.

The hon. Gentleman has been kind enough to recognise that the voluntary redundancy package, which has been made available to miners, is generous. I accept that he has also made it clear, however, that, given the employment circumstances in the area that he represents, he has understandable concerns about the future job prospects for those 400 individuals who have already taken the voluntary redundancy and others who will do so.

Although I recognise that, for the purposes of the debate, the hon. Gentleman wants to highlight the problems that are associated with finding jobs in the area, it is fair to point out that, between 1987 and 1991, 84 per cent. of all those individuals who registered with British Coal Enterprise for jobs found them within a year to 18 months. It is appropriate to consider the optimistic side as well and to put it in perspective.

When I visited the north-east just before Christmas, I met a number of men who had previously been employed by the Seaham and Vane Tempest pits who had taken voluntary redundancy. I was struck by the training that they had undertaken for jobs in a high-tech plant. I admit that they had to travel a considerable distance to reach their jobs, but their example suggests that it is reasonable to say that a significant number of individuals who were previously employed as miners will succeed in finding alternative work.

The fact is that coal remains the largest element in the United Kingdom's diverse range of fuels for electricity generation. Most hon. Members recognise, however, that it probably never will regain the place that it once held in our economy. That is no criticism of the management or work force of British Coal. It is a fact and it illustrates the way in which the most profitable reserves have been worked out. It is also a fact that the new modern mines in other parts of the world have geological advantages over our pits, although they are not as great as sometimes claimed. Those mines also have an advantage over British coal because of the environmental quality of their coal, a quality which the coal produced by British Coal does not and is not likely to enjoy.

Mr. Barron: What about the 1·5 per cent. sulphur content?

Mr. Eggar: The hon. Gentleman rightly draws attention to the relatively low sulphur content of Maltby coal. I think that he mentioned a figure of 1·5 per cent. sulphur. Internationally traded coal almost always has a sulphur content of less than 1 per cent., and sometimes has a sulphur content of something more like 0·5 per cent. That is the standard against which all British coal mines have to operate. It is a difficult and competitive market, in which world production costs are falling.

In the year or so that I have held my present post, I have been grateful for the way in which the hon. Gentleman has argued the case for his constituents. He has always advanced the arguments cogently, both publicly and privately. I have been conscious of his considerable personal experience, both as a miner at Maltby and as an hon. Member who has consistently taken a great interest in the mining industry.

Mr. Barron: The Minister will be pleased to know that this is the last time that I shall intervene. I cannot let the occasion pass without saying—doubtless the Minister will not agree with me—that the development status that has been granted to Maltby colliery is nothing more than the foil towards privatisation. He may not even agree with Rother Valley Conservative association, which agrees with my analysis. In the House, the Minister asked me:

> "Why does not the hon. Gentleman for once point to the advantages that lie ahead for his constituents"?—[Official Report, 21 April 1993; Vol. 223, c. 314.]

I should like to invite him to my constituency to tell the 800-plus miners who are to be made redundant in the next few weeks the advantages of the dole.

Mr. Eggar: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman finished on that note. He mentioned "the advantages of the dole". It is important to note that considerable amounts are being invested in Maltby to ensure that it is able to compete and that its good quality coal can be produced at low cost for a long time, which will enhance its prospects of long-term viability. The hon. Gentleman should stress that fact to his constituents, as it is a positive message.

We have had a good debate, and I thank all hon. Members for participating in it.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT

Council Tax

1. Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his Department's latest information about the level of average household council tax bills.

The Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities (Mr. John Redwood): The average headline council tax per dwelling for the current year is £456—£30 less than the average headline community charge per dwelling for 1992-93.

Mr. Boyes: Does the Minister recall the Prime Minister boasting that council tax bills in Labour areas would be £100 higher than the bills in Tory areas? Following further work on the figures, it has now been established that the council tax bill for Labour is £14 less than that for the Tories. Consequently, will the Minister congratulate Labour Sunderland on an average tax bill of £376, which is £65 lower than the average bill in the constituency of the Secretary of State in Tory-controlled Kent?

Mr. Redwood: It is interesting that Front-Bench Members now get others to do their dirty work for them. We all know that, on average, Labour bills are £100 or more higher for bands C and D across the country. [Interruption.] Oh yes, they are. They are £107 more for every band C tax. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to compare individual constituencies and districts, he may like to compare Sunderland with Mole Valley. Sunderland has a band C tax of £534 whereas Mole Valley has a band C tax of £461. Mole Valley, of course, gets a fraction of the revenue support grant per head that Sunderland gets. Labour gets more grant and imposes higher taxes. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his help in making that point because, as he well knows, it is £100 more in Labour areas than in Tory areas.

Sir Donald Thompson: Will my hon. Friend make a good job even better by encouraging local councils to settle appeals as quickly as possible and settle even more quickly those that fall out in favour of the customer?

Mr. Redwood: I agree. We want good management of local councils across the board and as management improves, so taxes can come down and services can improve. I am grateful for all good suggestions for improved management of local government. Opposition Members should listen carefully to some of the suggestions made by my hon. Friends. There are many excellent Conservative councils and I am sure that electors will reflect that on 6 May.

Mr. Straw: Has the Minister seen the excellent report from the Institute of Fiscal Studies which blows apart his use of band C as a comparison between councils? Was not the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy right to endorse our use of average household bills and to say:

"What will exercise people most is the bill they get through the door"?

Is it not a fact that, compared with Tory areas, Labour councils provide far better services, in Labour counties the rise in crime and the rise in unemployment have been less, the price of meals on wheels is 50 per cent. less and children have three times the chance of a nursery education and in Labour council areas, average household bills are £14 below the level of those in Tory areas? There are better services and better value from Labour.

Mr. Redwood: Clearly, the hon. Gentleman seeks to make an additional party political broadcast. We know that those claims are highly misleading. The truth is that Labour councils impose taxes of £100 more in bands C and D than do Conservative councils. The average council tax figure merely reflects the fact that Labour areas have far more low-rated properties than Conservative areas. Even Labour can just about get its band A tax below the average band D tax in Conservative areas. That is the magnitude of the gap between the two parties in office. Labour is charging £107 more for band C and £122 more for band D —the price of inefficiency and poor management.

County Councils

2. Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average Government grant per head provided to Conservative-controlled county councils.

Mr. Redwood: The average amount of revenue support grant for Conservative-controlled county councils in 1993-94 is £222 per head. The average for Labour county councils is £274 per head—for around £100 per household more grant. Where, now, are the claims that Labour is disadvantaged and done down by the rate support grant settlement? In addition to Labour county councils charging £100 more in council tax, they receive an extra £100 per household in grant.

Mr. Ainsworth: In view of that answer, is it not even more remarkable that Conservative councils charge more than £100 less in respect of band C properties than Labour councils? Is it not a tragedy that Labour and Liberal Democrat councillors throughout the country have not yet learnt that what people want from their local council is the right service at the right price?

Mr. Redwood: That is clearly true, and I am sure that the electors will express their views on it on 6 May.

Conservative councils deliver better services at a lower price with less grant. That is the treble achievement of which my hon. Friends and I are rightly proud.

Mr. O'Hara: If Conservative councillors are so content with their standard spending assessments, will the Minister —as an hon. Member representing a Kent constituency —explain to me why that the mayor of Canterbury, Councillor Pat Burke, has wisely decided to apply for the Labour whip on Canterbury council? Does he agree with me that that was indeed a wise decision, and with the judgment of the Canterbury Gazette that, with the Liberal Democrats in disarray and the Tories of Canterbury moribund, he could have made no better decision?

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman shows that the policies of Liberals and Labour on councils where they have some influence are similar. Conservative councillors up and down the country are doing a good job in delivering high-quality services at low cost. As I said, they obtain far less grant. Most of them are happy with the grant that they receive and do a good job within it. Some Conservative councillors would like more grant—that is understandable—and more grant is given to some Conservative councils as well as to Labour councils. As the figures show, however, it is the Labour councils which scoop the pool.

Mr. Mans: Will my hon. Friend spare a thought for my constituents in Fleetwood and for the constituents of the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), the Opposition spokesman on the environment, in Labour-controlled Lancashire, whose council tax bills are £160 more on average than in Conservative-controlled Hampshire, even though Lancashire has a larger external grant? Does my hon. Friend agree that it is a scandal that, notwithstanding that, the services that Lancashire provides result in primary school children in Fleetwood having to be taught in corridors?

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend's excellent example bears out what has been said about the contrast between Conservative and Labour councils. When I went to Lancashire recently, I heard at first hand about the excessive expenditure on banquets and publicity and about the 133 committees that are considered necessary to run the council. I hope that there will soon be a Conservative authority that can cut down on the unnecessary spending and give value for money—just as Hampshire gives value for money under Conservative control.

Mr. Henderson: The House will understand that the Minister has felt bound today to wind up his arguments about local government now that the Conservative party is receiving its returns from the various counties around the country. However, does he not accept that his answer to Question 2 directly contradicts what he said in respect of Question 1? The reason Labour councils receive higher levels of grant is that generally they represent more deprived areas. Does the hon. Gentleman not also accept that there is great disquiet around the country because people recognise that the current system is completely discredited when Bournemouth is considered to be more deprived than Barnsley, when the mining area of Chester-le-Street is considered to be less deprived than Huntingdon and when Tory-controlled Kent county council receives £268 per head in grant compared with £234 in Staffordshire? Will the Minister bring forward the results of the review quickly and stop the slanting in favour of Conservative authorities?

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman has not been listening to the exchanges so far today. I have made it very clear that Labour authorities are receiving the extra grant and they are imposing the extra taxes. If the hon. Gentleman is so keen to see the standard spending assessments and grants reviewed, will he make available Labour's evidence to our inquiry? I have asked him for that on many occasions, but I am still awaiting his testimony. I can only assume that Labour Members cannot agree among themselves on how they would like the system to be changed and they know full well that most Labour councils are benefiting greatly from it at the moment.

Sewage Treatment

3. Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of sewage treatment works failed their consent standards in 1986; and what is the equivalent figure now.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Michael Howard): Twenty-three per cent, of sewage treatment works failed to comply with their assessed standards in 1986. In 1991, the latest year for which figures are available, that figure had fallen to 6 per cent.

Miss Nicholson: I am delighted to hear my right hon. and learned Friend's good news of the 17 per cent. rise in compliance with sewage treatment standards. However, he should know that my constituents are concerned about a sewage treatment plant which is not yet in existence. Can he assure me that if South West Water locates a sewage treatment plant at Northam in my constituency, that plant will reach the highest possible standards? My constituents do not believe that it will.

Mr. Howard: I understand the concerns that my hon. Friend expresses. She has drawn them to the attention of my Department. If the proposal does not meet adequate standards, it will not receive consent. In addition, all the environmental implications of the proposal will be fully taken into account before any decision is made.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: Will the Minister comment on a recent survey by The Sunday Times of convictions for water pollution during 1992 which showed that five of the top 10 offenders were water authorities, with, I regret to say, Welsh Water at the top of that list of offenders? Is it not a sad commentary on the Government's environmental record that in the recent National Rivers Authority survey our rivers were found, for the first time, to be in a worse state in 1990 than in 1980? Would it not be much wiser if the money from our massively increased water bills were used for environmental improvements rather than for buying hotels, increasing chairmen's salaries and providing big dividends for shareholders?

Mr. Howard: Our water bills finance the investment in improved water quality in which I thought the hon. Gentleman was interested. One cannot, at one and the same time, complain about standards and also complain about the bills that are necessary if standards are to be improved. Prosecutions simply demonstrate that the NRA is determined to be even-handed in its approach to securing observance of the law.

Departmental Buildings

4. Sir Roger Moate: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are his proposals for the future of the Department of the Environment and Department of Transport buildings in Marsham street; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Tony Baldry): No. 2 Marsham street will be demolished—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hurrah".]—as soon as possible when alternative accommodation has been identified and is available.

Sir Roger Moate: Is my hon. Friend aware that his Department of the Environment building is one of the few buildings that actually looks better when it is covered with scaffolding and dust sheets and that the sooner it comes down, the better the environment will be? However, the important question is whether we will be mean minded or far sighted and imaginative about the use of that six acre site at the heart of the capital. Is my hon. Friend aware of the competition launced by Building Design and the comments of the Royal Fine Art Commission on the use of that site? Will he persuade his right hon. Friends to accept that we do not want more an more offices built on the site and that we want the site to be used imaginatively with the possibility of public open space or other forms of public benefit?

Mr. Baldry: One of the advantages of being an Environment Minister is that, looking out of the window of the building, one does not have to see the Department of the Environment.

Clearly, the site is important, and we will give careful consideration to the idea of a design competition. We want to ensure that the building that replaces 2 Marsham street is not merely better than what we have now—that will not be difficult—but a building of which we can be proud, on architectural and aesthetic grounds, for many years to come.

Mr. Skinner: Will the many people who work at the Departments of the Environment and of Transport be compensated for any move that takes place? Is the Minister aware that the trade unions involved are very anxious to remain on the site? Why should they be kicked out at the whim of the Government, who are almost certainly hellbent on lining some developer's back pocket, while at the same time bailing out the developers at Canary wharf?

Mr. Baldry: That is a pretty drivelly question, even by the hon. Gentleman's standards. The staff with whom we work at Marsham street are consulted closely and kept in touch with information about where the new building is to be. We are as anxious as they are to move to a decent working environment. A building that is likely to fall down in the next two years is not the best place in which to work.

East Thames Corridor

5. Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations have been made to him following the recent announcement of his policy towards the east Thames corridor; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Housing, Planning and Construction (Sir George Young): The proposals that my right hon. and learned Friend announced on 24 March have been broadly welcomed as both imaginative and realistic. We continue to receive representations on them from a wide range of bodies.

Mr. Dunn: My hon. Friend will know that, along with my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold), I welcome the concept of the east Thames corridor with enthusiasm. It will involve the creation of 128,000 new dwellings and 182,000 new jobs by the year 2015. Will my hon. Friend confirm, however, that he will engage in proper consultation with local authorities at all levels, and with local communities, when the project moves into its development stage?

Sir George Young: A few days ago, I chaired a meeting of all the 16 local authorities involved in the east Thames corridor project. That meeting was very helpful and productive, and my officials and I now plan to hold further meetings with the local authorities—both elected councillors and officials—that are co-operating with the imaginative proposals for the corridor.

Mr. Mackinlay: I recognise the great potential of the east Thames corridor for recreation, commerce and residential use. Does the Minister appreciate, however, that the glossy documents that were produced a few weeks ago were considered cosmetic and cynical in my constituency, given the high unemployment in Kent and Essex? What new moneys will be spent to promote jobs and commercial opportunities and how will the homes be built? Does not the Minister realise that acres of planning permissions exist for residential properties? What is lacking is confidence among potential home buyers and opportunites for local authorities to build homes in which they can house families, thus reducing their waiting lists.

Sir George Young: Confidence is returning by the day. Private developers will be interested in developing the sites in the hon. Gentleman's constituency for both homes and jobs.

I do not recall the representative from the hon. Gentleman's local authority describing the proposals as cosmetic or cynical at the meeting that I chaired. All the local authorities that attended that meeting wanted to work with the Government in unlocking the potential of the east Thames corridor. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will reconsider his approach to the proposals: his constituents can gain real benefit from working with the Government to unlock that potential.

Sir Michael Neubert: Is my hon. Friend aware that nowhere has the announcement of the east Thames corridor been more strongly welcomed than in the London borough of Havering, represented in Parliament by the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire), my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) and myself? Will he undertake to give every encouragement to the Havering Riverside project launched yesterday, which invites private investment in what will be a key site in the Thames corridor? If there is to be an international station at Rainham, bringing Paris and Brussels within two hours' travelling time, it will also be a major gateway to Europe.

Sir George Young: I am heartened to hear from my hon. Friend about the proposals for further investment in the east Thames corridor. I will indeed take an interest in the scheme that he mentioned. Within the constraints applying to a planning Minister, which I am sure that he understands, I will ensure that my Department gives the planners every assistance in bringing the scheme forward.

Toxic Waste

6. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received concerning the importation of toxic waste into the United Kingdom.

Mr. Howard: I have had representations from hon. Members, the waste industry, environmental and other organisations and members of the public.

Mr. Hughes: Does the Secretary of State appreciate that people in south Wales are asking, "Why should we have this toxic waste dumped on our doorstep?"? Surely, a sophisticated country such as Germany should be able to deal with its own waste. The Minister will be aware that south Wales has suffered enough from pollution, with coal tips galore, the horrors of Aberfan and so on. May I make a plea to the Secretary of State? Will he do whatever he can to prevent the insidious American concern Browning Ferris from establishing a waste disposal plant in Newport?

Mr. Howard: The House will find the hon. Gentleman's comments about coal tips rather odd in the light of the views that have recently been expressed, particularly by Opposition Members. The hon. Gentleman was perhaps referring to a shipment of toxic waste from Germany that was recently the subject of comment in the media. He will know that I have made representations to the German Environment Minister asking him to place a ban on the exportation of that shipment to Britain. The shipment has not left Germany and I hope that my representations will have the desired effect, which I hope will be welcomed by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: I strongly endorse my right hon. and learned Friend's commitment to self-sufficiency for developed countries. Does that not also mean that those developed countries should take a responsible attitude to international trade? For example, how much longer can we tolerate the fact that German legislation is undermining the recycling industry in the United Kingdom by ensuring that dumped material undercuts anything that can be generated in the United Kingdom market?

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the consequences of that element of German legislation. I have made representations on that matter as well to the German Environment Minister, and my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade has made representations to the European Commission. The matter needs to be dealt with and my right hon. Friend and I are considering urgently what action we can take.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the Secretary of State come clean about the Government's attitude to the international trade in toxic waste? He has made it clear, and I support him, that he feels it appropriate to make representations on occasions to other Governments to prevent the import of toxic waste into Britain. Is he aware that our reputation is severely harmed when he and the Government take no action to prevent the export of toxic waste, particularly to developing countries such as Mexico? It does Britain no good continually to be seen as the dirty exporter of Europe.

Mr. Howard: The most significant step forward in the European Community in recent years is the waste shipment regulation, which was agreed under the United Kingdom presidency in the second half of last year. It resulted from a United Kingdom initiative started by my predecessor, now the Governor of Hong Kong. We have consistently taken the lead in encouraging our partners in Europe to pursue effective policies on the export of toxic waste.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Will my right hon. and learned Friend think carefully before rejecting any work that may come to Britain through recycling of toxic waste? Does he agree that there is surely a dichotomy in the Opposition's attitude? We hear lectures all the time from Opposition Members about recycling things. When we perhaps recycle nuclear fuel, the Opposition criticise us for doing so and making billions of pounds and creating hundreds of jobs in the process.

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the internal inconsistencies in the attitudes of Labour Members. This is not the only issue on which we see that. My hon. Friend will know that I am awaiting the report of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution in relation to the THORP—the thermal oxide reprocessing plant—application, and therefore I am sure that he would not expect me to say anything about that matter at this stage.

Mr. Chris Smith: The Secretary of State will be aware that from May of next year it will be possible and legal for the United Kingdom to ban the import of toxic waste from developed countries. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give the House a firm and unequivocal commitment that he will take action to do so? The Minister for the Environment and Countryside has appeared to indicate that he will take such action and, at different times, that he will not, while the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State in the other place, Lord Strathclyde, has talked simply of reducing toxic waste imports rather than banning them. Will the Secretary of State ban toxic waste imports into this country from developed countries from May of next year?

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman is misrepresenting the situation. We have every intention of implementing the regulation agreed last year on the due date, May 1994. Indeed, we pressed the Community to fix an earlier date for the implementation of the legislation, but we were unable to persuade our partners in Europe to achieve an earlier date.

The hon. Gentleman will also know that the regulation does not provide for a complete ban, but provides for those countries that cannot economically make provision for their own recycling to be able to export small quantities of waste. The hon. Gentleman will know that we are obliged by that aspect of the legislation as well as by the rest of it.

House Purchase

7. Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many houses were purchased under the special package announced in the autumn statement.

15. Mr. Stephen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many houses have now been brought into use by the housing package announced in the autumn statement.

Sir George Young: Housing associations have purchased some 18,000 additional homes in England using the £577 million allocated for this purpose in the autumn statement. This is a very great achievement, exceeding by 2,000 the target of 16,000 homes set in November. I congratulate heartily the Housing Corporation and the 81 associations involved. Purchases have been widely spread across the country, with acquisitions in some 97 per cent. of local authority areas. Grants to local authority and housing association tenants have enabled some 3,300 to become owner-occupiers, freeing their current homes for those in need. So, overall, the package has provided more than 21,000 permanent new homes for families in England.

Mr. Rowe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that encouraging reply. Does he agree that a number of other developments have enormously enhanced the value of that package, not least the considerable fall in interest rates?

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend rightly points out that there have been significant improvements in the housing market, working with the grain of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's autumn statement. My hon. Friend will know that building societies' net advances were up 40 per cent. in March compared with February and that new lending commitments, at more than £3 billion, were double the January level. So there is every sign that the autumn statement package was effective in restoring confidence in the housing market.

Mr. Stephen: Does my hon. Friend agree that there are still far more empty houses than there are homeless families? Does he further agree that the way in which to provide housing for those who need it is to bring those empty houses into use and not to cover our green fields and gardens with more buildings?

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. There are some 60,000 families in temporary accommodation and some 600,000 properties empty, so my hon. Friend makes a valid point. This Administration have taken steps to bring into use many of those empty properties. We have introduced a scheme, using housing associations as managing agents, to persuade the owners of those empty properties to bring them back into use and to rent them to those in need. We are also developing proposals to continue the revival of the private rented sector, to which the Government attach particular importance.

Mr. George Howarth: Has the Minister had the opportunity to study the Rowntree report, which suggests that the estates that are being bought up for this purpose are in danger of turning into ghettos of the 1960s and 1970s style? If the Minister has studied the report, does he have any proposals to stop that happening? I hope that he agrees that it would not be in the interests of anybody to re-create that type of problem.

Sir George Young: I have read the very interesting report published last week by Rowntree. The hon. Member will know that housing associations do not, by and large, develop large estates. The average size of a housing association development is about 20. The report, however, acts as a useful warning to housing associations that may be looking at the larger schemes that there are management problems that could go with them. In practice, most housing association schemes on large sites are already broken down into smaller sites operated by different housing associations, so there is diversity of tenure and of management on the large estates where housing associations are active.

Mr. Gerrard: While I welcome the fact that money is being spent on housing, does the Minister accept that, in London at least, the impact of this package on both the housing market and family homelessness has been very limited? In the main, the money has gone on buying newly built properties—only 5 per cent. have been repossessions—and mainly one-bedroomed flats rather than family housing. Will the Minister look again at whether more money can be spent by both housing associations and local authorities to buy family housing, so that we can start to do something about the growing number of families in London who are in temporary accommodation?

Sir George Young: The hon. Member will find that the package was focused on two-bedroomed properties rather than one-bedroomed homes. In my constituency, the London borough of Ealing has been able to end the use of bed and breakfast. Only one person is now left in bed and breakfast, who is there voluntarily. Part of the reason why the council has been able to do that is the use of the autumn statement package to take people out of bed and breakfast and move them into homes acquired under that package. I think that the hon. Member will find that London has benefited from the package. There has been a 38 per cent. fall in bed and breakfast over the past year, and I would expect to find that improvement maintained when we have the next figures in a few weeks' time, which will show the full impact of the package.

Housing Association Homes

8. Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many housing association homes he expects to be made available in 1992-93.

Sir George Young: A final figure for completions is not yet available. However, the Housing Corporation estimates that at least 80,000 units, including some 6,000 funded through local authority housing association grant, will have been made available by housing associations in 1992-93. This is not far short of double the corporation's forecast of 43,400 units when the programme for 1992-93 was announced—thanks to the housing market package and to the excellent value for money which has been achieved by housing associations.

Mr. Spring: Is my hon. Friend aware of the excellent working relationship between the Conservative-controlled

St. Edmundsbury borough council and the 14 housing associations in my constituency? Will he agree with me that this excellent working and organisational relationship has been of benefit by reducing waiting lists and virtually doing away with difficulties for families needing bed-and-breakfast accommodation? Will he also agree with me that this excellent record contrasts markedly with the appalling housing record of so many Labour local authorities that have blighted the lives of so many thousands of our fellow citizens?

Sir George Young: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. I recently visited his constituency and met the hard-working local councillors in charge of housing policy. I welcome the way in which they have embraced their enabling role and are developing good relationships with housing associations. I also welcome the way in which they are working with my Department on an estate action scheme in Haverhill in the same district. My hon. Friend's local authority is a model of what more local authorities should do to make faster progress in tackling their housing problems.

Mr. Jamieson: Will the Minister tell the House what representations he has made to his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence about the 9,291 empty Ministry of Defence properties throughout the country, 527 of them in my constituency of Plymouth, which is 21 per cent. of the total MOD stock there? Would he care to congratulate Plymouth city council on having less than 0·75 per cent. of its houses void at a time when many people are homeless in the city? What representations has he made about empty MOD properties?

Sir George Young: The hon. Member will know that after the last election we set up a task force, chaired by John Baker, precisely to deal with the issue that he has raised. He will also know that the Ministry of Defence is bringing back to this country large numbers of service families who will need accommodation when they get here. The MOD is leasing property to housing associations and local authorities. It is disposing of surplus stock and giving cash grants to service men leaving the armed forces; they can use that money to buy some of the surplus stock.

I assure the hon. Gentleman that the MOD is anxious to reduce the number of surplus properties that it owns.

Mr. Simon Coombs: Does my hon. Friend agree that the £2·7 billion worth of new lending by building societies in February clearly shows that it is not just Ministers who believe that now is a good time to buy a new home?

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The indicators, some of which I mentioned a moment ago, show that that is so. Abbey National reported that its mortgage approvals in the first quarter of the current year were 60 per cent. up on those in the same quarter last year. Many people are taking the view that this is, indeed, a good time to buy a home.

Mr. Pike: The Minister referred to the number of homes that will become available, but does he recognise that there is a real problem with the rent levels—a problem underlined by the housing associations' campaign on affordability? More than 81 per cent. of housing association tenants now need housing benefits. Are not housing association rents far too high, and is it not time the Government did something to get those rents down, so that people can afford to pay them?

Sir George Young: I cannot agree that average housing association rents are too high. The average rent is about £40 a week. In my view, that is a reasonable figure. I am aware of the sensitivity of the housing associations about this matter. The subject engaged the attention of the Environment Select Committee for some time when I appeared before it last week, and I await its report with interest. But the hon. Gentleman must accept that by reducing the rate of grants from 72 per cent. last year to 67 per cent. this year, we have achieved an extra 3,300 homes for those in need without any increase in the implied rent, because of the fall in interest rates and in land values. One has to strike a balance between rent levels and the output of new homes, and I think that we have got the balance about right.

Mr. James Hill: I congratulate my hon. Friend on the great efforts that he is making to provide more tenancies. Does he agree that a survey of our cities would show up a flaw, however, in that some of the boarded-up houses that are not owned by anyone in particular are not the sort of houses that housing associations want? Is it not possible to direct the housing associations to go for houses that need maintenance but will then provide housing units, instead of the simple solution of buying new build?

Sir George Young: I entirely agree. I am anxious to re-focus the energy of the housing association movement on the inner cities, where many of them started. That is why I have told the Housing Corporation that I should like 18 per cent. of this year's budget to go towards rehabilitation and improvement. We are also conducting research to find out what is impeding the housing associations' attempts to do more work.

There is, of course, an important planning role. The more boarded-up homes that can be brought back into use, the less pressure there will be for development on green-field sites. Hon. Members on both sides of the House are anxious to protect those sites if we can.

Urban Policies

10. Mr. Eastham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the effects of his urban policies.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Robin Squire): The Government's urban policies are encouraging investment and improving the quality of life in our major cities through partnership and competition. The hon. Member will, I know, welcome the fact that over £400 million in targeted urban resources has gone into Manchester in the period 1990-93 alone.

Mr. Eastham: Is the Minister aware that phasing out the urban programme will cost us about 3,400 jobs and about 12,000 training places? Is he further aware that the town hall has spent about £100,000 on tendering that has been aborted as a result of Government cancellations? The voluntary organisations are being devastated in the city at the same time—a time when the Prime Minister has visited Manchester to back the Olympic bid, saying that he wants to revitalise the city.

Mr. Squire: Against the background of the Department of the Environment's urban block programme this year of £1,000 million, it is a little perverse of the hon. Gentleman to concentrate entirely on the urban programme. For the record, this year Manchester will get some £9 million from the urban programme and, of course, the council has the freedom to spend all its capital receipts as it wishes. In addition, Manchester has two development corporations, an excellent city challenge, one task force, substantial housing investment, use of derelict land grant and the prospect of substantial investment from the Olympics in the year 2000. Most hon. Members would be delighted to get such a package.

Mr. Knapman: In the areas that have large numbers of empty houses, can my hon. Friend discern a pattern between the scale of the problem and the political complexion of the councils in those areas?

Mr. Squire: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that matter. I understand from my housing colleagues in the Department that there is often a sad correlation between the number of housing voids and the fact that a council is under Labour control. I hope that electors in the forthcoming county elections will bear that in mind.

Mr. Vaz: Does the Minister recall telling local authority leaders in November that he would review the list of urban programme authorities in the new year, using the 1991 census? Will he explain why the consultation paper arrived only in April, four months after it was promised, and why local authorities have been given only weeks to respond to a very important area of policy? Is not it the case that the delay in publishing this document is a result of the Minister's desire to manipulate the criteria for political ends and to provide excuses for his savage cuts in inner-city aid?

Mr. Squire: The hon. Gentleman must have misheard my earlier answer. I agree with him only on the importance of this programme. There is no delay. Matters are on target. It takes a little time to incorporate the entire results from the 1991 census, which will rightly guide us in this review. We have consulted local authorities, as I assume the hon. Gentleman wishes us to do, and we shall produce our final proposals later this year. The hon. Gentleman should not worry, because we are on target and our advice will be the best possible and will be triggered by the latest possible information.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Does my hon. Friend accept that recreation and leisure areas and parkland are vital to urban areas? The question is not just about the urban programme and allied policies but about urban policies in general. The inspectorate of his Department often appears only too ready to grant planning permission to public bodies such as health authorities that are seeking to develop vital and important open areas within centres such as the borough and town of Macclesfield. Such areas are vital for recreation and as parkland, and they enhance the environment of our town centres. Will my hon. Friend seek to prevail upon his inspectorate and direct his attention to these vital policies? We do not want every area of green within cities to be covered by housing.

Mr. Squire: My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing, Planning and Construction has heard my hon. Friend's question and has confirmed to me that the latest document, PPG17, specifically addresses that point. I agree with my hon. Friend on the wider issue of the importance of recreation. Hon. Members from Sheffield or near Sheffield will know about the substantial work by the development corporation there which is transforming old, derelict areas into excellent open spaces for recreation.

Council Tax

11. Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate of the average level of the council tax; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: The average headline council tax for two or more adults in a band C dwelling in England is £506.

Mr. Salmond: The Minister will be aware of major demonstrations against council tax levels which took place in the Western Isles. Is he aware that even after the cuts in council tax that followed, which will clearly have a significant implication for services in the islands, someone in a £40,000 house in the Western Isles will still pay £110 more than someone in the Prime Minister's constituency of Huntingdon? Does the Minister think that the surcharge that the Western Isles are paying over Huntingdon is reasonable, equitable, just and defensible, or does he think that it means that Huntingdon is getting too much public support and that the Western Isles is getting too little?

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman is badly misinformed about the relative levels of grant support. Scottish authorities receive £1,013 per head in external support—47 per cent. more than English local authorities, which receive £689 a head. Even allowing for some difference in functions, that is a big increase over the English figure. The hon. Gentleman should take up his argument in Scottish Question Time, and with those who are trying to lead the Western Isles council. The electors in the Western Isles knew where to lay the blame. They knew that it lay with the council, which is beginning to respond.

Mr. Clappison: Will the Minister confirm that not only is band C council tax £107 more under Labour authorities than it is under Conservative authorities, but that the 10 highest council taxes have all been set by Labour authorities? Does he agree that this is no mere coincidence, but compelling evidence that Labour authorities are profligate spenders and that value for money is an alien concept to them?

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is right. All 10 of the highest English council tax rates have been set by Labour local authorities. Practically every one of those authorities not only gets more grant than the average but, in most cases, gets massively more than the average because the Government recognise some special factors. However, the councillors are not able to use all the extra money to the benefit of their local taxpayers and provide good-quality services.

Mr. Milburn: Is the Minister aware that of the 1,800 inquiries received by Darlington council about the disabled persons reduction scheme, 1,500 came from people placed in band A? Does he recognise that his refusal to extend the scheme to those living in band A properties short changes those who are in most need of assistance to pay their bills? Will he consider introducing a new council tax band of A minus to assist my constituents and those of other hon. Members who, through no fault of their own, are losing out?

Mr. Redwood: The idea of disablement relief on houses in different council tax banks is that it should come into operation where a disabled person has had to spend extra on improving the house to cope with the disability. For those on low incomes, who are already rated in the lowest band, there are many other ways in which they can get help, such as through disability benefit and council tax benefit. We wish to ensure that people on low incomes are not penalised, and there is a generous scheme to do that. If the issue is whether somebody has been put into a higher band by virtue of the disability, that element in help for disabled people can be given only to those in the higher band. Like Opposition Members, I wish to help the disabled. That is why we have a series of measures to help them, geared to income and house values.

Bathing Water Quality

12. Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many bathing waters were designated by Her Majesty's Government for the purposes of the 1975 EC bathing waters directive by May 1979.

Mr. Howard: No bathing waters had been identified by May 1979 as within the scope of the bathing waters directive.

Mr. Brown: Can my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that the position has changed, although Cleethorpes is not yet up to standard? Perhaps he might like to consider taking one of his holidays in Cleethorpes. The Prime Minister has already said, in a reply to me earlier this year, that he hopes to visit Cleethorpes. Can my right hon. and learned Friend, if he comes to Cleethorpes, hold out the prospect that, by 1995, there is every probability that our beaches will be able to hold their own with the rest of the United Kingdom? Can he also confirm that, this year, Cleethorpes expects to receive the greatest number of tourists ever? Clean beaches would put the icing on the cake of that great tourist achievement.

Mr. Howard: I very much look forward to visiting Cleethorpes, although my hon. Friend has a somewhat exaggerated notion of the number of holidays that I take during the year. I can confirm that we expect the bathing beaches of Cleethorpes fully to meet the standards of the European bathing waters directive by 1995. I am delighted to hear what he has told me about the number of tourists that Cleethorpes intends to entertain over the summer and I am sure that they will benefit from all the facilities that the resort has to offer.

Mr. Dafis: Does the Secretary of State accept that it is unreasonable for funding for the kind of environmental improvements covered by the directive to be provided in such a way as to have a terrible effect on water bills, with the impact that has on low-income families? Would not it be reasonable for at least some of that funding to come from the public purse? Is such funding already given or would it be possible?

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman must accept that the resources for the public purse come from his constituents, just as much as the money for the bills that they have to pay for improved water systems. It is no use the hon. Gentleman or other Opposition Members proclaiming the need for higher standards without being prepared to make available the resources necessary if those standards are to be achieved.

Mr. Allason: My right hon. and learned Friend will be aware that Torbay enjoys the cleanest beaches and quite the best bathing water in the country. Is he aware also that a large burden is placed on South West Water chargepayers, who are obliged to pay for what is, in effect, a national asset? Will my right hon. and learned Friend kindly visit Torbay this summer, swim in our water, and then examine our water charges?

Mr. Howard: I am grateful to all hon. Friends who want me to spend an ever-increasing number of holidays in their constituencies. I agree entirely with my hon. Friend's remarks about the excellent quality of Torbay's beaches, and I know of, and have some sympathy with, his concerns about the level of bills in the south-west. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister indicated recently that we are examining those matters.

Ms Short: Does the Secretary of State agree that of interest is not whether he is willing to visit Cleethorpes but whether he is willing to swim there—and whether he is worried that he might be swimming in sewage? That is the issue of concern to people throughout the country. Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman have any plans to enforce the directive's guidelines, rather than just its minimum standards? There is evidence that enforcing only the minimum standards still leads to sickness caused by sewage problems. Will the Secretary of State confirm that Britain's 400 designated areas will reach the minimum standard by 1995 or will he renege on that standard? Does he agree with the Marine Conservation Society that it would be reasonable to ask the big 10 privatised water companies to reduce their returns to shareholders, to achieve decent minimum bathing standards?

Mr. Howard: I am not persuaded that the present mandatory—not minimum—standards are in any way inadequate to provide the quality of bathing beaches that we require. We are making excellent progress. Very few of our bathing beaches no longer reach the standard, and I hope that they will all meet it in 1995. Perhaps the hon. Lady will come with me to Cleethorpes.

Council Tax

13. Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the 10 local authorities with the highest level of council tax.

Mr. Redwood: The 10 local authorities in England with the highest average headline council taxes are as follows. I give the band C values, but at all levels they are the highest. Harlow—[HON. MEMBERS: "Labour"]—£878; Newcastle upon Tyne—[HON. MEMBERS: "Labour."]—£704; Greenwich—[HON. MEMBERS: "Labour."]—£696; Manchester—[HON. MEMBERS: "Labour."]—£656; Haringey—[HON. MEMBERS: "Labour."]—£646; Liverpool—[HON. MEMBERS: "Labour."]—£645; Camden—[HON. MEMBERS: "Labour."]—£638; North Tyneside—[HON. MEMBERS: "Labour."]—£628; Salford—[HON. MEMBERS: "Labour."]—£628; and Derwentside—[HON. MEMBERS: "Labour."]——£626.

Lady Olga Maitland: I thank my hon. Friend for that revealing answer. Will he be kind enough to name the 10 local authorities having the lowest levels of council tax?

Mr. Redwood: Without prior notice, that could be difficult, but I have a list that I prepared earlier for my hon. Friend. There is Wellingborough—[HON. MEMBERS: "Conservative."]—there is——

Madam Speaker: Order. I am looking at the clock. We must speed up.

Mr. Redwood: There are also Westminster, Isles of Scilly, City of London, Hambleton, Hinckley and Bosworth, Huntingdon, Basingstoke and Deane, South Cambridgeshire and Fareham.

Mr. Straw: Is the Minister aware that according to his own Department's figures for average household bills, there are twice as many Tory councils as Labour councils in the 50 most expensive areas and that among the 50 least expensive areas for average bills there are twice as many Labour as Tory councils, including Southampton—[HON. MEMBERS: "Labour."]—Lincoln—[HON. MEMBERS: "Labour."]—Stoke-on-Trent—[HON. MEMBERS: "Labour."]—Corby—[HON. MEMBERS: "Labour."]—Great Yarmouth—[HON. MEMBERS: "Labour."]—Bradford—[HON. MEMBERS: "Labour."]—Plymouth—[HON. MEMBERS: "Labour."]—York—[HON. MEMBERS: "Labour."]—Slough—[HON. MEMBERS: "Labour."]—and Norwich—[HON. MEMBERS: "Labour."]—all with bills way below the average Tory bill of £465. It is Labour which serves us better and costs us less.

Mr. Redwood: In any band that we care to choose, Labour costs us more and Conservatives cost us less. The hon. Gentleman has not understood that point, after a long session today, but we are going to go on saying it all the way up to 6 May, because it is the truth and the voters will respond.

Points of Order

3.30 pm

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. The question has been raised before, in general terms, about the transfer of written questions to individuals, writing on behalf of a particular executive agency.

What concerns me is that I asked a question of the Chairman of the Catering Committee—which, as you will appreciate, is not an executive agency—and it was transferred to the director of catering services. I ask you to discourage that practice, particularly as the question was about what appears to be the theft of a large quantity of cutlery and silverware. It concerns you particularly, Madam Speaker, because it carries the portcullis, the insignia of the House of Commons. That was not removed before this cutlery ended up on sale in the United States, apparently in considerable quantities.

I understand that the Catering Department managed to get the sum of £109 in scrap value from the sale of some of the items. Knives, forks, spoons, milk jugs, cream jugs, teapots and a range of items are on sale from an American firm. For example, a meat dish is on sale at roughly £250.

This is a matter of considerable importance which the Chairman of the Catering Committee—I notified him that I intended to raise this point of order with you—has shuffled off on to the director of catering services. A matter that concerns both you, regarding the control of the Portcullis and the disposal of these items, should, it seems to me, have been dealt with by the Chairman of the appropriate Committee.

Madam Speaker: The House, I am sure, knows that I do not believe everything that I read in the press. However, I did believe one item that I was told about—that the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) had tabled a question for answer by the Chairman of the Catering Committee. If the hon. Gentleman will leave the matter with me, I shall certainly raise it with the Chairman of the Committee.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Every morning, Monday to Thursday, as you know, about 2,000 people come through the House of Commons on the Line of Route. This morning, information was passed to me that a considerable number of people who follow the Line of Route would be barred from doing so. I made inquiries and found that one of these Common Market Presidents was due to come here, the one from Portugal.

Frankly, I think that it is totally and utterly wrong that people who, in some cases, have travelled 300 or 400 miles to London to visit the House of Commons should be barred from the Line of Route just to allow the President of Portugal to come into the Chamber on his own, irrespective of who was responsible for the invitation. People talk about the classless society in this place, but today's example shows that it is as far away as ever.

Madam Speaker: I am aware that the President of Portugal visited the House this morning and I am proud that he did so. I understand that he was invited to view the Chamber by an hon. Member. In deference to the visit of a Head of State, and on grounds of security, the admission of visitors to the Chamber was delayed by some five minutes. I am content with the arrangements that were made.

Adoption Leave Arrangements

3.34 pm

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to permit the Secretary of State by order to confer rights on adoptive mothers in relation to employment similar to those enjoyed by mothers whose children are born to them; to make provision for adoptive mothers to have the right to return to work during the adoption period laid down; and for connected purposes.

I welcome this opportunity to bring the Bill before the House. The Bill would allow the Secretary of State to confer employment rights on adoptive mothers similar to those rights enjoyed by mothers whose children are born to them. It would also provide for adoptive mothers to have the right to return to work during the adoption period laid down.

It seems extraordinary in this day and age, when we have made great progress in recognising the role that women play as mothers, that we should still sustain in our system an inequality against families who provide a home for a child through adoption. At present, adoptive parents do not have the statutory right to return to their jobs after taking a break to care for a new addition to their family. Nor do they receive any statutory payment during any such absence, even though they may well have paid the same national insurance contributions as those who have children born to them, and should thus have access to such entitlements.

I believe that it is the role of Parliament not only to legislate for the majority of its citizens but to revisit legislation and collect those groups of people which it may have missed. In this case, adoptive parents are missed, and are missing out.

In preparing the Bill, I have received tremendous support from Jill White and British Agencies for Adoption and Fostering. I pay tribute to the work they do and the way in which they take up issues on behalf of families seeking to adopt children.

Adopters provide a tremendous service not only to the children they adopt but to the country as a whole. In many instances, the financial burden of raising a child may have fallen on the state. An adoptive parent takes financial responsibility for that child, thus saving the taxpayer money, but, more importantly, no one can disagree that a child raised within a family circle and having the stability of a warm and loving home has a much better start in life than a child who does not have that opportunity. Therefore, an adoptive parent makes an invaluable contribution to the welfare of an individual child and, ultimately, to that child's chances in life—something on which we cannot put a price.

The demands made on a family by the arrival of a new child are similar for birth parents and adoptive parents. In fact, parents who are accepted for adoption may find that their child arrives at very short notice. Like any other child being born into a family, an adopted child needs to spend time with its new parents, especially during the first few weeks when the bonding is established between parents and child. Why should we omit adoptive parents from the protective legislation afforded to birth mothers? There is no good reason for doing so.

I consider this to be not a political issue but one of common sense. That is why, in presenting the Bill to the House, I have been supported not only by members of my own party but by members of the Opposition. I am very grateful to all supporters of the Bill.

The Bill would confer the same entitlements on adoptive mothers as on birth mothers, with the proviso that a prospective adopter must inform her employer in writing, first, of her and her family's approval as prospective adopters, and, secondly, as soon as is practicably possible, of the impending placement for adoption once a child has become available.

The Bill would give an adoptive mother the same right to return to work as a birth mother, and it seeks to extend the rights provided by the Employment Protection (Consolidated) Act 1978 by substituting the words "adoption leave" for the words "maternity leave" and the words "placement for adoption" for "pregnancy and childbirth".

Introducing the same legislation for adopters as for natural mothers would also have benefits for employers, who, unless they have special arrangements, now risk losing valuable trained staff. Individuals who have passed through the necessary screening procedure to be accepted as potential adoptive parents are usually among the most reliable and responsible members of our society, yet we put them in a position in which they may even have to choose between their jobs and adopting a child. I have not sought to restrict the provisions of the Bill with an age limit for the child, because that would be a matter for deliberation in Committee.

I shall give the House an example involving a constituent of mine, a general practitioner, who, together with her husband, has been approved by the local social services department for adopting a baby. She would like to take leave from her partnership when a baby becomes available, and her partners support her. She hoped that she would be eligible for the 13 weeks of locum payments from the family health services authority, in line with its usual practice on maternity leave for birth mothers. But her application was rejected, and she is pursuing the matter with the relevant authorities, now with my help and support. She feels—I agree with her, and I am sure that every Member of the House will also agree—that it is discriminatory to prevent her from experiencing motherhood without having to pay a penalty.

The adoption agency rightly requires that the adoptive mother be absent from work after receiving the adopted child so that she can spend time with that child. Failure to agree to that condition would disqualify her from being an adoptive parent. So if she wishes to continue to be available to adopt, she is faced with some pretty tough decisions about her livelihood.

My Bill seeks to deal with just such cases and to relieve the stress and strain of the uncertainties in that area—uncertainties that arise as a direct result of a lacuna in the legislation. Many letters received by British Agencies for Adoption and Fostering reflect that uncertainty. Some employers seem willing to grant adoption leave; others do not. Potential adoptive parents are unsure about their position in law and often ask for clarification, only to be told that they have no rights.

That area of law is in urgent need of review, so I hope that the Minister will consider my Bill carefully. If we cannot make progress with this ten-minute Bill, I sincerely hope that he will take the earliest opportunity to produce amending legislation to end the additional burden and uncertainty for a group of people who provide a wonderful start for so many of our youngsters, and who surely deserve at least the same protection as that afforded by our laws to a natural parent. Let us really level that playing field for our adopted children and their parents.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Ms Cheryl Gillan, Mrs. Angela Browning, Mr. Harold Elletson, Mr. Nigel Evans, Mr. David Hinchliffe, Ms Liz Lynne, Ms Joyce Quin, Mr. John Sykes and Mr. Richard Spring.

Adoption Leave Arrangements

Ms Cheryl Gillan accordingly presented a Bill to permit the Secretary of State by order to confer rights on adoptive mothers in relation to employment similar to those enjoyed by mothers whose children are born to them; to make provision for adoptive mothers to have the right to return to work during the adoption period laid down; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 14 May, and to be printed. [Bill 188.]

Orders of the Day

National Lottery etc. Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

[Madam Speaker in the Chair]

New clause 7

Annual reports by distributing bodies other than Millennium Commission

'.—(1) As soon as possible after the end of every financial year, each body that in that year was paid any money under section 22 or distributed or applied any money under section 23 shall make a report to the Secretary of State on the exercise during that year of its functions under this Act.

(2) The report shall set out any directions given to the body under section 24 that had effect during the financial year to which the report relates.

(3) The Secretary of State shall lay a copy of every report received by him under this section before Parliament.

(4) This section does not apply to the Millennium Commission.'.—[Mr. Key.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

3.44 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for National Heritage (Mr. Robert Key): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Speaker: I understand that it will be convenient to discuss at the same time the following: Government new clause 8—Accounts of distributing bodies other than Charities Board and Millennium Commission.

Amendment No. 26: in clause 23, page 10, line 18 at end insert—

'( ) A body shall report to the Secretary of State each year on the distribution under subsection (1) which it has made during that year.'.

Government amendments Nos. 69, 70 and 71.

Mr. Key: It is a great pleasure to come back to the Floor of the House with the Bill. It is quite rare for a Bill to have been so amended in Committee. It gives me pleasure to say that, because we have been engaged on an important piece of legislation in creating the first national lottery in this country this century, and we have been determined to get it right. We have listened to representations from all parts of the political spectrum and from all interest groups that are involved or that might be affected. I have no doubt that the Bill today is better than the Bill on which we embarked in Committee some weeks ago. I thank all members of the Committee who made that possible. It was a constructive Committee and we had the benefit of a great deal of advice from beyond the Committee.

In Committee, I undertook to consider ways in which to ensure transparency of accounting for lottery funds. The new clauses would ensure that Parliament would be able to see clearly exactly how all funds from the lottery had been spent. Amendment No. 26 is intended to ensure the same. As our new clauses and amendments meet, I hope, the intention of amendment No. 26, tabled by the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd), I hope that she will accept new clause 7 and the other amendments and that she will withdraw her own.

The reason why I hope that the hon. Lady will withdraw amendment No. 26 is that the Millennium Commission is likely to have as one of its members the Secretary of State, so it would not be appropriate for the commission's report to be submitted to him before being laid before Parliament. I hope that the hon. Members who tabled amendment No. 26 will accept that our new clauses and amendments would meet their purpose.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): I know that in legislation the term "Secretary of State" is a generic term to cover all Secretaries of State. Where the new clause uses the words "Secretary of State" in terms of reporting for the Scottish Arts Council and for the Scottish Sports Council, does it mean the Secretary of State for Scotland and not the Secretary of State for National Heritage?

Mr. Key: It would be the Secretary of State for National Heritage, because it is our lottery.

Mr. Maxton: I find that a slightly odd reply in relation to Scotland. It is clear that the Scottish Arts Council and the Scottish Sports Council come under the Secretary of State for Scotland. They are his responsibility, he appoints them, and they report on all other matters to him. I do not, therefore, understand why the Minister says that on the issue only of the spending of national lottery money, the report will go to the Secretary of State for National Heritage. That seems a strange decision and I should like a slightly fuller explanation.

Mr. Key: It is really very straightforward. It is a national lottery and the Secretary of State for National Heritage is responsible to the House for the operation of the lottery. The Arts Council in Scotland is a sub-committee of the Arts Council of Great Britain as presently constituted. Next year, it will become the Scottish Arts Council in its own right and will then be answerable to the Secretary of State for Scotland. But the national lottery will be the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage, and he will be responsible to Parliament for it.

Mr. Tom Pendry (Stalybridge and Hyde): This debate is turning into a bit of a lottery already.

I propose to speak to amendment No. 26, in the names of my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) and others. I am afraid that I must disappoint the Minister: we shall not readily give in unless we receive a satisfactory reply.

We consider it important that bodies distributing lottery proceeds should be fully accountable for their decisions. In that context, we believe that they should be required to report each year on the grants that they have made from national lottery proceeds.

The spirit of the Government's amendments is that bodies distributing lottery proceeds should be required to act in a responsible and transparent manner. That is fair enough and we accept that there has been some movement on that, but we believe that, as part of that commitment to responsible action, distributing bodies should be required to report each year on the grants that they have made. An onus should be placed on them to demonstrate that a proportion of their funds has been spent for the benefit of low-income groups. In our view, that would demonstrate a commitment to responsible action.

There is much evidence to suggest that low-income groups will contribute disproportionately to the purchase of national lottery tickets. The report by DKM Economic Consultants commissioned by the An Post lottery company in 1990—a report of which the Minister knows because it was mentioned in Committee—concluded that participation in the lottery is fairly constant across all classes. That claim has been seriously challenged by Desmond Norton of Dublin university. In his analysis of the report's findings, Norton shows that, on the contrary, education and income are key variables determining spending on the national lottery. The skilled working class and the unemployed spend more on tickets than do the middle classes.

That finding is confirmed by earlier research conducted in the United States by Clotfelter and Cook. Research recently undertaken by Saatchi and Saatchi on behalf of the Sports Council supports the view that participation in the lottery will be weighted towards those in the lower income groups. That survey, which examined the public's intention as regards the purchase of national lottery tickets, suggested that a larger proportion of those in social classes C1 and C2 than in the AB category would be regular lottery participants. In his report on the national lottery for the Gulbenkian Foundation, Professor John Kay notes that the Saatchi and Saatchi findings

"are consistent with the results of the surveys in other countries. The general finding is that poorer people spend a larger proportion of their income on lotteries."

Professor Kay quotes seven different studies that have reached the same conclusion.

The aim of the lottery is to raise money for the arts, sport, heritage, charities and the millenium fund. Many of us fear that a large proportion of lottery money will be spent on high prestige projects such as opera houses and historic buildings. We have nothing against opera houses and historic buildings, but we want them to be put in context. Research on the current patterns of use of such facilities shows that low-income groups are less likely to benefit from such projects than high earners. We may regret that, but it is none the less the case.

The evidence suggests, therefore, that the lottery could be a form of regressive taxation, obtaining money from the least well-off to finance services for the better-off to enjoy. Opposition Members believe it essential, therefore, that information should be available about the pattern of participation in lottery play.

The amendment places on lottery distributors a duty to report annually on the grants that they have made from their allocation. If purchasing patterns for lottery tickets mirror those in other countries, the distributing bodies should be able to show that their allocation is being used in some measure to benefit those on low incomes. That could include providing funding for the development of access programmes in the arts, sport and heritage, as well as ensuring that programmes that are currently of direct benefit to those on low incomes are properly supported.

The Minister rightly said that the Government had moved a good way to meeting the points made in Committee. I hope that the Minister will go that bit further and accept the spirit of the amendment.

Mr. Tim Renton (Mid-Sussex): I apologise to hon. Members who were members of the Standing Committee for intervening in the debate on Report, as I was not a member of that Committee. However, as some of my hon. Friends will know, as Arts Minister, I was extremely active for 18 months in support of the cause of the national lottery and in persuading my colleagues, including some rather intransigent colleagues at the Treasury, to support the idea.

The Treasury naturally objected to any idea of hypothecation of revenue and therefore to revenue going to causes outside its control. For 18 months, as the Arts Minister, I had a hard battle to win the Treasury round to my way of thinking. However, perhaps more of that later.

I listened to the comments of the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) about amendment No. 26, and although I fully appreciate the social causes and motives which caused him to table his amendment, the idea that the national lottery should in any way be used to fulfil social objectives—objectives that are in themselves worth while—strikes horror in my heart. That cannot be the purpose of the national lottery.

If those who are to subscribe—one hopes weekly, for fun, entertainment and in the hope of winning £1 million and in the knowledge that, if they do not win, the money will go to good causes—become aware that there is a weighting in favour of social security objectives, it will destroy the whole purpose for which the national lottery is being created.

Of course I understand the point made by the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde that some people may be more interested in the redevelopment of the Royal Opera house or in building a new museum of modern art for the Tate gallery than others. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, for example, on the Millennium Commission or elsewhere, will have to help people to take difficult decisions in due course. However, the aim must be to encourage people to take part in a lottery which is essentially for fun and for good causes as well.

If an underlying thought develops that there is a social security element and objective involved, the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde would find that the take-up of lottery tickets, upon which everything depends, would be very much less than it would otherwise be. As a consequence, the whole purpose of the lottery, to raise substantial extra funds for heritage, sports, the Arts, for smaller charities and for the millennium fund will be lost.

The hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde rather gave himself away when, towards the end of his remarks, he said that the proposal could become a form of regressive taxation. We must avoid precisely the thought that this is taxation. If people come to believe that the lottery is a form of regressive taxation and a supplement to Treasury money, or a way of replacing money which the Treasury would otherwise have to provide to the Department of Health for hospitals or to the Department of Social Security for income support, the lottery is bound to fail.

Although I know that the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde has a long-standing interest in supporting, encouraging and increasing sports facilities in this country, I believe that he should not press his amendment. The thought behind it is contrary to the spirit that is necessary for the national lottery to be the great success that hon. Members on both sides of the House hope it will be.

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): The House should be worried by the last line of new clause 7 which states that anyone who is spending money or receiving cash must put a report before the House, but

"This section does not apply to the Millennium Commission."

New clause 7, which is slipping through the House unnoticed is a perfect example of pork-barrel politics. Why should details about money given to the Millennium Commission not be reported to the House? The answer is simple. Anything spent in the year 2000 is likely to have a great effect on a general election that might be called in 2001.

Once the fund is established, anything linked to the year 2000 can be provided from a slush fund to buy votes. If we were at that stage now, the Government would be telling the managers of Newbury race course, "We will give you a new tote and some new tapes. You can run the Grand National here, so that the tapes do not break and everything does not go wrong. It is all to celebrate the year 2000; it has nothing to do with the Newbury by-election next week."

Already, the Prime Minister has been to Manchester and said, "We will back your bid for the Olympic games." Who will pay for that? Not the taxpayer. The Prime Minister has not obtained a single extra penny from the Treasury. No—he will dip his hand into the national lottery slush fund, and the Millennium Commission will get £60 million every year from now until the year 2000. The Prime Minister can spend all that lovely money, and he can say, "We, the Tory Government, have backed the Olympic games that will take place in the year 2000, and all those in marginal seats in the Manchester area—where we have created the jobs—should be desperately grateful to us."

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Will not the hon. Gentleman concede that the Government have already stated their intention of supporting the Olympic games and contributed £15 million towards the building of a new stadium in Manchester?

4 pm

Mr. Ashton: They have not done so yet. They have said that they will back the games, but they have not given a penny, because no money has come in yet.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): The Government cannot commit the money.

Mr. Ashton: Why not? It is to celebrate the year 2000.

Mr. Corbett: It is not within the Government's gift to spend a penny of the lottery money on their own say-so.

Mr. Ashton: My hon. Friend has been in the House for a long time, as have I. He must be very naive if he honestly believes that the Government have no method of shifting money from one project to another in order to gain votes and popularity.

What is to stop the Government from applying new clause 7 to the Millennium Commission? Why should not a report be presented to the House? The new clause states:

"The Secretary of State shall lay a copy of every report received by him under this section"— that is, clause 22, which applies to distribution, and indeed clause 23, which concerns the application of money—

"before Parliament."

That, however, does not apply to the Millennium Commission.

Mr. Key: If the hon. Gentleman allows me to get a word in edgeways, I shall explain to him that the millennium fund is dealt with specifically by clauses 38 and 39.

Mr. Ashton: If I am wrong, I will withdraw what I have said. However, we shall not know whether I am wrong until about 1998, and by then it will all be lost in the mists of time. The matter will be the third item of the business on the Order Paper, and someone will come along at about 1.30 am and slip in an amendment of which no one else is aware. That is how the House and the Government tend to work.

A phenomenal, unbelievable amount of cash is involved; yet its control is very vague. It should not be thought that Governments do not give election bribes—especially a Tory Government who sold council houses for about a fifth of their value in order to win the 1983 election. Such bribes have been given many times.

Will the Minister tell us why, according to subsection (4) of the new clause, it does not apply to the Millennium Commission? Perhaps he will refer later to clauses 37 and 38.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: (Lancaster): The Millennium Commission is more tightly bound than any of the other bodies. Under clause 38, it must make a specific report. The clause states:

"the Millenium Commission shall lay before Parliament a report on the exercise of their functions during that year."

That is a much more specific requirement than those applying to other bodies.

Mr. Ashton: The Government can do anything they like. The hon. Lady is saying that, once the Bill is passed, it is written on tablets of stone and nothing can be altered for the next six years. She must be very naive if she thinks that.

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton): The Under-Secretary of State has mentioned clauses 38 and 39. Clause 39(2) states:

"The statement shall comply with any directions that may be given by the Secretary of State as to the information to be contained . . . the manner in which such information is to be presented or the methods and principles according to which such a statement is to be prepared."

Does that not leave my hon. Friend with some forebodings about the amount of latitude that the Government will have on that statement?

Mr. Ashton: My hon. Friend knows exactly what I am saying. I do not trust any Government——

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ashton: Sit down. I shall not give way. I have given way five times in about three minutes.

The next general elections will probably be in 1996 or early 1997 followed by the year 2000 or 2001. My hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle) is right to say that when a general election is approaching, the temptation to use the money on election bribes for any Government who face a difficult by-election will be irresistible. The Bill has built into it the facility for the Government to do so.

Mr. Maxton: I shall be brief. I wish to respond to the comments made by the former Minister for the Arts, the right hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton), about the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry). The right hon. Gentleman kept referring to spending money on social security. Of course that is not what my hon. Friend meant.

Some Opposition Members are worried that the spending of the money raised by the national lottery will be focused on London and on large, prestige projects. As my hon. Friend said, such projects benefit a few relatively wealthy people. We are worried, first, that the money will not be distributed throughout the country to provide access to the arts and sport to all people, wherever they may live in the United Kingdom; and secondly, that, even where the money is spent outside London, it will be spent on prestige projects which do not necessarily benefit the average person who buys the lottery ticket.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes): Is the hon. Gentleman making the case that per capita public spending north and south of the border should be the same? If so, Scots would suffer from his suggestion.

Mr. Maxton: The hon. Gentleman was at one time a junior Minister at the Scottish Office, but because he was stupid enough to introduce the poll tax, he lost his seat. If he had listened carefully, he would not have heard me mention Scotland or England once. I was not talking about the differences between Scotland and England. I was talking about outside London and inside London. That includes Manchester, Birmingham, Oldham and many places which ought to receive their fair share of the money spent by the ordinary people who buy lottery tickets throughout the United Kingdom. That is the point which I made and which the hon. Gentleman, deliberately or otherwise, misinterpreted.

I was not a member of the Committee. I will not apologise to the House for taking part in the debate on Report. It may now be the custom that only Committee members take part in debates on Report. The Report stage was originally designed specifically so that Members of Parliament other than those who served on the Committee could take part in the debate.

Mr. Key: What an interesting debate it has been. I was certainly delighted that several hon. Members from both sides of the House spoke who did not take part in the proceedings in Standing Committee.

The speech of the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) resembled a speech which might have introduced amendment No. 195, which we are not to debate. However, I understand why he felt it necessary to discuss the point and raise the issue of how the money will be distributed.

It is important to make it clear, and I am grateful for the opportunity to do so, that the way in which the mechanism of the national lottery has been constructed will ensure not only geographical distribution across all interests but the distribution of large or small sums of money. The great advantage of our system—which is the envy of most national lotteries around the world—is that there are separate mechanisms for the distribution and collection of the money. Unlike most national lotteries, the money will not go into the coffers of the Treasury but will be distributed by boards and committees consisting of people and organisations who have the confidence of the recipient sectors. Therefore, I reject those arguments.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton) is absolutely right to react with horror to the amendment and the proposition it contained. It is not intended to substitute national lottery money for main programme spending, whether on social services, the health service, sport or anything else. That has been made absolutely clear.

The points that the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) made were rehearsed at length in Committee, but they are none the worse for that. It is important that people recognise that important projects like the Manchester Olympic bid may well be eligible for applications to the Sports Council lottery committee, but it certainly will not be up to any Minister or the Millenium Commission to decide whether that project be in receipt of those sums.

The Government new clauses were promised in Committee, and they will ensure that all the distributing bodies will produce accounts and reports on the use of lottery funds separate from their other reports and accounts. The reports dealing with lottery funds will be made available to Parliament. The Government amendments are consequential upon the provisions in new clauses 7 and 8. The Millenium Commission is not covered by those new clauses. Although the Secretary of State will be a member of the Commission—and he may be its chairman—its report and accounts will be submitted directly to Parliament under clauses 38 and 39 and not to the Secretary of State. The report of the Charities Board will be covered by new clause 7, and consequential upon that clause will be the removal of clause 34.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: The Opposition Members who referred to the commission should note clause 39(3) states:

"Copies of the statement shall be sent to the Comptroller and Auditor General".

A lot of people will keep a beady eye on that fund, so I cannot understand why Opposition Members should be so concerned.

Mr. Key: Neither can I. My hon. Friend is right to point that out.

The Charities Board will receive funds from the Secretary of State at first to cover start-up costs. Its accounts should include the use of that money, and for that reason clause 35 remains.

Government amendments Nos. 70 and 71 ensure that the definition of "financial year" covers anybody named under clause 21, whether now or in the future. Amendment No. 26, tabled by the Opposition, is intended to achieve the same end as the new clauses. I believe—and I hope that I have convinced the House—that that amendment is not therefore necessary.

Mr. Pendry: May I say to the Minister that I was surprised that he agreed——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman requires the leave of the House to speak again.

Mr. Pendry: I understand. With the leave of the House I shall reply to the debate.

I was surprised that the Minister agreed with the right hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton), because his speech reminded me of what my economics tutor used to say to me: "Answer the question I asked, not the one you wish I had asked." I never made the speech to which he has referred. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) has answered all the points that the right hon. Gentleman raised, so I will not go over them.

The right hon. Member for Mid-Sussex said that the lottery had nothing to do with taxation, but he should talk to the charities, the Sports Council and the Arts Council about the 12 per cent. tax yield that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has placed upon the lottery. It certainly is about taxation as far as they are concerned.

I do not want to push our amendment to a Division. I think that the Minister, in a more reflective mood—and certainly those in another place—might pick up the points I have made more intelligently than some Conservatives have today.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 8

ACCOUNTS OF DISTRIBUTING BODIES OTHER THAN CHARITIES BOARD AND MILLENNIUM COMMISSION

'.-(1) A body shall keep proper accounts in respect of any money paid to it under section 22 and proper records in relation to the accounts.

(2) A body shall prepare a statement of accounts in respect of each financial year in which it was paid any money under section 22 or distributed or applied any money under section 23.

(3) The statement shall comply with any directions that may be given by the Secretary of State as to the information to be contained in such a statement, the manner in which such information is to be presented or the methods and principles according to which such a statement is to be prepared.

(4) Copies of the statement shall be sent to the Secretary of State and the Comptroller and Auditor General within such period after the end of the financial year to which the statement relates as the Secretary of State may direct.

(5) The Comptroller and Auditor General shall examine, certify and report on the statement and shall lay copies of the statement and of his report before Parliament.

(6) The Secretary of State shall not give a direction under this section without the Treasury's approval.

(7) This section does not apply to the National Lottery Charities Board or to the Millennium Commission.'.—[Mr. Brooke.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time and added to the Bill.

New clause 11

PRIVATE LOTTERIES

'. For section 4(1) of the 1976 Act (private lotteries) there shall be substituted—

"(1) In this Act "private lottery" means a lottery in Great Britain which is promoted—

(a) for members of one society established and conducted for purposes not connected with gaming, betting or lotteries;

(b) for persons all of whom work on the same premises; or

(c) for persons all of whom reside on the same premises, and which satisfies the conditions in subsections (1A) and (1B) below.

(1A) The lottery must be promoted by persons each of whom—

(a) is one of the persons for whom the lottery is promoted; and

(b) in the case of a lottery promoted for the members of a society, is authorised in writing by the governing body of the society to promote the lottery.

(1B) The sale of tickets or chances in the lottery must be confined—

(a) to the persons for whom the lottery is promoted; and
(b) in the case of a lottery promoted for the members of a society, to any other persons on the society's premises."'.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Peter Lloyd): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss also Government amendment No. 192.

Mr. Lloyd: In Committee, the hon. Member for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mrs. Kennedy) argued persuasively that where a society was holding a private lottery on its own premises any guests present should be allowed to buy tickets in the same way as they can join in a game of bingo or use gaming machines. I agreed to introduce Government amendments to achieve that, and this is what new clause 11 and amendment No. 192 do.

4.15 pm

Mr. Pendry: I agree with the Minister that my hon. Friend the Member for Broadgreen was very persuasive in Committee. She made sure that we all recognised the nonsense of the law as it stood and that in this particular area many of us flout the law ourselves almost every week of the year in the clubs that we frequent—Labour clubs in our case, of course. So we certainly accept the Minister's response in meeting the particular point that my hon. Friend made.

Mrs. Jane Kennedy (Liverpool, Broadgreen): I thank the Minister and my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) for the courteous way in which they have referred to the contribution that I made on this point. I thank the Minister also for listening to the arguments that were put and for accepting and incorporating them in the Bill. On behalf of the 6 million members of the Club and Institute Union and 10 million members of private clubs, some of whom I see here today, I wish to say thank you.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 12

FREQUENCY OF LOTTERIES

'. For section 10 of the 1976 Act there shall be substituted —

"Frequency of lotteries.

10.—(1) The Secretary of State may by order prescribe—
(a) the maximum number of lotteries that a society or local authority may promote under section 5 or 6 above in any period of twelve months; and
(b) the minimum number of days that must elapse between the dates of any two lotteries promoted under section 5 or 6 above on behalf of the same society or by the same local authority.

(2) An order under subsection (1) above may make different provision for different cases or circumstances."'.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss also the following: Government amendment No. 166.

Amendment No. 18, in clause 45, page 17, line 39, at end insert

'; but nothing in this section shall apply to a registered charity or non-profit making organisation in respect of any lottery or lotteries which have been in operation for more than one year before the passing of this Act.'.

Government amendment No. 190.

Mr. Lloyd: This new clause removes existing controls on the number and frequency of society and local authority lotteries. It responds to the many representations that I have received, as have, no doubt, many other hon. Members on both sides of the House, from football clubs and others about the effect of a provision in schedule 7 to the Bill designed to stop the practice of multiple registration. This arises where an organisation creates two or more separate societies, commonly operating from the same premises and with the same personnel, in order to circumvent the monetary limits on turnover or, once the Bill comes into force, to escape from Gaming Board registration.

I realise that, in order to maximise turnover, many football clubs and other organisations have been running 70 or 80 or more different lotteries a year. As the law stands, a society may only promote 52 lotteries in a 12-month period—that is, one a week. Organisations evade this restriction by registering perhaps three different societies—one to run a weekly draw lottery, another to run a monthly scratch card lottery, and a third, say, to run a large Christmas draw.

It is our aim, in the interests of fairer and more honest and effective regulation, to ensure that organisations register only the one society, but we do not want them to lose income as a result of limiting them to 52 lotteries a year. So, provided an organisation is operating within the £5 million new annual limit laid down in clause 46 of the Bill, I see no reason why it should be subject to an arbitrary limit on the number of lotteries that it may promote. If a football club decides that promoting 70 lotteries a year will maximise its income from this source, then so be it. That is a decision which ought sensibly to be left to the promoters of society and local authority lotteries. The new clause therefore removes from the face of the 1976 Act the restrictions on both the number and frequency of such lotteries.

I do not expect that this relaxation in the law will cause any regulatory problems, but the new clause contains an order-making power which will enable the Home Secretary to reimpose limits on either the number or frequency of lotteries, should the need arise. We will want to keep a close watch on the operation of the 1976 Act, as amended by part III of this Bill, but we would hope not to have to reintroduce controls of that kind. Amendments Nos. 166 and 190 are consequential on new clause 12.

Mr. Renton: Can my hon. Friend tell the House under what circumstances he thinks the need to reintroduce controls might arise?

Mr. Lloyd: I do not anticipate any problems, but if, say, societies were running lotteries so similar to each other at precisely the same time that it was impossible to distinguish whether the monetary ceilings were being breached, we might consider some further regulation to enable us to distinguish between them—but I see no reason why we should have to do this. Nevertheless, the opportunity exists to do so by regulations brought back to the House.

[Mr. Lloyd]

I hope that the hon. Members for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) and for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) will agree that amendment No. 18 is now unnecessary. Its underlying purpose—to relax restrictions on the number of lotteries that may be promoted by a society in any year—is even more completely achieved by the Government new clause, which I commend to the House.

Mr. Stanley Orme (Salford, East): I welcome the Government's move on this issue. At stake is the survival of hundreds of small cricket, football, rugby union and rugby league clubs. We welcome the removal of the barrier that would have meant that they could not run more than one lottery or scratch card competition at a time—perhaps at the same time as raffles on the Derby or Grand National.

I speak as the honorary president of the Lotteries Council, which, like the organisations I have mentioned, has welcomed the Minister's move.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): I, too, welcome what the Minister has said. He has moved a long way since our debates in Committee and has listened to the protestations of the smaller clubs, based everywhere from Rochdale to Tranmere. Members of the Committee received representations from places that they did not even know existed. The right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) was largely responsible for that. He managed to generate one of the largest write-in campaigns that we have ever experienced——

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): The hon. Gentleman knows all about write-in campaigns. He was responsible for 3,500 representations himself.

Mr. Alton: I am always happy to oblige. This has been a good example of the Government being responsive to positive and instructive arguments and in that spirit I am happy not to press amendment No. 18.

Mr. Corbett: The Minister will know of the great concern expressed by the smaller lotteries, not least those run by supporters clubs, when the Standing Committee was considering the Bill. He will forgive me if I slip on a black arm band when I talk about supporters of Aston Villa, Birmingham City and Warwickshire county cricket club. Their great fear was that the introduction of the national lottery and of the lotteries of which it consists might damage their vital fund-raising activities on behalf of the clubs in which they take an interest. Probably the Premier division clubs are in a stronger position to face up to the competition from the national lottery—only time will tell.

The supporters clubs of small teams representing all sports were extremely apprehensive. We appreciate the way in which the Minister has responded to arguments in Committee and to the representations organised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme). I do not say that through gritted teeth, because it is important in Bills of this kind, dealing with matters that are not party political, to do our best to respond to what people outside with proper concerns say to us.

The Minister's proposal in the context of the Home Office is positively revolutionary, because it is a long time since the Home Office was prepared to let go of a beloved regulation. That applies especially to the grey areas in the Home Office. The Minister reminded the House of the remaining caution, and when his right hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton) asked him about that, the Minister said, "We are not quite sure about whether to do this but in case we do, we want to have a fall back." It is difficult to envisage circumstances in which the proviso may be needed, but on balance the caution is probably sensible. I again thank the Minister. We are delighted to support him.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 2

REGULATIONS FOR LOTTERIES

'.-(1) Section 12 of the Lotteries and Amusements Act 1976 (regulations) shall be amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (2), at the beginning there shall be inserted "subject to subsection (3A) below".

(3) In subsection (3), after "above", there shall be inserted "but subject to subsection (3A) below".

(4) After subsection (3) there shall be inserted:

"(3A) Regulations under this section shall not prohibit the sale of a ticket or chance in any bingo club premises, within the meaning of Part II of the Gaming Act 1968."

(5) In consequence of the preceding provisions of this section, so much of regulation 6 of the Lotteries Regulations 1977 (which prohibits the sale of tickets and chances in certain premises) as prohibits such sales in bingo club premises (within the meaning of the said Part II) shall cease to have effect.'.—[Mr. Fry.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

In Committee the Minister gave some guidance about where national lottery tickets would be sold. The new clause seeks to allow the sale of local authority lottery tickets and other lottery tickets in bingo clubs. The Minister outlined the principle that national lottery tickets will not be sold in the traditional markets for charity lotteries, such as public houses, the intention being that there should be no damage to the proceeds of such local lotteries which perform many good works.

The new clause is intended to explore the issue in relation to bingo clubs which are currently prevented from selling local charity lottery tickets. In that respect I declare my interest because I am the parliamentary consultant to the Bingo Association of Great Britain, which represents about 740 licensed bingo clubs throughout the country. The industry is keen to compete with and where possible participate in the national lottery. However, the White Paper that preceded the Bill said that bingo clubs would not be allowed to sell national lottery tickets, and the Minister confirmed that in the earlier debates on the Bill.

It seems rather strange that people who have joined a club to have a modest flutter should not be allowed to buy a national lottery ticket there. The Government seem to have moved a little way from the policy of non-stimulation of any form of gaming merely by promoting the Bill. My suggestion will not propel us all towards a hectic Sodom and Gomorrah in which the country gambles all its spare money.

There has already been much talk about the so-called level playing field for the various forms of gambling. Betting office hours in England and Scotland have been extended because of the damage that might be caused as a result of people gambling on a wider basis. The exact way in which the national lottery will affect other forms of gambling is not yet clear, although there is great concern that they will be harmed. It is not necessarily good that other forms of gambling, and especially soft gambling, should be damaged too much.

Many hon. Members who visit their local bingo clubs know that they provide a valuable social activity as well as the opportunity of a flutter. Many such clubs are communities in themselves because people go there to meet friends as much as to play bingo. I remind the House that bingo is the safest and most acceptable form of commercial evening venue for single ladies who perhaps would not venture into any other sort of gambling establishment.

The industry has shown considerable community spirit and has a remarkable record of fund raising for charity. For example, over the past five years, the Bingo Association's annual charity week has raised £1·5 million. In 1987, it raised £200,000 for the Women's National Cancer Control Campaign. The following year, it was £220,000 for the British Heart Foundation, which used the money to buy 50 defibrillators to resuscitate heart attack victims on the way to hospital. In 1989, it raised £404,000 for Guide Dogs for the Blind—the largest ever single donation. The Royal National Lifeboat Institute received £245,000 in 1990, which paid for the lifeboat Bingo Lifeline. In 1991, £295,000 was donated to Marie Curie Cancer Care and last year £271,000 was raised for the Spinal Injuries Association.

4.30 pm

All that is on top of the money raised locally by individual clubs. This year, the charity work will not be for a national charity but co-ordinated at local level, so that players can choose charities in their area. Raising such large amounts of money requires imagination and hard work. If bingo clubs were allowed to run their own lotteries for charity, in the same way as other organisations do, it would add another feature to the fund-raising efforts.

I know that gaming premises are not allowed to run lotteries because there is a distinction between commercial and charitable activities. As such lotteries would be for charity—that is the main drift of the new clause—that should not present any problems. If the drafting of my new clause is not acceptable, I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be prepared to accept the spirit of the new clause and instil it into a suitable form of words at a later stage, perhaps in the other place.

Mr. Corbett: I spent a little time last Saturday afternoon in the Cascade bingo club in Barnabas road in Erdington, in my constituency, as the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) will know. There was a crowd of perhaps 300 people, paying devoted attention to the caller. They were mainly elderly and clearly out to enjoy themselves in groups of friends, to make use of the excellent refreshment and bar facilities at a cost of no more than £3, to spend a pleasant afternoon and perhaps—I think that it comes in this order—to win a few bob on the bingo. The nearest there was to trouble was when, inadvertently, I raised my voice to ask a question of Mr. John Wiley, the Cascade managing director, as the numbers were being called. That provoked a storm of sh's from those listening. The atmosphere, as anyone who has visited a bingo club will know, was happy and relaxed. The players were enjoying themselves. Hundreds do that every week in that club and countless thousands in other clubs.

In essence, if I have understood this right, bingo is little different from the national lottery, in that players have to win by having a ticket, or a chance, which bears a predetermined set of numbers. What is little known is that the club, like many others—the hon. Member for Wellingborough referred to that—gives between £5,000 and £6,000 a year to local charities and joins the other clubs, in the Bingo Association of Great Britain, in raising money for charities on a national basis.

The new clause would enable club members to buy lottery tickets for charitable causes, including for local charities. By no flight of fantasy could anybody suggest that the buying and selling of such local charity tickets would get in the way of the national lottery. They are very different animals. While the impact of the national lottery on the whole range of charity lotteries is unknown, if the lottery is to succeed it must attract a totally different audience from that which likes supporting local charities because the bulk of the money goes to the charity named on the ticket—bar administrative costs and prize money. It will not be divvied up like the national lottery. Participants will see the name of a local charity of which they approve and want to support and buying a ticket for 20p, 30p or 50p will be a way of donating to that cause—and there is the bonus that one may win whatever prize money is offered.

I hope that the Minister accepts that that is a very different market from the national lottery. The atmosphere in which bingo is played, which I sought to describe, is peaceful and restful. I asked Mr. Wiley when was the last time that there was any serious trouble. He told me that after running the place for two years after a management buy-out, he could not remember there ever being any trouble. The Cascade is not a converted cinema, but was purpose-built for bingo and its facilities are absolutely first class. There is no menace about the place. If there were, it would not attract the clientele that it does. They are genteel folk having innocent fun which I am sure they would not regard as gambling.

A neighbour of mine, who is a man of mature years, although he acts 20 years younger, goes to bingo with his relatives and friends—in his case I believe that they are the same—at least twice a week. It is rare for him on at least one of those visits not to come away with a few extra bob in his pocket. He goes there purely for pleasure and for social reasons—not for the money, although he welcomes his winnings.

I do not believe that anything will be lost by allowing bingo clubs to sell tickets in aid of local charities and, if they want, to run their own lotteries in aid of local charities if others are not doing so. That would in no way detract from the ambitions of the national lottery.

As the hon. Member for Wellingborough said, the Minister may not be able for whatever reason to accept the amendment's wording, but I hope that he will reconsider between now and the Bill going to another place. There is nothing to lose and no gambling involved in allowing bingo clubs and their members to do as we ask.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) made a fair case for allowing bingo clubs to sell tickets in society or local lotteries. He reminded the House that I intimated in Committee that there may be scope for relaxing some restrictions on licensed bingo clubs, and I include the prohibition on the sale of lottery tickets among the controls that might sensibly be re-examined.

The restriction on the sale of society and local lottery tickets in bingo clubs is contained in regulation 6 of the Lotteries Regulations 1977, which also prohibits the sale of such tickets in other gambling premises—casinos, amusement arcades and betting offices. A number of amendments will already have to be made to the regulations as a consequence of the changes made to the Lotteries and Amusements Act 1976 by part III of the Bill.

In the circumstances, it would be sensible to undertake a complete review of the 1977 regulations. I am sympathetic with my hon. Friend's views and, like the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett), I do not think that a concession in this respect would necessarily lead to the end of civilisation as we know it. I agree with him that most bingo clubs are conducted in exactly the same way as that which he visited.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: When my hon. Friend conducts the complete review of the regulations, will he bear in mind the importance of extending the work of, for example, sub-post offices and their ability to sell lottery tickets? The commission that they could earn would be a valuable new source of income for them.

Mr. Lloyd: I see no particular reason why they should not sell local lottery tickets, or national lottery tickets, but there may be a Post Office regulation that prevents them from doing so. In that case, I shall reflect upon my hon. Friend's question and will invite my Department of Trade and Industry colleagues also to do so.

Mr. Orme: I listened carefully to what the Minister said, and also to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett). There is, however, concern that some people cannot really afford to play bingo. To introduce yet another form of gambling will not, I believe, be helpful. I thought that we dealt with the issue, to some extent, in Committee by excluding the sale of lottery tickets in specific areas—in betting shops, and so on. The Minster said, rightly, that he will look into the issue again. I ask him to remember that there is another side to the argument.

Mr. Lloyd: The right hon. Gentleman is right. There is, alas, always at least one other side to an argument. That undoubtedly applies here. I have betrayed my own sentiment—that one side of the argument has perhaps more to be said for it than the other. I also said, though, as I said in Committee, that the Bill is not the place to make these changes. The rules exist in regulations. Similar rules apply to other establishments. We are having to make some changes. It is sensible to look at these matters together instead of having separate Home Office and other Government Department reviews. We shall want to hear from other groups before we reach a decision.

I ought to stress that the Home Secretary is obliged to consult the Gaming Board and local authority associations before making fresh regulations. He will certainly want to do that in this case. However, we shall not come to a decision, whatever our personal views may be, without those who have an interest in the question being able to say what they think of it. We may then come back with proposals to amend the regulations.

If the regulations are amended, it will be up to the societies running the lotteries to decide whether they wish to sell their tickets in bingo clubs to decide whether they want to take them. On the understanding that the Government will give favourable consideration—although that falls short of saying what the conclusion will be—to my hon. Friend's proposal, I hope that he will withdraw new clause 2.

Mr. Fry: I thank the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) for his support. I am delighted that he had such a happy visit to his local bingo club. If he went more often, perhaps he, too, would be fortunate.

May I point out to the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) that the purpose of the new clause is to enable a greater number of British people to do what they already do so well, which is voluntarily to support charities. An enormous number of local charities would undoubtedly benefit from this change. No pressure would, I believe, be put upon anybody to spend more than he could possibly afford. It just means that, as part of a pleasant afternoon or evening out, people would have the chance of winning something and doing a bit of good at the same time. I see nothing wrong with that.

I have, however, listened carefully to the Minister. I understand what he said about reassessment of the regulations. I am delighted to hear that this subject will be part of the reassessment. In view of his help and co-operation on that point, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 4

SITING OF THE NATIONAL LOTTERY HEADQUARTERS

'.—It shall be a condition of the licence granted to the body corporate to administer the National Lottery that its headquarters shall be established in an area which can demonstrate that it has suffered or will suffer job losses directly attributable to the establishment of the Lottery that it shall remain there for the period of the licence; and that a majority of the full and part-time staff employed shall live within the travel-to-work area in which the office is established.'.—[Mr. Alton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Alton: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Hon. Members will recall that when we debated the private Member's Bill that was introduced by the hon. Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence) for a national lottery, the chief concern of many hon. Members with constituencies in Liverpool, Glasgow, Cardiff and London was about the impact that such a measure would have on the existing football pools industry. Given that this issue was debated strongly on Second Reading and that hon. Members with Liverpool constituencies in particular repeatedly voiced their concern about the impact on employees of football pool companies, especially Littlewoods and Vernons on Merseyside, but also Zetters in London, the House will not be surprised that we are returning once more to this issue.

4.45 pm

It would be wrong for the House not to understand the depth of feeling of those who represent areas in which there is already high unemployment. Instead of people saying, "You're simply crying wolf," they should at least listen to what the football pools companies have said. I shall not again burden the House for long with the arguments, but I remind hon. Members of what each of the companies has said. In a letter to The Times, Mr. Paul Zetter said:

"the choice is stark: football pools or a national lottery. You will readily understand why I oppose a national lottery."

Malcolm Hughes, the managing director of Vernons, said:

"It is not possible to find an example anywhere in the world of a National Lottery and a Pools industry thriving side by side."

Malcolm Davidson, the managing director of Littlewoods, quoted from a letter to Littlewoods from Coopers and Lybrand Deloitte which said:

"A UK national lottery would effectively kill off the football pools within a period of weeks . . . A successful national lottery would act as a substitute for the football pools . . . as a result of this the level of employment within the industry will be dramatically reduced."

The House will not be surprised to hear that hon. Members who represent people employed in the football pools industry are pressing the case that, should it be proved that there has been a loss of jobs in areas where people are employed in the football pools industry, one of those areas should be chosen as the place where the headquarters of the new national lottery is set up.

The football pool companies believe that 6,000 jobs could ultimately be at stake as a direct result of the establishment of the national lottery. At a time of high unemployment in the country generally, most of us would be cautious about doing anything that might endanger existing jobs. We should not gamble with people's livelihoods.

In addition to the 6,000 people whose jobs may be at stake, there are some 70,000 football pools collectors who rely on the small amounts of money that they make to supplement their income—or their benefits, if they are unemployed. A very small number of jobs will be created by the national lottery. In Germany, 180 people run the whole of the national lottery scheme. We are not, therefore, talking about substitute jobs that would make up for all the jobs that may be lost as a result of introducing the national lottery.

The Minister will say that new jobs may be created in a number of other industries, but those industries may not be in areas where jobs have been lost as a direct consequence of the establishment of the national lottery. I draw the attention of the House to the letter which Mr. John Griffith, the editor of the Liverpool Echo, sent to the Prime Minister. He wrote:

"I am writing to you on behalf of almost one million readers of the Liverpool Echo to seek a pledge that Liverpool can be the first winner of the proposed National Lottery.

I believe Liverpool is the right place to base this exciting new venture, and that an early decision to choose Liverpool would prove a great boost to the image and morale of the city.

As you will know, the National Lottery plan has prompted real fears about its impact on the thousands of pools jobs on Merseyside.

But the region is often encouraged to be positive, and I am convinced that we would prove the perfect base for a project that would clearly command national attention.

We have a proven track record as the football pools capital of the country. We have demonstrated that such competitions can be run from Liverpool efficiently and successfully. We have all the infrastructure to make a Liverpool-based National Lottery a great success."

That is right. The expertise that Vernons and Littlewoods have developed over the years shows that the city has precisely the experience required to administer a national lottery. What better location could there be than Liverpool, which has earned so much respect for having administered the football pools so well and efficiently for many years?

The Government would be well advised to recognise the fears of communities such as mine. They should understand the worry that it is a matter not merely of pin money but of livelihoods. Very often, it is women who are employed in these jobs. More than 70,000 people are unemployed in the Liverpool area, so hon. Members representing Merseyside are not raising a trivial issue. If we are proved wrong, no one will be happier than those hon. Members.

I hope that the Secretary of State and the Minister will be able to tell the House a year from now that no jobs were lost in the football pools and that the two schemes were able to co-exist. No one would be happier than I if that should prove to be the case but, if it is not, the Secretary of State and the Minister should at least consider ways in which the communities that suffer as a direct result of the introduction of a national lottery might be helped. Surely that is elementary justice.

Expertise and experience in running such projects should be rewarded. Baroness Thatcher—dare one mention her name to Conservative Members these days?—opened Vernons' offices in Liverpool two or three years ago. I vividly remember her paying tribute to the efficiency and determination of that company. It must be recognised that our community has a special expertise, which is why we have tabled new clause 4.

I hope that the new clause will commend itself to the Minister, if only as a marker. If he cannot accept it, perhaps he will accept that the lottery should be established, not in an area with relatively low unemployment, but somewhere which has a reputation for running football pools, which has the necessary expertise and experience and which could prove that it has suffered as a direct consequence of the establishment of a national lottery.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): I am sure that you will recollect, Madam Deputy Speaker, that the pools companies' worry about a national lottery was a thread which ran through our Second Reading debate and our early deliberations in Committee and recurred later when we discussed the exact topic.

It is right and proper that the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) should express the worries of his constituents and others on Merseyside, but I cannot accept the principle of including in the Bill such a specific tying of hands of the promoter by saying that the whole lottery should be run from Liverpool or, indeed, Scotland or south Wales where the pools companies also have bases.

We could all outline worries in our constituencies about jobs that have been lost. Indeed, in Kingston upon Thames in my area a large British aerospace factory has closed with the loss of several thousand jobs. The hon. Gentleman's Liberal colleagues on Kingston upon Thames council would be proud of me if I said that I should like the national lottery headquarters to be established in Kingston upon Thames, as would my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in whose constituency that factory was located. However, I am not saying that, because the promoters of the lottery should be able to site their headquarters where they think fit and where they think it will be run most efficiently. Of course, at this stage, we do not know who the promoters will be.

[Mr. Richard Tracey]

In early correspondence, the Pools Promoters Association said that it did not like the idea of a lottery but that, if the Government and the House in due course accepted the idea, it might be interested in promoting it. Perhaps the pools companies will very soon have the chance to make their case, and that would be one way to bring the whole operation to Merseyside. If the pools companies are not successful, the eventual lottery promoters must have the freedom to site their operation where they wish.

I repeat what I said on Second Reading and probably also in Committee: I do not believe that the pools companies will suffer from the introduction of a national lottery. I have known for a long time that the pools companies are highly innovative and efficient and dedicated to their enterprise. They will do what is necessary to keep the pools running. Italy has a similar ethos of football fanaticism and the pools and a lottery run happily alongside each other there. I do not accept that the pools companies will suffer as the hon. Member for Mossley Hill and others have suggested, so I cannot support the new clause.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): I must take issue with the hon. Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey). Without giving one shred of empirical evidence to support his case, he asserted that the pools companies and, by implication, jobs, will not suffer as a result of the introduction of the national lottery. All of the empirical evidence from various studies carried out by reputable academic bodies and others suggests that jobs will be lost if a lottery is introduced. The number of jobs lost depends on how the lottery scheme will work but estimates for Merseyside alone range from 3,500, 4,000, 5,000 and up to 6,000. That evidence is available to hon. Members if only they cared to read it.

Against that background, hon. Members representing Liverpool constituencies and constituencies across Merseyside—people sometimes cross local government boundaries to find work—believe that we have a very strong case. In Committee, those of us worried about jobs in the pools industry believe that improvements were made to the Bill which will probably reduce the job losses contingent on the introduction of a national lottery.

I made a quick calculation this afternoon and I suspect that the number of jobs lost is likely to be between 1,000 and 1,500 rather than the 4,000, 5,000 or 6,000 mentioned earlier. However, we are still talking about a considerable number. There is no logical reason why, if Merseyside is to suffer job losses, we cannot ask the House to specify in the Bill that the lottery headquarters should be sited in Liverpool.

I support the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) in one further contention. Many right hon. and hon. Members feel that the job is the sort of job that anybody anywhere in the country could do without too much difficulty. However, quite complex technology is involved in the pools industry; for example, familiarity is required with working with different types of papers. It is quite a skilful sphere of work. From that point of view, Merseyside is suitable, in that many—although I hope not too many—people who have lost their jobs as a result of the national lottery may be available. That makes it an attractive site. If I may put in a particular plea, I can tell the House that if Knowsley were considered as a possible site, we could find suitable premises at a reasonable rent, or even for purchase.

To return to our more serious argument, I agree that if gambling in this country were conducted in an entirely free market, it would be unfair to make a specification such as that in the new clause, which my Merseyside colleagues and I support. It would be unfair to say that the national lottery should be located on Merseyside or in another area that may suffer. However, the market is not totally free. Legislation has had to be introduced to enable the national lottery to be established. Rightly, gambling is a controlled activity. The market is not free, so if it is not unreasonable to specify limitations on gambling I do not see why it should be considered unreasonable to say which area should gain in terms of jobs and of the economic activity that will be generated.

For those reasons, I hope that the Government and other hon. Members will accept that we are not whingeing or moaning and that we feel that there is a genuine case to be made. I hope that if the measure is defective in some way, at least the spirit of our argument will be accepted and taken up, because we feel that we have a powerful case.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): I give my qualified support to new clause 4. It is entirely acceptable that the headquarters of the national lottery should be in an area of high unemployment; that is a laudable objective. My concern, and the reason why I said that my support was qualified, centres on the hypothesis on which the new clause is based—that job losses will be suffered as a result of the introduction of the national lottery.

Certainly the headquarters of the national lottery should be in an area of high unemployment but, rather accepting the hypothesis on which the new clause is based, may I suggest Torbay as a suitable site? As the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) rightly pointed out, complex technology will be involved and a high degree of sophistication will be needed in the personnel who will operate the equipment. However, a minor flaw in the hon. Gentleman's argument is that it is based on the hypothesis that there will be job losses in the pools industry. It would be unreasonable for the Government to move the headquarters of the national lottery to somewhere where the job losses have not yet taken place.

In Torbay we can offer immediate office accommodation and highly qualified personnel. Of course, Torbay also enjoys beaches, an advantage which Knowsley does not enjoy, although it has many other advantages. Torbay would certainly be an ideal location.

Mr. George Howarth rose——

Mr. Allason: I am making a serious point, but I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Howarth: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his courtesy in giving way to me and for the courtesy with which he has introduced his partisan argument about his constituency. Like the hon. Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey), he rejects what he calls the hypothesis that there will be job losses, but he has yet to produce a shred of empirical evidence to counter our argument.

Mr. Allason: That is not how the Government can proceed. The Government cannot move the national lottery headquarters in anticipation of job losses. Let us suppose that, in the best of all worlds, there were no job losses and that people were attracted to the pools instead, so that more personnel had to be taken on by the establishments in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. The hon. Gentleman would then be at something of a disadvantage, having tempted the national lottery headquarters to move to his constituency, because there might not be enough qualified people there to fill the job vacancies created. I am trying to free the Government from such a dilemma. In Torbay, the accommodation is immediately available.

The hon. Member for Knowsley, North made an important point when he said that the national lottery headquarters could be based anywhere. In connection with the next steps agencies initiative taken by the Government, I had hoped that the chief executives of the new agencies intended to move their expensive headquarters buildings from the centre of London and the west end out into the provinces where there is a real need for jobs and where qualified personnel and office space are available. Furthermore, there is a better way of life in the provinces than in central London.

Alas, a rather worrying example has already been set by some of the next steps agencies. For example, instead of moving from near Heathrow to a site further afield and taking up existing accommodation, air traffic control has moved to what is arguably the most expensive green field site in leafy Hampshire. That seems to undermine the object of the next steps initiative.

I urge the new administration of the national lottery seriously to consider placing the new headquarters establishment somewhere in the provinces that can demonstrate high unemployment. After all, as the hon. Member for Knowsley, North said, modern technology makes it irrelevant where the headquarters is sited. With fibre-optic cables and so on, the organisation does not have to be in the centre of London.

I regret that my previous plea for resiting major national establishments—to relocate MI5 from the west end to Torquay—was overlooked. I do not know why my idea was overlooked; it seems a crying shame that MI5 is to be relocated instead in Thames house, just down the road from the House. That is an extremely expensive location—although I discover that the enterprise is only 70 per cent. over budget.

I could give pretty firm undertakings about the kind of accommodation and the low costs that we could offer the staff of the national lottery if they were to consider moving to Torbay. Bearing in mind some of the replies to Environment questions this afternoon, I can give several other guarantees, including clean beaches and clean bathing waters.

Mr. Ashton: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, Central and Royton (Mr. Davies) and I went to the headquarters of the national lotteries in New York and in Washington and found that they are about as big as the Tea Room? They employ about 50 people. If the hon. Gentleman is looking for people to go to Torquay there are thousands of gipsies in the north of England and gipsy sites are badly needed. I am sure that the gipsies would be glad to go to Torquay and enjoy all the benefits of the beaches. Would the hon. Gentleman like to offer them a chance of accommodation?

Mr. Allason: We are prepared to accommodate almost everybody, but the trouble with Torquay is that it does not have an awful lot of green spaces for gipsies to park their caravans on. We should be perfectly willing to consider any other suggestion, and we should certainly like to point out that we have a great deal of empty office accommodation in Torquay, and that we are open to offers. I offer here and now to any of the next steps agencies' chief executives who may be in the Strangers Gallery that they will have a warm welcome in Torquay; indeed, we have better weather than almost anywhere else in the country.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not continue with this advertisement because it seems to be going very wide of the new clause.

Mr. Allason: I am grateful for your indulgence, Madam Deputy Speaker. I assure you that you will receive a very warm welcome in Torbay if you visit us.

Mrs. Jane Kennedy: The hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Allason) is absolutely right. The headquarters of the national lottery can be sited anywhere in the country—[HON. MEMBERS: "Or the world."]—or indeed, anywhere in the world. Opposition Members are pleading with the Government to take on board the case made in Committee and again today: that, whatever they think should happen in an ideal world, we have to live in the real world. Those of us who represent seats in Liverpool, Cardiff and Glasgow know without any shadow of a doubt that although we do not know how many jobs will go, there will be job losses.

The hon. Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) said that he was sure that the pools companies were innovative enough to develop ways in which they would be able to compete with the national lottery and survive. That may or may not be the case. On behalf of the workers of those companies—I know that different interests are involved in the matter—I make the point that the number of workers in the pools industry will be reduced as a result of that competition. Anyone who studies the case carefully will conclude that that is bound to happen.

Mr. Nigel Evans: We are talking about a small number of jobs. Does the hon. Lady agree that it is far better for every assistance to be given to the promoter to ensure that the national lottery is a success and that as much money as possible is raised to go into the good causes? Does she agree that the extra jobs created, many of which will come into the north-west in any event, will be far better than just dictating that the national lottery headquarters should go to the north-west? It may not be as successful as it would otherwise have been.

Mrs. Kennedy: The hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) advanced a useful and interesting argument about competition in Committee. He said that a healthy and competitive pools industry would be good for the national lottery, as would the small lottery and the other lotteries that we talked about today. However, there is no doubt that we are speculating about how successful the national lottery will be. We argue that the new clause represents one way in which the Government can guarantee a return to the areas that we know will lose out. People in Liverpool, Glasgow and Cardiff will lose their jobs.

If you will permit, Madam Deputy Speaker, the best way in which I can illustrate my point is to read to the House a poem that I received today from a pools worker. It is a cry from the heart and a plea to the House to reject the Bill entirely. It is very relevant to our debate because it illustrates better than I can the feelings of pools workers. The lady has entitled her poem, "My job! My job! My Kingdom for my Job." She says:

"Lottery technology, my job is insecure,
Those above won't listen as my job goes out the door.
For eighteen years I've given it, the best that I can give.
Without my job and wages, however will I live?
So, the lottery will create jobs, well, bravo! That's just fine.
But what about the redundant souls?
Remember one of them is mine!
It will take a fraction of the work force to run the lottery
And a fraction of the work force too, with today's technology.
So what happens to the excess? They're not needed any more,
They end up just statistics and become a newstime bore.
Its time for us to stand and fight, if fighting is what it takes.
So please, come on, get off your butts
And squash it for our sakes."

I trust, Madam Deputy Speaker, that "butts" is parliamentary language. It fitted in with the rhyme.

I urge the Minister when he considers the arguments put today to take seriously the spirit in which they are made. I believe that the Government have accepted in part the case made to allow to a certain extent for unfair competition between the lottery and the pools. In doing so, they have recognised that there will be an impact on employment in the industry. I hope that the Minister will bear that in mind when he replies.

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): I congratulate the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) on moving new clause 4 and on giving us the opportunity to debate the siting of the headquarters for the national lottery. I apologise for missing his opening remarks. Proceedings moved on somewhat more quickly than I had expected.

I understand entirely why Liverpool Members have made a plea for the siting of the headquarters there. For me, the obvious siting for the national headquarters in Basildon. I say that because my constituency is of national and international note. Over the past two or three years, Opposition Members have rightly worried themselves about the level of unemployment in my constituency.

5.15 pm

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): Will the hon. Gentleman tell us the name of his constituency again?

Mr. Amess: In case the hon. Gentleman did not hear, it is the constituency of Basildon.

Opposition Members have worried about the level of unemployment in my constituency. There is no doubt that the impact of the economic slump which we have suffered over the past three years has been especially severe in the south-east.

Mr. Allason: And in the south-west.

Mr. Amess: And in the south-west, as my hon. Friend reminds me. We have lost many jobs in the construction sector and in service industries. People have been made redundant on a Friday and they have received no redundancy payments. In my constituency of Basildon, unemployment is roughly at the level it was when I won the seat 10 years ago and it is of great concern locally.

We want the national lottery to be the best lottery in the world. One way in which to ensure that is to make certain that it is placed in the town that is the most famous in the country. That town is Basildon. We have excellent communications along the A127 and A13. We are very near the channel tunnel. We enjoy excellent communications to Heathrow airport and to Stansted airport. Not only that, but the weather is quite clement.

We have the enthusiastic support of Essex county council. I believe that the hon. Member for Mossley Hill originated in Brentwood in Essex. Essex county council supports the bid to have the headquarters in Basildon, as does Basildon district council. It is important that where the headquarters is sited, the local population is enthusiastic about the whole concept of the national lottery. Of that there is no doubt. Basildon is totally committed to the national lottery. We enjoy a gamble. We believe that no job losses will be suffered in Liverpool because in Basildon we shall still fill in the football pools. We also very much want to participate in the national lottery.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will take on board the fact that Basildon wants to continue to lead the country to the economic recovery, which has clearly started. One way to ensure that is for people who are bidding for the headquarters to talk to me, to the county council and to the district council. We can offer a very good deal if they wish to site the headquarters in my constituency of Basildon.

Mr. Maxton: The frivolous way in which the last two Conservative Members who have spoken treated this very serious subject is outrageous. I am not necessarily 100 per cent. convinced by the arguments of those who say that there will be job losses in the pools industry, but they have a case. No Conservative Member who has spoken has made any attempt to answer the case that has been made by the pools industry and by those of my hon. Friends representing Liverpool constituencies. That is regrettable. I agree with the hon. Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) on one thing only. He obviously believes that all his constituents are born gamblers. He is absolutely right: they would have to be, to elect him.

Having said all that, I must say that I have reservations about the new clause—first, because I do not think that it makes sense and, secondly, because I do not like the fact that it refers only to the headquarters of the national lottery and I feel that other offices related to the national lottery should also go to areas where employment may be affected by its establishment.

Moreover, I am not sure whether the new clause requires the headquarters to go to the area that suffers most as a result of the establishment of the national lottery. Liverpool Members might make the case that more employees are employed in the pools industry in Liverpool than anywhere else, but that does not mean that Liverpool will be the only area affected. If the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) is suggesting that this should be the first criterion, I have some sympathy with his argument——

Mr. Alton: The new clause specifically refers to an area that can demonstrate its case. Zetters may well go completely out of business—as everyone knows, it is probably the most vulnerable of the companies. North Merseyside and, in particular, Knowsley, North will be affected if Vernons suffers most, whereas if Littlewoods suffers most, the effects could be felt in Glasgow, Cardiff or Liverpool. That is why the matter should be left open.

Mr. Maxton: That is exactly my point. The new clause hints that the area that is worst affected should get the headquarters. My view is that, if we are to take these matters into account at all, employment effects should be the first criterion or one of the criteria on the basis of which the Government consider where the headquarters and other offices of the national lottery should go.

I had originally thought that I would resist the temptation to follow the example of other hon. Members by making a special plea for my area. As Oscar Wilde might have said, "There is only one way to defeat temptation and that is to give in to it." I will therefore make a plea on behalf of Glasgow. Glasgow may well be one of the areas that will suffer, so it would be covered by the criteria suggested in the new clause. The excellent, imaginative and innovative Labour-controlled local authorities—Glasgow district council and Strathclyde regional council—have a track record.

Mr. Graham: Does my hon. Friend agree that, in this context, it is a bit of a misnomer to call the area Glasgow? Littlewoods is based in Renfrew, and Renfrew district council has been more than helpful to Littlewoods.

Mr. Maxton: Perhaps I should have said that all the excellent innovative Labour-controlled local authorities in Strathclyde have an excellent track record—despite the enormous problems put in their path by the Government —of attracting inward investment and putting together packages that allow office development, as has been shown recently with the Ministry of Defence, which we still hope will come to Glasgow. I hope that that track record will be borne in mind in siting the lottery headquarters.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Govan): I support the new clause because it is important that we make it clear that we are interested in ensuring that jobs go to the areas that may suffer as a result of the national lottery. I understand why some Conservative Members find it impossible at this stage to accept that there will be any job losses at all, but many of us are not convinced by the argument that the lottery will result in a net increase in the number of jobs and in the amount of money spent on gambling.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton), I deprecate the tone that has so far been adopted in the debate. Conservative Members have understandably made pleas for their own areas but, in doing so, they have failed to pay sufficient regard to the very real anxiety felt by those in the pools industry.

In my area, there is substantial female unemployment, and female employment is provided by the pools industry in Hillington. Many of the ladies working in the industry have said to me that, if they lose their job, they will have little opportunity—at their age and with their skills—to find alternative employment in the surrounding area. Many of those women require their income because their husband is unemployed. In my view, it is not seemly for Conservative Members to mock the genuine anxieties that those people feel.

Notwithstanding the technical problems with the new clause, which I understand, the Government should make a commitment here and now that they will do what they can to ensure that any jobs that are generated—few though they may be—go to areas that will suffer as a result of the setting up of the national lottery. Such a statement will go a considerable way towards overcoming people's anxieties.

Mr. Bryan Davies (Oldham, Central and Royton): I do not think that Conservative Members have been frivolous. They have merely revealed the nature of the modern Conservative party. They have substituted for the principle underlying the new clause—which seeks to bring employment to areas that are likely to suffer increased unemployment as a result of the introduction of the national lottery—the argument that the jobs should go to any area where unemployment has increased as a direct result of Government policy. We heard that argument from three Conservative Members today and from two in Committee. We have even heard how the Chancellor's constituency is suffering.

I have news for Conservative Members: there are 651 of us in the queue, and all of us have a good claim for saying that the unemployment problems in our areas—caused by the depredations of a decade or more under a Conservative Government who have pursued higher unemployment as a part of their economic strategy—should be tackled. It simply will not do for Conservative Members to suggest on the basis of special pleading that their constituencies have the right to be exempt from the consequences of Government policy. The Opposition are pointing to a specific area of Government policy—the introduction of the national lottery, which will have consequences for those employed in the pools industry. We are concerned about those communities and this is an exceedingly serious matter.

Let us not have a national lottery headquarters on the Conservative model—bright and brash and marble-tiled, like the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, which will be supremely attractive to visitors from overseas, who will nevertheless bring precious little money to it. Let us instead have a lottery office like those in the United States. My hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) mentioned the visit that he and I made to the headquarters of the lottery in Washington. Like so many cities in the United States, the capital has rich and poor living close together. The rich parts of the city—including Capitol hill—are fringed by the poorest parts of the city because there is little town planning and because little effort has been made to save the city centre.

[Mr. Bryan Davies]

The lottery headquarters is located in the poorer quarters of the city for two reasons: first, the lottery provides jobs for the local community; and, secondly, it is the people's lottery. It is all very well the hon. Members for Torbay (Mr. Allason) and for Basildon (Mr. Amess) to suggest that the lottery will be patronised by their constituents—as it will be. The fact is that the vast majority of people purchasing lottery tickets will be people on lower incomes.

The lottery is a form of regressive taxation because its greatest appeal will be to those who have the least. Therefore, the lottery headquarters should be located in an area where it can serve the people best. If the lottery is to be a success, it must appeal across the board. The vast majority of people who will participate in the lottery will have fairly limited resources. As a small gesture towards employment policy, we should consider the regions that deserve the few jobs that the lottery will provide.

5.30 pm

Mr. Kilfoyle: I do not have a great deal to add to what has been said today and what was said in Standing Committee where, as members of the Committee will be aware, we explored the issue fully.

The hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) made an aside from a sedentary position earlier to which I should like the Minister to reply. The hon. Member for South Hams said that the lottery headquarters could be located anywhere in the world. That is an interesting hypothetical proposition. Tattersalls is a very good lottery operator in Australia. If it is technically posible with electronic mail and similar technology for Tattersalls, with all its expertise, to bid to operate a lottery here, could our lottery be run from overseas—for example, from Europe or elsewhere? I hope that the Minister will respond to that point.

Mr. Graham: All hon. Members are aware of my feelings about the national lottery. I would much have preferred to be here today arguing that the pools should continue as they are. However, I have received hundreds of letters from people who work in the pools industry. They believe that they are now facing the dole. I can understand that belief when we consider how pools companies in other countries have gone to the wall when lotteries were introduced in those countries.

It is unbelievable that Conservative Members are joining in the worst kind of lottery imaginable—the lottery for jobs. The hon. Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) is very fortunate that his constituency does not suffer the kind of unemployment that is raging throughout the country. Areas like Strathclyde and Merseyside are experiencing unbelievable and horrific levels of unemployment. The hon. Member for Basildon should come with me and speak to people who are on the dole in my area who have been working their butts off trying to get a job. Some of them have been unemployed for years. They look for work every day of every week.

The pools industry faces a catastrophe. Thousands of members of the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers have already lost their jobs as a result of the recession and the economic situation created by the Government. If the Bill is passed, thousands more members of the USDAW will be on the dole.

In all fairness, I recognise the thinking behind the new clause. If there is to be a headquarters for the national lottery, we must bear in mind the thousands of people who face the dole. I understand that we are talking about the creation of about 100 jobs. I believe that one extra job in my constituency is worth fighting for. I am sure that my colleagues will accept that any jobs are welcome so long as we are increasing the number of jobs and not taking them away.

I saw Conservative Members smiling earlier. They will never see me smiling when folk face the dole. I was on the dole and I know what it is like. I know how important it is to work and to get a wage at the end of the week to pay the rent, mortgage and electricity bills. I have worked hard during my life and I have been on the dole. I have faced it and felt it.

Mr. Nigel Evans: Would the hon. Gentleman support the social chapter which would cost thousands of jobs in this country?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not relevant to this particular debate.

Mr. Graham: I am delighted to have your protection, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I do not wish to join in the obscene bidding for Strathclyde, Merseyside or anywhere else. I hope that wisdom will prevail. I hope that the site of the headquarters will be determined after we have considered the areas in this country that face unemployment. Indeed, unemployment is still increasing in many areas.

I have examined the new clause. It may be important for us to be seen to argue for the headquarters to be located in an area that is suffering deprivation and unemployment. However, if the Bill had not been introduced, thousands of workers would be working away merrily and happily. They would still be picking up a wage at the end of the week. They would still be able to take the jobs that they need. They would still be sharing their wealth with the nation by paying their contributions to the tax system.

I agree reluctantly with the new clause. I plead with Conservative Members to consider the fact that the situation is of their making. Will the Minister please give us an assurance? Not long ago, it was said on the Floor of the House that thousands of jobs would not be lost as a result of the Bill. If hundreds of jobs are lost, will the Minister review the situation? Would he then come back to the House and tell us what he intends to do about it?

I sincerely hope that the Minister will genuinely consider the workers who possibly face the dole. When Ministers come to take the decision, I hope that they will consider the people on Merseyside. I believe fundamentally that the folk on Merseyside probably have a larger and more justified claim to have the headquarters located in their area than people anywhere else in the country. I am sure that none of my colleagues from Glasgow or Renfrew district would argue against the folk on Merseyside.

The hon. Member for Basildon is jocular. I may be entering into a similar spirit, but I do not know where Basildon is. However, I certainly know where the dole queues are and I know where they lead. They lead to a dismal life for millions of our people. I hope that the people of Basildon, like the people in my constituency, feel that at the end of the day, the headquarters of the national lottery might provide a future and perhaps a new career for unemployed people.

As you know, Madam Deputy Speaker, I have been rather caught up today. I lost my hearing aid tonight and I cannot find it. However, some people will lose their jobs because of this Government and they will not be able to find new jobs.

Mr. Pendry: I, too, support the thrust of the new clause. Any objective person listening to the debate will have observed the contrast between some hon. Members' rather frivolous approach to the problem of unemployment and the attitude voiced by, for instance, my hon. Friends the Members for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle), for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham), for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Davidson), for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mrs. Kennedy) and for Knowsley.

Mr. George Howarth: Knowsley, North.

Mr. Pendry: I mean my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth). I accept that an important distinction is involved.

The able way in which the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) spoke to the new clause shows how deeply Opposition Members feel about the problem. Since the introduction of the Bill, they—along with some Conservative Members—have expressed great concern about the lottery's effect on employment levels in the pools industry.

As has already been pointed out, Liverpool, Cardiff, Glasgow and indeed London are the most vulnerable areas. Liverpool has a male unemployment rate of 20·8 per cent. and an overall unemployment rate of 15 per cent.; Cardiff has a male unemployment rate of 14·1 per cent. and an overall unemployment rate of 9·9 per cent.; Glasgow has a male unemployment rate of 15·5 per cent. and an overall unemployment rate of 11·2 per cent. Of course, those figures cannot in themselves convey the lack of personal esteem and social cohesion that was so graphically described by my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde.

During the past few days, Conservative Members have claimed that the recession is now over; but it still seems very real for the 3 million people who are out of work, with no real chance of finding a job. All the three known reports that have investigated the effects of a national lottery on the pools industry have predicted a severe impact on employment. In many ways, the findings of the report by the GAH group seem the least pessimistic: according to The Guardian, it suggests that 1,100 pools jobs will be lost in Liverpool, Glasgow, Cardiff and London. The Coopers and Lybrand report—commissioned by the pools promoters in response to the Government's White Paper last year—predicted the closure of Vernons and Zetters, and a 40 per cent reduction in Littlewoods' turnover.

Like other hon. Members, I accept that concessions made in Committee have gone some way towards establishing a more level playing field between the lottery and the pools industry. It remains the case, however, that the establishment of a lottery is likely to reduce employment—both those employed directly by the pools industry, who were cited by my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and of part-time coupon collectors —in the absence of counterveiling employment creation measures. Surely it is fair to propose to give the areas that will be most adversely affected by the lottery's introduction a better-than-average chance of housing its headquarters.

For those reasons, Labour Members accept the spirit of the new clause. I hope that the Minister will follow suit.

Mr. Key: I recognise the depth of feeling about this issue. One of the joys of the English language is that it allows people to express deep feelings, sometimes through anger and passion and sometimes through humour; on occasion, the dividing line is narrow. Although some of my hon. Friends—and, indeed, some Opposition Members —may have spoken with levity, no one should doubt that the current feelings about unemployment on Merseyside are registered and understood. Such feelings run deep in the House, as, of course, they do among all who face unemployment. As we are discussing the pools industry, I should cite Strathclyde as well as Cardiff and London: all have sizeable populations involved in, or reliant on, the pools industry.

It is true that the new clause is very tightly drawn. I am sure that that was intended. Many hon. Members on both sides of the House agree that it is difficult to see how so narrow and prescriptive a measure could fit comfortably in the Bill: I recognise the sincerity with which the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) and my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) drew our attention to the problems.

The fact is that we do not know what will happen to jobs in the pools industry; what we do know is that the lottery will create a number of jobs. Although only a modest number will be created in the headquarters, I expect thousands to be generated nationwide in the operation of the lottery and in the supporting industries —computing, marketing, printing and the retail sector which will sell the tickets.

That, however, is not the burden of the argument, which is concerned with jobs on Merseyside. As I said in Committee, I understand the position very well: I would scarcely have spent my time in north America trying to persuade the Americans to invest in Liverpool if I did not consider Merseyside worthy of investment. As has been said, it has a good track record.

5.45 pm

The hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) made a strong speech, which was not devalued a jot by his constituency interest. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Davidson)—who spoke eloquently in Committee—reminded us that we should look north of the border as well. That view was echoed by the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham), who, over the years, has established a reputation for sincerity in the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Torbay (Mr. Allason) made a sensible speech on behalf of his constituents. It would be wrong for any hon. Member representing the north of England to assume that the position in the south and west is not serious, as I discovered a couple of weeks ago during a tour of Devon and Cornwall.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) is right: we need to talk about a successful lottery that will generate more jobs. My hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) pointed out that, if the headquarters were located in that town, we could be certain of securing one of my ambitions—a very British lottery. As my hon. Friend said, Basildon is at the heart of Britain.

Mr. Maxton: With all due respect, I must defend my fellow Scots. I think that the Minister should have said "at the heart of England".

Mr. Key: Let us say "at the heart of the United Kingdom".

The hon. Member for Oldham, Central and Royton (Mr. Davies) made a passionate speech. I am grateful to him for setting the debate in a wider context.

Technology being what it is, the lottery's headquarters could, of course, be located almost anywhere in the world, but I can reassure the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle) that they will be located in the United Kingdom; otherwise, it would be extremely difficult to enforce licence conditions. It is normal throughout the world for lottery operators to be located in the country concerned.

The hon. Member for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mrs. Kennedy) provided the touchstone of the debate. I congratulate her: I know that for many months she has worked tirelessly on this difficult issue on behalf of her constituents. She has always brought originality as well as fervour to our debates, and she did not let us down on this occasion, even including a touch of poetry. That is another joy of the English language, and I commend her constituent who composed the poem.

I appreciate the spirit behind the new clause, although I cannot back its premise that the national lottery will have a significant effect on unemployment in specific areas. I have said on many occasions that the effect of the national lottery on employment in the pools industry will depend on how the pools promoters choose to conduct their operations.

As the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde remarked, we moved a long way in Committee on the problems confronting the pools industry. However, employment levels in the pools industry are steadily declining and I have not heard any guarantee that employment levels would be maintained if we did not introduce a national lottery. There is a problem of technology as well as the problem of the national lottery. Of course markets are not set in concrete. Pools operators throughout the world are restructuring to make their games more attractive. Now the pools industry in Britain has an opportunity to do a great deal more in modernising its regime as a result of the changes which we introduced in Committee.

I accept one aspect of the serious intent behind new clause 4. I accept that the siting of the headquarters and associated service components of the new national lottery represents a tremendous opportunity for jobs which many areas are keen to attract. Wherever the operator sets up —much of Oflot's operation would be likely to follow— the area chosen would benefit enormously from direct employment and the secondary benefits which that produces.

However, I cannot accept the new clause because it contains the wrong emphasis. We should also avoid inserting such a restrictive clause into the Bill and into modern legislation. I repeat the point that I made in Committee, that if I were a potential clause 5 operator, I would contact areas designated assisted areas and the Department of Trade and Industry to learn about the many advantages intrinsic to those assisted areas and the many Government benefits available to companies which establish themselves there.

Many of the organisations which are interested in putting in a bid are looking at assisted areas with a view to setting up the headquarters and manufacturing the hardware for the lottery in those areas. That is most welcome. Merseyside development corporation, to name one excellent assisted area, has drawn up plans to offer potential operators every possible advantage and facility in setting up in Merseyside. Liverpool city council has also worked on the project. That is particularly welcome.

Many more areas have made such plans. It is not a matter for frivolity. Genuine bids have been made for the work from as far afield as Glasgow and Tayside, Cornwall, Dorset, and, as we have heard today, Basildon and Torbay. The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) is naturally keen that we should guarantee that the lottery operation will go to Liverpool. That would be unfair to the other areas which have already expressed interest in welcoming the lottery.

The new clause is tightly drawn. I personally think that it is rather impractical. I do not take much pleasure from imagining areas vying with one another to show that they stand to suffer more than other areas from the advent of the lottery. That is rather macabre.

Mr. Graham: Does not the Minister accept the point made by Opposition Members that Merseyside, Strathclyde and other areas will probably suffer loss of employment in the pools industry as a result of the introduction of the lottery? We therefore make a special plea for the headquarters to be set up in one of those areas.

Mr. Key: Yes. Of course I accept that Merseyside is more likely to be affected than any other area. What I have to say about that is straightforward. Under clause 11, the Secretary of State will ensure that location is one of the many matters which are taken into account in deciding whether to grant a licence. That could not be an overriding consideration if it conflicted with the director general's overriding duties in clause 4 to create a lottery run with propriety in the interests of participants generating maximum net proceeds. However, I am clear that it should be one of the matters which are taken into account. That puts an onus on the interested areas to make their best case to potential operators.

Today's debate has ensured that any potential operator who takes seriously the proceedings on the Bill in the House will, on reading the report of the debate, be under no misapprehension about the seriousness with which we have treated the subject. They will therefore bear in mind carefully what I have said about granting a licence.

Mr. Alton: With the leave of the House, I should like to make a few remarks in response to the debate. I recognise that we have had a good debate in which many hon. Members have participated. Obviously, I was disappointed by the Minister's reply. I am also sorry that he misrepresented the new clause. I did not intend to seek a Division, but after hearing his reply I feel more determined to press the matter, if it is the will of Opposition Members that we should test the issue.

It worried me that the Minister suggested that the amendment contained an attempt to bring the headquarters of the national lottery specifically to the city of Liverpool. The new clause does not mention Liverpool once. It seeks to set out a clear principle that, if a part of the country can demonstrate that it has lost jobs as a direct consequence of the introduction of the national lottery, the headquarters should be situated in that area. That is a perfectly reasonable proposition.

If the Minister had said that, although he was not happy to include the new clause in the Bill, he accepted the principle and would reflect before the Bill went to another place on whether he could go some way to meeting hon. Members' points, I would have been happy to act reasonably and would not have pressed the new clause to a Division. But, in the light of what has been said, I believe that the issue is so important that the House ought to divide on it.

Every Member of Parliament could have set out a case for his constituency. The hon. Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) is an indomitable and well-known spirited fighter for his constituency, but the fact remains that his constituency will not directly lose a single job as a result of the introduction of the national lottery. That also applies to the hon. Members for Torbay (Mr. Allason) and for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey). The hon. Member for Surbiton referred to job losses at British Aerospace. They have nothing whatever to do with the introduction of the national lottery, as he would be the first to concede.

But jobs will be lost at Zetters, Vernons and Littlewoods in the view of many Opposition Members who have spoken, including the hon. Members for Oldham, Central and Royton (Mr. Davies), for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham), for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth), for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mrs. Kennedy) and for other constituencies.

It is the clear view of many people that jobs will be lost. It is the view of the industry itself. I am the first to accept that that may not happen. If it does not, the new clause makes the way clear to site the headquarters in any part of the country that can demonstrate that it would be the right place, be it Basildon, Torbay or Surbiton. However, if areas can demonstrate—I believe that they will be able to do so—that they have suffered a significant loss of jobs directly attributable to the introduction of the national lottery, it is surely not unreasonable for Members of Parliament from those communities to ask that the new jobs should be placed in those areas.

Hon. Members have made the point—it hardly needs reiterating—that unemployment is deeply corrosive of family and community life. It deeply affects those who become unemployed. People who are currently employed in industries such as the pools industry in Merseyside, Glasgow or London and are likely to lose their jobs will note the debate today with great care. As the hon. Member for Broadgreen said, many of them have written to Members of Parliament saying that they fear for their job. Surely it is not unreasonable to say to them that if, a year from now, they can demonstrate that, as a result of the introduction of the national lottery jobs have been lost from their community, we will ask that the new jobs created by the national lottery should go to that district.

Hon. Members from across the political divide are making a strong and united plea. The House will be aware that I disagree on many political issues with many of my hon. colleagues from Merseyside. But on this issue we are united in our plea. It is not good enough for hon. Members to accuse hon. Members from one area of militancy and extremism when they hear a united plea and a sustained argument which is perfectly reasonable. The Government should listen to that carefully. Instead of accusing hon. Members, as they did on Second Reading, of fighting the wrong battle at the last ditch, the Government should recognise that here is an example of hon. Members making a perfectly sensible proposal. I hope that hon. Members will feel able to support the new clause in the Division.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New clause 5

MINIMUM AGE FOR PURCHASE OF LOTTERY TICKETS

'.—(1) Any person who sells a ticket for the National Lottery to a young person shall be guilty of an offence.

(2) A person guilty of an offence under this section shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level five on the standard scale.

(3) In this section, the expression "young person" means a person—

(a) who is under the age of eighteen years and whom the person committing an offence in relation to him under this section knows, or ought to know, to be under that age; or

(b) who is apparently under the said age:

provided that in the case of any proceedings under this section for an offence in respect of a person apparently under the said age, it shall be a defence to prove that at the time of the alleged offence he had in fact attained that age.'.—[Mr. Alton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Alton: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 5, in clause 51, page 20, leave out from line 37 to end of line 15 on page 21.

Mr. Alton: New clause 5, which is linked to amendment No. 5, deals with the minimum age for the purchase of lottery tickets. We explored this issue in Committee and those who have read the extract of the proceedings in Committee will know that I advanced the case that we should not do anything deliberate to stimulate gambling among younger people. I hope that the House will have a chance to reflect on what I trust will be a fairly brief debate on this new clause and amendment and that the Minister, if he is unable to accept the amendment, will at least give some consideration to the principles underlying it so that it can be given further thought between now and debate in another place.

The chairman of the National Council on Gambling has described as "naive" the Government's view that, as lotteries are the softest form of gambling, a fairly relaxed regime of control is consistent with policy. Any restrictions are undesirable, the Government's argument goes, because they want to stimulate the maximum amount of revenue. But surely there must be exceptions to that rule. I argue that young people are one of them. The same argument can, for that matter, be extended to the poor and, interestingly, to women—a group that the Minister said in Committee he particularly wanted to target as people likely to purchase tickets for the national lottery.

The Government, therefore, will widely promote the lottery in an indiscriminate manner to achieve the objective of raising the maximum amount of revenue, and one of the groups that they will quite unashamedly target will be young people. Such an approach is best summed up by the belief that if one is to have a lottery it might as well be one that makes as much money as possible, regardless of who or where the money comes from. Inevitably, as the lottery matures, they will seek to maintain growth in revenue and profits and will either seek to attract new participants or encourage existing participants to bet more.

Lotteries inevitably generate strong commercial pressures which take little account of social considerations, and this lottery will be no different unless we build in safeguards. That is why my new clause and the amendment set out to protect those who are under 18 years of age. Unless we build safeguards into our legislation, as has been the experience in the United States, we will see pernicious and misleading advertisements and promotion on television, in our newspapers and on hoardings in our deprived areas; and many of them will be targeted at young people.

I would like to draw the attention of the House to one such advertisement that appeared on Connecticut television, entitled "Misspent Youth". It opens with an older man sitting in a boat, afloat on a calm mountain lake. He says reflectively:

"When I was younger, I suppose I could have done more to plan my future. But I didn't. I guess I could have put some money aside. But I didn't. Or I could have made some smart investments. But I didn't . . . Heck, I could have bought a one-dollar Connecticut Lotto ticket, won a jackpot worth millions, and gotten a nice big check every year for twenty years. (Smiling broadly) And I did! I won! . . . I won millions —me!"

A voice-over then spells this out. It says:

"Play LOTTO. You only have to win once. Jackpot prize paid out in twenty instalments. Overall chance of winning is 1 in 30."

In fact, although the odds of winning something are 1 in 30, the odds of winning the million-dollar jackpot are 1 in 13 million.

There are other examples but I quoted that particular one in Committee as the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) has said, and I want to add to it because it builds up the case that, where there are lotteries already in operation in the United States, many have targeted the young in the way that I have described, or at the poor. For instance, in Illinois an advertisement depicts a man scorning people who invest in savings bonds: investing in the lottery, he says, is the only way to become a millionaire. A ghetto billboard offered Chicago's West Side residents this advice:

"How to go from Washington Boulevard to Easy Street —play the Illinois State Lottery."

The recession has prompted another pitch in Washington. Lottery billboards round the city describe the lottery there as "the ultimate shock absorber".

New York once ran a commercial showing a mother telling her daughter that she need not strive for a scholarship because her mother was playing the numbers. A billboard placed in Boston College's football stadium last year offered this inducement to diligent study:

"Be a millionaire before you graduate—play the Massachusetts lottery."

So the experience from the United States is not good.

There is evidence from this country too of the existing problem of young people who are gambling. I draw the attention of the House to the work undertaken by Dr. Sue Fisher of Plymouth university. She points out that a survey of United Kingdom secondary school children, aged 11 to 16, inquired into the prevalence of adolescent gambling and pathological gambling on fruit machines, and related behaviour. Sixty-two per cent. of the children in the survey gambled on fruit machines, 17·3 per cent. at least weekly and 5·7 per cent. pathologically. Some began gambling as young as eight years old.

Sue Fisher did a study located in a seaside town in the south-west with a population of 6,000. The commercial leisure facilities are dominated by three arcades, purpose-built for the playing of fruit and video machines.

One arcade prevents local children from entering in school hours; the others impose no age restrictions. The arcades remain open throughout the winter months as well as in the holiday season so that local children have virtually unrestricted access to fruit machine gambling in arcades throughout the year. In addition, fruit machines are sited in cafes, fish and chip shops and holiday camps and are also played by the children surveyed.

The survey was carried out during the autumn of 1990 in a school which is the sole provider of state secondary education for that seaside town and its hinterland. The questionnaire included a frequent question on a variety of gambling forms to establish the prevalence of fruit machine playing and its relevance to other games. Ninety-nine per cent. of children had gambled in the year preceding the survey. As expected, fruit machines were the most popular form of gambling and 62 per cent. of children had played them in the preceding year. Next in popularity were card games, 30 per cent. of the children having played them, and games of skill, especially pool —27 per cent. had played that. Nine per cent. of the children had bet on playground games such as "coins up the wall", and a further 8 per cent. had bet on football pools. Eight per cent. of the children had bet on horses and dogs; 20 per cent. of them gambled weekly, and 9 per cent. gambled three or more times a week.

Predictably, fruit machines were played more frequently than any other form of gambling: 17·3 per cent. played at least once a week. Next in popularity were games of skill, with 7·5 per cent.; followed by cards, at 3·9 per cent., playground games, at 2·4 per cent., football pools at 2 per cent. and horse and dog betting at 0·4 per cent.

The implications of all this for the scratch cards that are likely to be sold as part of the national lottery should be more than evident to all hon. Members. While most children spend small amounts on fruit machines, 25 per cent. had spent more than £5 in one day, and 4·6 per cent. of them spent more than £10 every single week. Seven per cent. gambled at least three times a week—and there were no significant gender differences in the study that Sue Fisher carried out.

The problems that this generates are worth considering for a moment as we decide whether to allow young people to purchase lottery tickets. Fruit machine playing, according to the survey carried out in this west country town, created problems for some of the children that impinged on their schooling and their relationships with family and friends. Some of the problems involved illegal acts. Eight and a half per cent. of the children played fruit machines even though they knew that their parents had forbidden it; 10 per cent. of parents had fallen out with their children or close family because of fruit machine playing; and 15 per cent. of the children admitted that they had lied to hide the extent of their involvement.

Thirty-seven per cent. of the children had borrowed; 21 per cent. had spent their school fare or dinner money; 11 per cent. had stolen from their families; 2 per cent. had stolen from outside the home to play the fruit machines. Four per cent. had sought help with a serious money problem attributable to fruit machine playing.

It is obvious to anyone who thinks about these things or who has any familiarity with urban life that adolescents are particularly susceptible to pathological gambling. As with substance abuse, so the gambling problems among young people are undoubtedly part of the reason for crime levels among them.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I agree with the hon. Gentleman about fruit machines—the Yorkshire Post has run a good campaign against them, and something should certainly be done about them. I wonder, however, whether the hon. Gentleman is right to pursue the analogy with the national lottery, because there is a difference: fruit machines are almost a way of life. They are put in places that are designed to be exciting and open all the time. Spending fairly small sums of money on them can become an addiction, but surely the national lottery represents a different dimension?

Mr. Alton: If the hon. Gentleman will bear with me for a moment, the study that I have been citing goes on to show that the compulsive gambler frequently starts with what appears to be an innocuous form of gambling, such as a lottery, and ends up on the harder forms, such as slot machines. Ours is the only country in the world that allows children to gamble on slot or fruit machines. We should be ashamed of that. Children who are already addicted to slot machines are far more likely to indulge in other forms of gambling—all the more reason why we should protect them. That is why the principle enunciated in Committee found some support on both sides of that Committee. This is not a partisan issue; we should all be worried about this country's young people.

Young people are picked up and used by pimps and by others who exploit them or sell drugs to them or lure them into a world of criminality. We should therefore not add to the pressures on them, since they are already excessively exploited. The United States experience clearly shows that young people are one of the target groups for lotteries, and I fear that we may set out to lure them into purchasing tickets here in the same way—advertisements even in colleges encouraging young people to spend some of their money on lottery tickets. Do we really want to encourage people to use their money to try to succeed by gambling on a national lottery—what I would term the chance mentality? Surely we should build in safeguards for young people.

Before hon. Members point out that young people are allowed to do many other things at the relevant age, I should add that that does not invalidate the new clause or the amendment. It does not mean, for instance, that we should provide young people with drugs or encourage them into vice. There is no reason why we should deliberately set out further to encourage gambling by young people in the national lottery, or why we should allow the deliberate targeting of young people by failing to build in safeguards to prevent that from happening.

Mr. Graham Riddick (Colne Valley): I declare an interest as parliamentary adviser to the Brewers Society. I support the Government on the Bill. There is no need to increase the age limit from 16 to 18, and I do not believe that the lotteries will take the form of hard gambling. This is, after all, a question of judgment, and the Government have probably reached the right decision—that 16 is the right age.

The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) was clearly concerned about misleading advertising, but clause 12 provides safeguards against that sort of misinformation, as does other legislation on accuracy in advertisements, allowing the Advertising Standards Authority to enforce the same.

An anomaly might arise, because at an early stage of the Bill's progress the Government suggested that public houses would not be allowed to sell lottery tickets. Sixteen-year-olds might therefore be able to buy tickets, but those aged 18 or over, if drinking in a pub, would not be able to buy them. I see no reason for such a prohibition. Perhaps the Government feared that the lottery would be associated with gambling and that pubs, by extension, might be too.

Pubs are increasingly seen as leisure outlets and community centres, however. That is particularly true of rural areas, where they are often the only places where residents can meet each other. Following the Government's decision to relax the licensing laws, more people below the age of 18 will visit pubs with their parents. The Government's decision acknowledges pubs' increasing role as places where families can spend time together. With 65,000 pubs in this country, we have an excellent opportunity to increase the success of the lottery system. I look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say on this subject.

Mr. Pendry: Supporting new clauses moved by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) is becoming a bit of a habit. He has already touched on most of the points that I wanted to make.

Members of the Committee will recall that I argued that it was nonsense that bingo and the pools should be required to observe a lower age limit of 18 but that the Government should allow the sale of lottery tickets to 16-year-olds. The case for equalisation was overwhelming then and it is overwhelming still.

There are of course two ways of bringing about parity. The Government have chosen the wrong way, and I hope that they have realised their mistake in lowering the age to 16 instead of levelling it up to 18. If consistency and fair competition were truly the Government's objectives, it would be better to confine the sale of lottery tickets to those aged 18 and above, the age observed in almost all other forms of gambling. There is a legitimate anxiety that, if the age limit is lowered to 16, some young people may become susceptible to harder forms of gambling because of their involvement with the national lottery.

The attraction of a national lottery is not only that by buying a ticket one helps a good cause but that, if one is lucky, one could win a prize, which could be very huge if the national lottery is the success that the Government hope. I do not need to tell hon. Members that the teenage years, especially the years between 16 and 18, are extremely formative and impressionable. Although the national lottery is hardly an addictive form of gambling, it may tempt young people to experiment with other forms. The hon. Member for Mossley Hill mentioned that.

Those of us who represent areas of great social deprivation are aware of the susceptibility of some young people, especially those who are out of work and who may see gambling as an easy way out of current difficulties and social boredom. The temptation to relieve despair through gambling, like the temptation to ease hopelessness through drinking, should not be taken lightly.

Reducing the age at which one can be allowed to gamble to 16, although not a momentous change, will make it much easier to encourage young people to take up gambling as a recreational pursuit. The Opposition believe that such additional encouragement is undesirable. The national lottery ought to be a means of raising new money for good causes, and exploiting the vulnerability of young people is quite contrary to the ethos that it is supposed to represent.

Opposition Members have always maintained that the limit should be set at 18—we argued that in Committee—in line with other forms of gambling. I hope that the Government realise that it was foolish to reduce the age to 16 instead of keeping it at 18. I hope that the Minister will not reply from a civil service brief and that he has reflected on the rather silly approach taken by the Government so far. If we seek uniformity and age parity, we should accept the new clause so ably moved by the hon. Member for Mossley Hill.

6.30 pm

Mr. Maxton: I am always reluctant to disagree with my Front-Bench spokesmen, but on this occasion I am afraid that I must do so, because I do not think that we should support the new clause. I shall approach the matter from a slightly different viewpoint from that taken by some hon. Members. The new clause would place an undesirable burden on those who will sell national lottery tickets. I have teenage children and I do not know how anyone is expected to be sure by appearance that a person who enters an establishment that sells lottery tickets is 16, 17 or 18.

Mr. Corbett: What about pubs?

Mr. Maxton: That is exactly the problem faced by many publicans. I am a rather old-fashioned believer in civil liberties, and that is why I have reservations about the fact that many pubs are insisting that young people produce some sort of identification to prove that they are 18. That is a dangerous road for those who believe in civil liberties because, increasingly, people who go to a newsagents to buy a lottery ticket will be asked to produce some sort of identification. I have a son who will soon be 19.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: My hon. Friend looks so young.

Mr. Maxton: I know. My son finds that not even a driving licence is now accepted in a pub as proof that he is over 18 because he could have obtained it at the age of 17. That creates pressure for some form of identity card; some of us believe that that is a dangerous route and we will resist any attempt to go down it. Even at 16 there will be some difficulties, but it is easier to determine that a person is younger than 16 than to distinguish between a 16 and an 18-year-old. I hope that the new clause will not be pushed to a vote.

Mr. Davidson: It is with some trepidation that I disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton), who supported me earlier. There will be some difficulty about defining age whether the limit is 16 or 18. However, in the search for profit, some people will sell outside the limit. Hon. Members have mentioned shopkeepers who distribute pools coupons to make money. Youngsters who are about two years below the statutory age will be sold tickets. If we accept a lower age limit of 16, lottery tickets will frequently be sold to 14-year-olds and youngsters of about that age.

There are already difficulties in my area because under-age youngsters are able to buy cigarettes. The law is clear, but shopkeepers will do that irrespective of the age limit. It is inappropriate to set the limit at 16 because that will lead to sales to those who are 14 years of age or younger. To them, buying a lottery ticket would be a sign of maturity.

Mr. Maxton: People of 16 can engage in what may be the biggest lottery in life by getting married. Why on earth should they not be allowed to buy lottery tickets?

Mr. Davidson: We have never opposed the idea of people having to produce identification before they get married. Of course, people are not required to produce identification before producing children, although the Government are tackling that in another way.

We should support the amendment because there is a real danger that financial pressures on the Director General of the National Lottery will lead to a search to expand the market for lottery tickets. That will include targeting ever younger children.

Mr. Key: I have no doubt that my right hon. and hon. Friends know who will look silly if the amendment is pressed to a Division. This is a matter of judgment and I respect the fact that people will reach different judgments on the degree of supervision to be imposed on people of 18 or 16. It is hard to understand why the Opposition are so keen to support the pools industry but wish to restrict the sale of tickets, and therefore of pools coupons, to 18-year-olds; that is the logic of what they are saying.

My judgment is clear. I am proud to say that I have come to the debate with a civil service brief because my civil servants have worked extremely hard for a year to get the Bill right, and it is right. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have decided that 16 is the sensible age.

The House has heard thoughtful, sensible, down-to-earth and common-sense contributions by the hon. Members for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) and for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on this topic. When faced with the difficult problem of the sale of goods to young people, do we make it easier or more difficult? My judgment is that, if the amendment is accepted, it will increase the problem, and that would be silly.

We heard a great deal about advertisements in the United States. But this is not the United States and such advertisements could not appear here. Our proposals are sufficient to control misleading or scurrilous advertising of the type that the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) took great relish in describing to us. The Advertising Standards Authority ensures truthfulness, and clause 12 gives the Secretary of State power to make regulations about information that must be given. The powers of the director general to license operators under clause 5 and games under clause 6 also provide protection.

Some pools companies have had occasional lapses of discretion in advertising. A few years ago, Littlewoods had to withdraw a poster campaign, based on a poster that said, "You'll never work again", because it was thought distasteful. The hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) is happy to support an industry that made an error of judgment like that.

The new clause shows a patronising attitude. It is suggested that although at 16 one can get married, leave school and get a job and at 17 one can fight for one's country, one should not be able to buy a national lottery ticket before one is 18. The hon. Member for Mossley Hill said that the question of age limits was discussed extensively in Committee. He said that we had argued that we should logically take the age limit for small lotteries, 16, to be the age limit for buying national lottery tickets, but that he disagreed with that.

Under clause 12, the Secretary of State can regulate for the age limit on buying national lottery tickets. I told the Committee that I was minded to set the age at 16. If the limit were set differently from that for other lotteries, retailers who might be selling both national lottery and other lottery tickets would have a hopeless task in trying to apply two different age limits. They might be put off dealing in different types of lottery and that would lead to the kind of exclusive deals about which hon. Members are concerned.

Is the hon. Member for Mossley Hill minded to increase the limit for charity lotteries, thereby preventing 16 and 17-year-olds from buying raffle tickets, the mainstay of many church functions, let alone ward political functions and football and other sports clubs everywhere? All those small lottery operators would be done a grave disservice.

It is logical to set the age limit for the pools at the same level, not least from a practical point of view, because often retailers will be selling both lottery tickets and pools coupons side by side. The Secretary of State would be able to change the age limit that he sets for the national lottery in the light of experience, should there be proven to be any of the dire consequences that the hon. Gentleman cranked out so predictably. The new clause is unnecessary, patronising and impractical, and should be rejected.

In Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) drew my attention to the problem about which my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) has spoken forcefully this evening and about which my hon. Friend the Member for Medway (Dame P. Fenner) has also spoken to me—the anomaly with pubs. I am glad that the matter has been raised. On Second Reading, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that we were minded to regulate under clause 12 to ban the sales of tickets in pubs and licensed premises. In Committee, I was subject to representations on that point, and I have received further representations.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has recently announced potential changes in the regulation of pubs which might fundamentally change the character of the public house. I know that people were jesting when they talked about the local community centre, but they have a good point in respect of rural areas. The pub is often the focus of community life. After due consideration, we have concluded that it would not be right to regulate the sale of tickets in pubs, but that we should leave it up to the operator. A potential operator might consider that using the pub was one way to reach remote areas where the Pope is the focus—[Laughter.] Well, the hon. Member for Mossley Hill will no doubt be delighted to hear that the Pope is the focus of rural life, as indeed he probably is in some areas, but I meant to say pub.

The pub might not be an appropriate point of sale, as the Pope might not be, if, for example, there were a preponderance of gambling and amusement machines on the premises. However, it is right that such decisions should be for the operators, in the light of the changing nature of public houses, and I hope that the way in which we have responded to the representations that have sensibly been made will ensure that that goes smoothly. Therefore, I hope that the House will join me in rejecting the new clause.

Mr. Alton: I am surprised that the son of a former Bishop of Truro should confuse the Pope with a pub, but I suppose that the Minister can be forgiven that lapse. I am also surprised that he was so trenchant in his opposition to the new clause and so strident in his language. He waxed lyrical in his enthusiasm to promote the sale of tickets to those aged between 16 and 18. It is nonsense to reduce to absurdity the argument that, because someone buys a raffle ticket, it is all right for him to go out and do all those other things as well.

The hon. Member for Cathcart said that, because people could get married at 16, it was all right to encourage them to gamble at 16. Many people think that 16 is rather a young age at which to make such a major decision about the rest of one's life. People who get married at such a young age, more often than people who come to such a decision later in their lives, would be wiser to wait longer. Perhaps it would be better if they did not decide so early.

Mr. Maxton: I take the hon. Gentleman's point. It may be better if people wait before they get married, but is he seriously saying that we should pass a law insisting that 18 is the age at which people may get married? That is what he seems to suggest.

Mr. Alton: The hon. Gentleman will be relieved to know that that is not part of the new clause. In answer to his point about when people get married, I am merely saying that that is a young age at which to take such decisions. However, that does not negative the new clause, which deals specifically with the encouragement of gambling among young people. That is a different argument about a different proposition.

I am surprised that the Government should show such enthusiasm for doing this. The Minister said that it would be impossible to enforce the new clause, but the same argument can be applied to the sale of alcohol and to bookmakers in betting shops. They already have to distinguish between customers on the basis of age. There is also the nonsense that it is not possible to decide when somebody is aged 18, but it is possible to decide when a person is aged 16. Those are silly arguments, put forward in an attempt to discredit the new clause, which is not just about the technical question but about the principle of whether we should be encouraging gambling among young people.

I am grateful that the House has given the matter some consideration. I hope that the Government will reflect, even if not in the context of the Bill, on the general problem of young people, many of whom gamble far too easily and readily and often steal to raise the money to feed their gambling addiction. If the national lottery does anything to stimulate that problem even further, its promoters will have a great deal to answer for. However, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 9

LIMITED CARRY-FORWARD OF DIVIDENDS IN POOL COMPETITIONS

".—(1) Schedule 2 of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963 (registered pool promoters) shall have effect with the following amendments.

(2) In paragraph 14 (which enables the rules applicable to competitions promoted by registered pool promoters to contain certain provisions as to prizes)—

(a) after paragraph (b) there shall be inserted—

"(bb) that, where no competitor makes the most successful forecasts possible (taking into account the rules of the competition and the outcome of the events on which it depends), the highest prize, or shares in that prize, shall not be paid or be paid in full, and that the amount which would have been payable in the case of winning bets qualifying for, or for shares in, that prize shall be applied in increasing the amount payable in the case of winning bets qualifying for, or for shares in, the highest prize in any of the following three competitions promoted by the promoter;"; and

(b) for "sub-paragraph (c)" there shall be substituted "sub-paragraph (bb) or (c)".

(3) In paragraph 20 (statement to be sent by pool promoter to accountant after competition) after paragraph (b) there shall be inserted—

"(bb) the total amount of prizes or shares in prizes not payable or payable in full and applicable as mentioned in paragraph 14(bb) of this Schedule;".

(4) In paragraph 21(1) (statement to be sent by pool promoter competitors after competition), in paragraph (a) for "the aggregate prizes in" there shall be substituted "the aggregate prizes in all those competitions (whether or not payable or payable in full)".

(5) In paragraph 23 (annual statement to be sent by pool promoter to accountant and registering authority)—

(a) in sub-paragraph (1) for "the aggregate prizes in" there shall be substituted "the aggregate prizes in those competitions (whether or not payable or payable in full)";

(b) in sub-paragraph (2)(a) after "competitions" there shall be inserted "(whether or not payable or payable in full)";

(6) In section 7 of the Betting and Gaming Duties Act 1981 (pool betting duty) after subsection (4) (which provides that the expenses and profits taxable under subsection (1)(b) of that section are to exclude expenses provided out of stake money) there shall be inserted—

"(4A) Where any amount applied in accordance with paragraph 14(bb) of Schedule 2 to the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963 in increasing the amount payable in the case of winning bets qualifying for, or for shares in, prizes would not (apart from this subsection) be treated for the purposes of subsection (4) as provided for out of the stake money, it shall be so treated.".'.—[Sir Malcolm Thornton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Sir Malcolm Thornton (Crosby): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

There are some good reasons why I and other hon. Members from both sides of the House have tabled the new clause, which is supported by scores of hon. Members from all parties. It would allow the limited carrying forward of dividend, otherwise known as roll-up, in pools competitions. The Government have some way to go before we can believe, with confidence, that the pools industry will be able to compete effectively and fairly with the national lottery. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary announced in Committee the Government's decision to legalise the sale of pools coupons in shops and that is a welcome development and certainly a move in the right direction.

However, the change in the law on the sale of pools coupons in shops and the right to sponsor television and radio programmes that are unrelated to football results are simply not enough in themselves to put the industry on an equal and competitive footing with the national lottery. On the basis of what my hon. Friend told the Committee, the lottery is to be allowed to roll up its prize three times, whereas the pools are prohibited from doing so at all.

The new clause provides that in a week in which no one claims the maximum number of points on a treble chance coupon, the promoters may be permitted to carry forward a proportion of the first dividend prize to the subsequent competition. The number of occasions on which the roll-up may be permitted will be limited to three—the same number as my hon. Friend the Minister said would apply to the lottery.

This is an important issue to the pools industry because rolling up the prize over a number of weeks is an extremely effective means of increasing the game's attractiveness to potential customers. A game that is allowed to roll up its prizes will naturally become more successful and popular than competitive games that are not allowed to do so. It is the classical means by which state lotteries abroad have the market rigged in their favour at the expense of other soft, long-odds gambling.

No one doubts that the pools and the national lottery are equivalent forms of gambling. That point was made by the Select Committee and by my hon. Friend the Minister of State in Committee:

"They are a form of low-stake, long-odds gambling from which the threat of social harm is small."

That is why the Government tabled an amendment to reduce the age of pools entrants to 16, to match that for the national lottery. The two forms are so similar that they must, by the rules of the marketplace, compete for similar markets. There is nothing wrong with that. The Government have always stood for free and open competition and I hope that they always will.

I tabled new clause 9 because I feel strongly about that issue. It seeks to allow the pools to compete freely and effectively with their closest competitor, which is something that my hon. Friend the Minister must welcome.

In Committe, my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) made similar points on a roll-up amendment. His words echoed many of my own sentiments:

"I tabled the amendment in the spirit of fair play. I seek no advantage to the pools companies but parity on roll-up. Similar to national lottery prizes, pools prize money could be rolled up for three weeks."

I hope that my hon. Friend feels able to support new clause 9.

I have read reports that a number of Cabinet colleagues of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State have lent their support to allowing the pools a limited roll-up. In an article in The Guardian on 21 April, my right hon and learned Friend the Home Secretary viewed the existing restrictions on pools operations as "unnecessary and bureaucratic". My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and for Scotland are also reportedly concerned about likely job losses if the pools are not allowed to maintain their markets through fair and free competition. Allowing the industry a limited roll-up would be a big step towards ensuring that.

I am also concerned about the job losses that would be generated by a pools industry that was robbed unfairly of its customers by having the market rigged against it. As the constituency Member of Parliament for Vernons on Merseyside and for many of the city's thousands of Littlewoods employees, I would regard it as unforgivable if my constituents lost their jobs after their companies' products were put out of business solely because of Government legislation. I am concerned not just about Liverpool; the pools industry is a healthy and competitive industry that employs thousands of people in areas of significant unemployment throughout the United Kingdom, in particular, in Glasgow and Cardiff.

Doing the pools is a great British institution. In his excellent speech on Thursday, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister spoke of the pools as one of the enduring characteristics of British life that must continue regardless of how far we progress towards the European single market. He said:

"Fifty years from now, Britain will still be the country of long shadows on county grounds, warm beer, invincible green suburbs, dog lovers and pools fillers."

I am sure that we all agree with those sentiments.

If the lottery is to be allowed a limited roll-up, so should the pools. The reasons are that they would both be competing for similar markets; are both long-odds, low-stake competitions; they pose a low risk of social harm; and they generate sizeable sums of money for good causes—the pools more so than the national lottery, as a result of the Government's decision to set the lottery prize fund at 50 per cent.

No sensible person can seriously accept that there is a distinction between the pools and the lottery on the basis that one is run for good causes and the other for commercial gain. That cannot be so when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer takes 37·5 per cent. of pools turnover in tax and the pools donate a further 10 per cent. to good causes in sport and arts and take less than 3 per cent. profit.

I urge the House to accept new clause 9. The pools companies and the national lottery can and should be allowed to co-exist on fair and level terms. As the Bill stands, they will not.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): We recognise and welcome the progress that was made in Committee. On Second Reading, we argued that there should broadly be a level playing field between the national lottery and the pools industry. In that regard, the Bill certainly left the Committee in a more acceptable state than it arrived. I congratulate all those responsible.

It is good news that pools coupons will be legally available in retail outlets, including licensed premises and betting shops. That move sensibly brings the letter of the law into practice and forms an essential element of measures necessary to ensure that the pools are given a reasonable opportunity to compete with the national lottery. That is not to say that we have been completely reassured that the pools will be able to compete on fair and level terms. The change in respect of shops takes them some way towards that, but, as the Government know, there remain a number of other important changes to be made to allow the pools to compete fairly.

Allowing the pools a limited roll-up is one. If the national lottery is to be allowed to roll up a prize three times, as it will be, so should the pools companies. We welcome new clause 9 for its attempt to redress the balance. The fact that hon. Members of all three main parties have put their names to it signals the strength of feeling on the issue.

The words of the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) have been quoted on many occasions, and they were particularly important in respect of establishing a level playing field. The Government claim to believe in fair competition. If that is the case, I hope that they will demonstrate their belief this evening by supporting the amendment.

We are well aware of the dangers with roll-up, and in other circumstances we would like to have seen that practice denied to both the national lottery and the pools. We heard much in Committee about the detrimental social effects of the rolling up of large prizes and the frenzied ticket buying that that generates. In Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) outlined the dangers. He warned that lotto mania can lead to huge surges in lottery ticket buying in the days leading up to a draw. We are also aware of the syndicates of professional gamblers who exploit a rollover system through bulk ticket buying. If the national lottery is allowed a limited rollover, so should the pools. As my hon. Friends have forcefully argued today, there are too many pools employees' jobs at risk in Liverpool, Cardiff, Glasgow and London for us to accept such unequal and unfair treatment.

As we all know, there is no intrinsic difference between the pools and the national lottery. For that reason, there can be no sound economic rationale for discriminating between the way that each is allowed to operate in the marketplace. To do so would be contrary to the principles of free and fair competition. The pools are for a long-odds chance of winning a large prize for a small, usually consistent, stake, on the basis of a modest, once a week bet. That can in no way be regarded as a harder form of gambling than the national lottery.

If contributions to good causes are a determining factor in deciding whether one gambling activity is softer than another, the pools also make a substantial contribution. If, of course, there were any future circumstances in which roll-up could be restricted further, we should wholeheartedly support it and would seek similar restrictions for pools roll-up also. Until we obtain that guarantee, we shall support new clause 9. That will ensure that the pools companies and their employees can compete effectively alongside the national lottery.

Anything less than a clear commitment from the Minister today that he accepts the underlying principle in new clause 9 will be unacceptable to this side of the House. If the Minister finds that the principle is one that the Government can accept but that he wants to bring it back to another place, we shall accept that. However, we will not—nor will many hon. Members on both sides of the House—accept anything less. I hope, therefore, that the Minister will respond positively and accept new clause 9.

Mr. Nigel Evans: I am grateful for the opportunity to support new clause 9. I am also grateful for the kind words of my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Sir M. Thornton) and the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd).

The Bill has come a long way since it was considered in Committee. Hon. Members have commented on the fact that people aged 16 will now be able to participate in either the pools or the national lottery and that pools coupons will be made available through retail outlets. I, more than many hon. Members who are in the Chamber, am grateful for that announcement. As you may know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, my retail outlet was one of the 20,000 that distributes pools coupons until I sat on the Standing Committee, when it was pointed out to me that it was illegal.

Immediately I started to look for the grey areas. I found only black and white, however, and therefore had to cease distribution of pools coupons in my retail outlet in Swansea. I cannot wait for the day when the Bill becomes an Act so that once again we can distribute pools coupons. The Government have gone a long way towards altering the Bill in such a way as to enable the distribution of pools coupons by retail outlets once again to become a reality.

As for roll-up, I, too, was not convinced that a £2 million prize, rolled up three times to £6 million, would be any more attractive than the £2 million prize. When I put a £1 stake on Virginia Wade winning Wimbledon and won £16, I was absolutely delighted. I had to sit down for about three hours to get my senses back. If I won £2 million, I should probably have to be put on a life support machine.

We must be mindful of the fact that many small pools companies exist alongside Littlewoods. They would be grateful for the opportunity to roll up their prizes so that their top prizes were more attractive in the weeks when no one won the top prize outright.

The pools industry is extremely important to this country. It has a turnover of just under £1 billion. The Exchequer benefits to the tune of a third of a billion pounds in pools betting duty. The Sports Council and the Arts Council receive £65 million. Many rural constituencies, such as mine, benefit from having this sum of money to distribute. Moreover, the Football Trust receives £36·5 million.

The creation of the national lottery will have a significant impact on jobs, certainly in the north-west. I know that many of the hon. Members who are in the Chamber are equally concerned about its impact on jobs. We are talking about 6,500 full-time jobs and 80,000 part-time jobs. The 80,000 part-time pools collectors do not receive massive sums of money for the coupons that they distribute, but what they do receive—£30 or £40, or even less—is an important part of their total income. We should ensure, therefore, that that part of their income is preserved.

I support new clause 9 not only because it would help to preserve jobs, but because I believe that there should be competition. All of us want the national lottery to be a great success, with tickets sold and the profits invested in good causes. To enable the national lottery to be enthusiastic about selling as many tickets as it possibly can, we must ensure that, for it to remain enthusiastic about selling tickets, there is competition.

[Mr. Nigel Evans]

The Conservative party is the party of free enterprise and competition. We want to ensure that the national lottery does not have a monopoly and does not rest on its laurels. I have sufficient faith in the pools companies to believe that they will try to ensure that they do not disappear. Both they and the national lottery will benefit from fair competition. Then the good causes to which I have referred will also benefit.

The point was made in Committee that we did not want a level playing field to be created for the pools companies and the national lottery. It is not so much a question of a level playing field as of adjacent playing fields. We want to ensure that one of the players is not kicked off the pitch and that both playing fields can exist side by side, with healthy competition between them. By giving life to one form of gambling, the national lottery, we should not kill off another form of gambling, the pools. Both are useful as a means of raising funds and creating jobs. I hope that the principle of new clause 9 will be accepted.

Mr. Alton: On Second Reading, the Secretary of State said:

"I am also minded to outlaw the discounting of tickets and limiting rollover, which will help to avoid abuse."—[Official Report, 25 January 1993; Vol. 217, c. 722.]

It would have been better if no allowance for rollover had been made in the Bill, for the reasons which the Secretary of State advanced on Second Reading—that rollover allows syndicates to develop and leads to abuse. We should be concerned about the fact that rolling up prizes could lead to the discrediting of the national lottery and possibly, in due course, to the discrediting of the football pools.

I shall support the hon. Member for Crosby (Sir M. Thornton) because I believe that, if the provision is being made available for the lottery. It should also be made available for the football pools. However, it would have been better if the principle of equality were applied by allowing neither to roll over their prizes. Of course, it is still not too late for the Government to consider that idea.

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) rightly said that there should be fair and free competition but not a monopolistic practice. The lottery should certainly not be allowed to set out like a whale to swallow the minnows in the sea around it. It would be highly undesirable if the Bill were to complete its Report stage with provisions allowing only the national lottery but not the pools to roll over.

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley also mentioned the size of prizes. I am very apprehensive about such large prizes being offered. The devastating effect on the life of an average family of winning such large prizes has not been properly considered. I would prefer more modest prizes to be awarded, perhaps on a wider basis with smaller amounts of money being given to a larger number of winners. I am worried that we are feeding the idea that people should always want bigger, faster, better and more, which seems to be a feature of our society. It may be rather old-fashioned to say so, but we should not deliberately stimulate such an idea. I hope that the Government will consider that issue before the Bill reaches another place.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I am glad to have caught your eye at this stage in the proceedings, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because I may be able to help the House to reach a conclusion a little more speedily.

Choosing my words carefully when speaking to amendments ably moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), who has made a similar case today, I said that the Government remained to be persuaded that the rollover facility for the pools was necessary or desirable. In particular, I said that the circumstances in which the pools companies proposed to roll over prize money did not seem to be altogether fair and were certainly quite different from those in which the rollover would operate for the national lottery.

My hon. Friend's amendments would also have given the pools companies a free hand to roll over prize money in any circumstances they cared to invent, the only restriction being a limit of three in the number of successive rollovers. Had we accepted the amendments, the result would have been not fair competition between the pools and the national lottery but a clear competitive edge for the pools.

New clause 9, ably moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Sir M. Thornton), responds helpfully to some of the criticisms that I made in Committee. By providing for more limited rollover facilities, the new clause is a move in the right direction, but I regret that it does not go far enough. Let me take a few minutes to explain my continuing reservations.

We have been told by the big three pools companies that, under their present rules, the rollover arrangements set out in the new clause would produce six rollovers a year for Littlewoods, about a dozen for Vernons and perhaps 26 for Zetters. Of course, those figures are estimates; the actual number of rollovers could turn out to be higher. In any event, it would be open to the pools companies to change their rules of competition to produce more frequent rollovers. Let us compare that with what is likely to happen to the national lottery.

The experience of most other European state lotteries suggests that rollovers are used sparingly. Single rollovers might happen perhaps once or twice a year whereas successive rollovers would be extremely rare. We expect the operator of the national lottery to set the odds so as to produce a similar pattern in this country. The operator will, regardless, need to obtain prior clearance for the rules for any particular lottery from the Director General Office of the National Lottery.

Mr. Ashton: The Minister cites only the European experience. When I, my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, Central and Royton (Mr. Davies) and other members of the Select Committee went to America, we found that rollover occurred every week. People were convinced that that whipped up the frenzy about the big prize on Saturday night and that that was what brought in the money.

Mr. Lloyd: I accept that there are other ways of running national lotteries. Most lotteries abroad have rollovers only twice or three times a year, which is what we expect in this country, but I accept that other countries do things differently.

As I was saying, the pools companies would be free to set their own rules. However, the director general will want to ensure—I direct my remarks especially to the hon.

Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton)—that the rules are fair to the participants, and he will also be aware of public feeling against excessive first prizes. That point was made by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton).

New clause 9 would not, therefore, produce the level playing field sought by so many hon. Members. The national lottery, operating under the close supervision of Oflot, would roll over prize money perhaps once or twice a year. In contrast, the football pools would have rollovers six or more times a year and would have a free hand to change their rules to engineer more frequent rollovers. In such circumstances, the national lottery would—to repeat a phrase that has already been used—have the market rigged against it.

Mrs. Jane Kennedy: This is the first time that I have heard that argument. I understood that rollover occurred when a prize was not won in the draw, whether on the pools or in the lottery. How can one predict with such apparent accuracy how many rollovers there will be on the pools or in the lottery?

Mr. Lloyd: By chance. There are odds which can be predicted to a certain extent in the way that the rules are drawn up. The rules which the pools company suggested to us initially, and which I said in Committee I did not find very convincing or fair, meant that if there were one winner, he would receive the whole prize. However, if there were two winners, instead of them halving the prize between them, half would be rolled over for the following week and the two winners would each get a quarter of the prize. That was one suggestion.

The hon. Member for Mossley Hill mentioned spiralling jackpots. The fear was expressed in Committee that we could be turning the United Kingdom into a Las Vegas island. The new clause would allow that to happen but only with the pools, not with the national lottery. It would stoke up jackpots without let or hindrance. There would be pressure for the national lottery to compete and to ensure that it too had rollovers at least six times a year, perhaps more. The Bill could come to be seen as a Trojan horse that unleashed an explosion of jackpots—if jackpots can explode—for which I do not think the public would thank us in the long run.

For those reasons, I cannot accept new clause 9 in its present form. However, the passion and eloquence behind and in front of me, some of which I feel is still pent up and not yet unleashed—perhaps it will be unleashed after I have sat down—is very compelling. I am glad to be able to say that I am convinced that there is a good case for allowing the football pools to operate limited rollovers similar to the national lottery.

I can tell my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby, those who have spoken in favour of the new clause and those who would have liked to have done so that we intend to introduce our own proposals in another place to ensure that where rollover is involved the pools will enjoy similar freedom and opportunity to those enjoyed by the national lottery. I think that that was what the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) wanted.

In view of my assurance, I hope that my hon. Friend will feel that he has achieved his primary purpose in tabling the new clause and will be willing to withdrawn it so that the Government can introduce one in another place in due course.

Sir Malcolm Thornton: Perhaps I can assist the House and avoid the unseemly spectacle of so much pent-up emotion being unleashed. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister, who is correct. I seek parity between the pools and the lottery, and nothing more. In view of his assurance, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 10

POWERS AND DUTIES OF DIRECTOR GENERAL

'(1) The Secretary of State shall by regulations made by statutory instrument prescribe the powers and duties of the Director General under this Part; and such regulations shall be subject to an affirmative resolution of each House of Parliament.

(2) The Director General shall exercise his functions under this Part in the manner he considers the most likely to secure—

(a) that the National Lottery is run, and every lottery that forms part of it is promoted, with all due propriety, and

(b) that the interests of every participant in a lottery that forms part of the National Lottery are protected.

(3) Subject to subsection (2), the Director General shall in exercising those functions do his best to secure that the net proceeds of the National Lottery are as great as possible.

(4) In subsection (3) "the net proceeds of the National Lottery" means the sums that are paid to the Secretary of State by virtue of section 5(6).'.—[Sir Ivan Lawrence.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Sir Ivan Lawrence (Burton): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): With this it will be convenient to discuss at the same time the following amendments: No. 123, in clause 4, page 2, leave out lines 6 to 18.

No. 125, in clause 5, page 2, line 20, leave out 'body corporate', and insert 'charitable foundation.'.

No. 124, in page 2, line 39, leave out 'Secretary of State' and insert 'Director-General.'.

No. 126, in clause 6, page 3, line 7, leave out 'body corporate' and insert 'charitable foundation.'.

No. 127, in clause 11, page 5, leave out lines 23 to 29.

No. 128, in clause 19, page 9, line 9, leave out 'Secretary of State' and insert 'Director-General.'.

No. 129, in page 9, line 11, leave out 'Secretary of State' and insert 'The Director-General.'.

No. 130, in clause 20, page 9, line 15, leave out 'Secretary of State' and insert 'Director-General.'.

No. 131, in clause 22, in page 10, line 8, leave out 'Secretary of State' and insert 'Director-General.'.

No. 132, in clause 24, in page 10, line 28, leave out 'Secretary of State' and insert 'Director-General.'.

No. 133, in page 10, line 33, leave out 'Secretary of State' and insert 'Director-General.'.

No. 134, in page 10, line 33, leave out 'by order'.

No. 135, in page 10, line 37, leave out 'Secretary of State' and insert 'Director-General.'.

No. 136, in page 10, line 41, leave out 'Secretary of State' and insert 'Director-General.'.

No. 137, in page 10, line 44, leave out 'Secretary of State' and insert 'Director General.'.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

No. 138, in page 11, line 1, leave out 'Secretary of State' and insert 'Director General'.

No. 139, in clause 25, page 11, line 6, leave out 'Secretary of State' and insert 'Director General'.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: I can without immodesty claim some part in the conception of the thoroughly desirable institution of a national lottery that will benefit such good causes as the arts, sport, heritage and charities. Therefore, I have a kind of parental interest in the Bill. However, I am alarmed at the direction in which it looks as though the legislation is moving.

Before I explain my reasons, may I say how immensely grateful I am to my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker) who, when he was Home Secretary, took up the idea of a national lottery for good causes, and to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister for the imagination that he showed in making the national lottery an election commitment. I am also grateful to those of my right hon. Friends who have changed their minds on the matter and now support the idea, to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage and his Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, and to the Minister of State, Home Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Fareham (Mr. Lloyd), for turning the idea into a reality and for dealing with everyone's concerns so sensitively as the Bill has passed through its Committee stage and is now passing through its remaining stages. I hope that my right hon. Friends will treat what I am about to say with their customary consideration and seriousness, and that nothing that I say will be taken as diminishing their achievement.

In a nutshell, I am unhappy to see the national lottery developing alarming features which are not at all what I had in mind. First, there is far too much involvement by the Secretary of State and the Government, and too little independent arm's-length control without Government interference. Secondly, big business will be involved. What I had in mind was a lottery sponsored and supervised by the Government but run in all its essential elements not by big business but by a charitable foundation.

I was not permitted to serve on the Standing Committee, doubtless on the usual ground that the fewer people serving on a Standing Committee who have any knowledge of the subject the better, because such people would delay the proceedings with questions and suggestions for improvement. Even after the closer consideration that the Bill has been given in Committee, it is still beginning to look very different from what I had in mind.

I am encouraged to know that I am not alone in believing that the Government should keep the lottery at arm's length, and keep it as charitable as they can. Paragraph 13.62 of the report of the Royal Commission that considered a lottery from 1976 to 1978 said:

"One of the most appealing features of an independently administered but state sponsored national lottery for good causes is that it escapes or by-passes the normal Government decision making procedures for resource allocation. In practice, a Government of any party, subject to day to day public and political pressures, finds it impossible to devote more than meagre resources to good causes of the kind that are desirable rather than essential. But the paradox is that while each individual cause may not be essential, it is essential for the health of our community that some resources are devoted to such purposes. There is a crucial need in our society for a source of substantial funds to provide support of a kind with which any Government experiences great difficulty. The objective should not be to replace the function of central Government but rather to fill the gap created by the inevitable disappearance, in a society where the accumulation of private wealth has become much more difficult, of private support of worthy causes on a large scale. (There will be no new Nuffield Foundations.) The proceeds of a national lottery should not only be allocated outside the normal Government machinery: they should be immune, subject to annual scrutiny by Parliament, from Government influence."

My right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley said, when he made his contribution to the matter, that he—I cannot for the moment find the quotation——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. May I assist the hon. and learned Gentleman? He is presumably looking up his quotation about the powers and duties of the director general. That would help us forward.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: Oh yes, Mr. Deputy Speaker, of course I am addressing the matter of the director general and the charitable foundation, which are the subject matter of the amendments selected by Madam Speaker. I am not wandering one inch away from that, but I must——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. For a few seconds the hon. and learned Gentleman did not appear to be wandering anywhere. I was just trying to help him.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: That was very kind, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I am sure that a little good humour will leaven what might otherwise might be the tedium of my argument. I was saying that my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley, the former Home Secretary, also supported in his speeches the idea that the national lottery should be kept at arm's length from Government.

On the second limb of my amendments, the Royal Commission said:

"In this way a public body which we suggest should be called the National Lottery Board, analogous to the charitable foundations established in former years by individuals, would help many good causes across a wide spectrum of different activities. A national lottery for good causes is, therefore, a rare opportunity to improve, indirectly if not directly, the quality of British life."

The Royal Commission had in mind a charitable foundation, not a lottery run by big business.

Sadly, although those two matters are fundamental to the direction that the national lottery will take, I believe that no amendment along the lines that I have suggested was tabled in Committee, nor was the point extensively argued or discussed, if it was discussed at all. Unfortunately, when I made my speech on Second Reading I did not remember that I had been called at a time when there was a 10-minute limit on speeches, so just as I was about to voice my concerns about the Bill, I was stopped. If the Official Report is correct, I was stopped a minute before my time. Had I had that extra minute I would have been able to float the subjects and they would have been taken up in Committee. That is why I have been left to table the amendments and the new clause, which I hope the Government will consider.

I believe that the Government should be more at arm's length from the lottery, because what is needed in that great enterprise—it is an exciting, fun enterprise, which we hope will stimulate the British people's imagination—is not the dead hand of the state, which the Government have turned away from everywhere else, but the imaginative stimulation of an independent decision-making procedure.

An agency is needed. In every other area, we are moving towards agencies at arm's length, agencies with directors general, and we should not be inhibited from following here the same process which we think is so important in many other areas of our political life.

So long as the Secretary of State has control of the purse strings, the state lottery will be vulnerable to the greedy and lustful attentions of any future hard-pressed Chancellor of the Exchequer. I hope that Conservative Chancellors will not be hard-pressed or greedy as the years move on, but we cannot guarantee that that will be the position for all time.

It was the intention of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley not to substitute lottery money for money that might be raised by taxation. He said in the House that he was against additionality. He said:

"Once fully developed, it could raise up to £1 billion a year for good causes. I must emphasise that this will be additional funding. The Government do not intend that the money provided from the lottery should substitute for existing expenditure programmes. Nor do we believe that lottery proceeds should go to the main areas of public expenditure, such as the national health service. These services are of fundamental importance to the community and must continue to be funded by the Exchequer in the normal way." —[Official Report, 6 March 1992; Vol. 205, c. 563.]

I apologise to my right hon. Friend for the way in which I have delivered what would have been a perfect delivery coming from him.

7.30 pm

The point is this. Where is my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley? He is no longer Home Secretary and no longer a Minister in charge of these matters. He is now on the relatively powerless Back Benches with the rest of us. Such undertakings cannot be guaranteed from Government to Government. All that can guarantee that there will be no additionality is the enshrinement of protective measures in the Bill. The most important of those would be to take away the power of the Secretary of State to control the running of the national lottery. That point should be enshrined in the Bill.

Mr. Ian McCartney (Makerfield): There is already additionality in the national health service budget. Scanners, for example, are provided almost entirely through public subscription by the running of local lotteries and other activities. Of the 78 scanners purchased in England, 52 were purchased by the local community and the resources for them are still being provided by the local community. The Department of Health gives no money for the maintenance of those scanners. The problem raised by the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence) is already happening. The Government should address themselves to his comments and should give some concrete commitment. If they do not, additionality will come into play in a range of other services.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: I half agree with the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney). I see no reason why the desire of the community to raise money for important equipment for its local hospital should be stopped, but I am concerned that no part of the essence of the national health service or of any such vital control activities should be funded out of the national lottery. Such areas should be funded out of taxation in the normal way and that should remain the case. There should be no temptation for the Government to use the national lottery for such purposes, and that is why I quoted the words of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley. As the Minister then in charge of the lottery, he stated that view.

Mr. Andrew Hargreaves (Birmingham, Hall Green): My hon. and learned Friend spoke of the relative powerlessness of Back-Bench Members. It was such relatively powerless hon. Members who secured from the Minister a valuable commitment, which is embodied in new clause 7, that bodies that receive funds from the national lottery will have to account wholly separately for the moneys they receive. Although that will not ring-fence the money in the way that some people would like, it will bring about total transparency so that all of us in the Chamber and people elsewhere can see how the funds are being used. We can then make our own comparison with Government funding.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: That is a substantial step forward, and I welcome it as my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. Hargreaves) has done. However, when the Minister turns to Back-Bench Members, whatever their power, and says, "It is vital for the maintenance of the national health service that we should decide to use some of the lottery money," will my hon. Friend go into the Lobby against the Government and against the party? He may well be as brave as some of my hon. Friends have been in the debates on the Maastricht treaty, but the point is that they are not winning. With the best will in the world, ring fencing cannot be achieved unless we take away some of the powers given to the Secretary of State. I say nothing against him personally, because I know that he will operate the lottery with as much good will as is humanly possible.

I have no doubt that the same undertaking that there would be no additionality was given about the Irish state lottery. But, as a journalist said in The Irish Times last week, the Irish lottery is accused of deviating

"so far from the original intentions of providing funds for arts, sports and community development, and it has largely become a slush fund to buttress inadequate Exchequer spending."

I do not know how accurate that view is, but I believe that it shows that, six months or so into a national lottery, it can be easy for a modern Government to turn to the lottery to fund some of their necessary state expenditure.

We must realise that the more money is taken in tax from the lottery, the less will be available for art, for sport, for heritage and for charities. Irish state funding for sport was reduced dramatically shortly after the lottery started. The purposes of the lottery have been modified and sport has suffered. Ireland still does not have enough Olympic-sized swimming pools, and it has almost no large sports arenas. As Mary Harney, a prominent Irish politician, said last week at a conference in England on the national lottery, there is a need to make the lottery "politician-proof".

The lottery will be tax-productive enough without tax being deducted from the institution itself at source. It will generate thousands of jobs. It will make small businesses and corner shops more productive and thus keep them in existence. It will stimulate the sport, arts, heritage and construction industries. Increased taxes will roll in. If so much power is given to the Secretary of State that he is able to introduce taxation at source for the lottery, the good causes will lose out all along the line.

That is why I tabled amendments Nos. 123 and 127, with 24 consequential amendments. I suggest in those amendments that the powers given to the Secretary of State should be transferred to an arm's-length director general. Amendment No.124 seeks to delete the requirement that the licensee shall pay such sums of money to the Secretary of State as the Secretary of State shall from time to time require.

The new clause would strengthen the powers of the director general. I hope that I am not alone in preferring a national lottery that is not in the Government's pocket. If the public believe it to be a Government activity, they may say, "We have given already" when the lottery seller invites their participation. Sport, arts, heritage and charities will be the losers.

The reasons why I believe that the lottery should be run as a charitable foundation are linked to my first point, as has been accepted in the grouping of amendments. People will support a charity, but they will be less willing to support the Exchequer. A charitable foundation properly led and guided by philanthropists can be better trusted to spend the money than a Government—even this Government—can be.

There are even more cogent reasons for having a charitable foundation rather than big business in control. The pools, which are big business, manage to devote only 27 per cent. of their take to prizes, while 32 per cent. of their turnover goes in expenses and profits.

A recent article in one of the national papers reported the expectations of prospective operators as being £100 million of profit a year. I have nothing against profit; our free enterprise system depends on it. However, if that profit diminishes the purposes of the national lottery, and if it deprives art, sport, heritage and the charities of £100 million a year, I am against it. We set up a national lottery so that the money should go to those causes.

The more big business becomes involved for profit, the more difficult it may prove to keep the workings of the national lottery free from abuse and scandal, either of which would destroy public confidence in the institution. Those involved in organised crime will be looking with greedy eyes at the profits of lotteries. A charitable foundation, properly run and controlled, will make their intervention less likely.

For those reasons, I have tabled amendments Nos. 125 and 126, which provide that the director general may license a charitable foundation to run the lottery, and not a body corporate—in other words, big business. I hope that I will not be alone in preferring a charitable national lottery to a lottery run by big business. The public are more likely to respond if they feel that a profit is not being made out of giving for good causes.

The new national lottery that is shortly to be born will be an immense force for good. When it gets going, the quality of our nation's life will benefit immensely. Up to £3 billion of additional finance will be raised, and £1 billion will be available to use for good causes. There will be improvements in our sports, with more stadiums, running tracks and swimming pools; in our arts, with enormous scope for more theatres and music; in our heritage and the protection of our national history and buildings; and in our charities—although they may or may not be adversely affected by the idea of the national lottery.

Perhaps most important of all, our children will grow up in a society t hat is physically and mentally healthier. They will have less need to take to the streets or look to crime for diversion or peer approval. Our society will be calmer, safer, healthier and more stable.

We must get the national lottery right: it must not get off on the wrong tack. I believe that the dead hand of Government and the dangerous and unnecessary hand of big business in running what is essentially a chartiable undertaking—which will be enormous fun if it is properly run—are simply not desirable. If my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State does not have time to consider these important measures today, I hope that he will at least undertake to think further on them. I look forward to the issue being pursued further—if necessary—in the other place.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I support new clause 10 and the amendments grouped with it, especially amendment No. 197, which provides that the director general may appoint such staff as he may determine. The intention behind the new clause and amendments is to stop the Government hijacking the national lottery, which they seem to me to have done. The amendments provide the basis for a hands-off operation to be conducted by an independent charitable foundation totally independent of the Government rather than by a profit-making organisation —not least because such arrangements will generate more trust among those in the community.

The arguments are simple and straightforward. The hon. and learned Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence) has covered them, so I shall be brief. There can always be the imputation of political patronage in the allocations determined by a Government body or agency. That imputation is always there and will always be made. The hon. and learned Member for Burton quoted The Irish Times, which talked of the Irish lottery being used as a slush fund: political imputations were being made about the allocations. This Government sincerely and honestly trust this Government. We can say objectively that they are as pure as driven slush, but there is always the imputation that the funds will be used in that fashion unless an independent charitable foundation handles them. I want to ensure that that happens, and the amendments provide the basis for that.

The amendments tackle a second problem—the danger that the Government will use the proceeds of the lottery as a substitute for funds allocated to the arts, sport or other purposes which should properly be sustained by the Government. The lottery promotion company, which put forward the idea of the establishment of a charitable body to run the lottery, has sensibly suggested that the management of that arm's-length structure should include representatives of the Arts Council, the Sports Council, the National Trust and so on. That will ensure not only proper co-ordination but that the lottery money is not being used as a substitute for Arts Council or Sports Council funding. The lottery represents a great opportunity, but if lottery money is simply used as a substitute for other forms of spending that are properly the responsibility of the Government, that opportunity will be missed.

We must ensure that we are talking not about substitute spending but about additional spending. In that sense, an independent body—particularly a charitable foundation —could act as a court of appeal. These days, if one develops an enemy on the Arts Council, one does not get one's grant. If there is an additional source of funding in the form of an independent charitable body, there can be a court of appeal.

A further great advantage of a charitable body is that it will enable us to avoid both the bureaucracy of a governmental body and the profiteering orientation of a lottery run by a private company. We certainly want to avoid the high administrative expenditure attached to other bodies. Amazingly, the Arts Council costs £7·8 million a year in administrative expenses alone. The administration costs of the Sports Council are £9·5 million a year and the regional arts bodies cost £8·3 million a year to run, which means that 20 per cent. of the money that they distribute goes in administrative expenses.

It is crucial that the punters know that all the money is going to dedicated purposes, that the overheads are low and that the lottery is run by a charitable organisation that they can trust. An independent charitable organisation can also give the lottery a long-term sense of purpose rather than its zig-zagging every which way in response to pressures from the Government.

The lottery represents one of the most exciting opportunities that we have had for many years. It gives us the opportunity to bring facilities to areas outside London, and I am anxious that money should be spent on a considerable scale outside London.

I used to go on holiday every year to a little village called Beg Meil in Brittany. It was enormously exciting to find that it had its own maison de culture—a centre for the performing arts, for exhibitions and for workshops and where facilities were made available for craftsmen and artists. All that was provided locally for a small community of about 1,000 people. Just think what the opportunities would be if we could provide in Grimsby the sort of auditorium that we need to attract theatre companies and to put on local performances, orchestral concerts, opera and pop. Most communities—indeed all communities—need such facilities, which could be provided from the funding that the national lottery will provide if it is efficiently and effectively run.

We have the opportunity of a cultural renaissance and provision of facilities on a huge scale outside London in communities which need them and which are deprived of them at present—if we run the national lottery on the proper basis for which the amendments provide.

Mr. Corbett: I shall be very brief. Ever since the idea of a national lottery was first mooted, there has been a debate about the best basis on which to establish it. The Library issued an intriguing note in January about the history of lotteries in Britain. It seems that they all collapsed in scandal. Although memories of such things may not be fresh in the minds of those in the Department of National Heritage, I have no doubt that they are fresh in the minds of those in the Home Office. If we are to run a lottery for the purposes set out in the Bill, all the best and sensible steps must be taken to safeguard the interests of those who participate in the lottery so that some of their ticket money goes to good causes.

I understand the amazement of the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence) about the fact that the Government have chosen to run the lottery almost as a nationalised lottery instead of relying on the private sector to deliver it with the necessary safeguards from this place.

We debated such issues on Second Reading and in Committee. We must ensure that the moneys generated by the national lottery in no way substitute for the proper investment of public funds in the good causes listed in the Bill. It is proper that there should be concern about that point.

We were frustrated when we tried to write that provision into the Bill, partly because it was not the Committee's concern to set the level at which the Chancellor of the Exchequer would dip his fingers into the price of tickets, and partly for the broad reason that levels of spending by Governments year on year will alter for a variety of reasons, some good and some bad. There is no reason why those levels should not change over time.

It is difficult to nail down something that is moving. We have now decided that we want what my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) has described as transparent accounts so that, as the hon.

[Mr. Corbett]

Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) said, when we see the accounts and compare them with the level of Government spending in that financial year, we can draw our own conclusions about whether any substitution has taken place.

The ambition to avoid substitution is perfectly clear and I believe that that ambition is shared by hon. Members on both sides of the House. On those grounds, there is a great attraction in the new clause and the amendments suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Burton. However, I must point out to the hon. and learned Gentleman and to my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell)—I saw the Home Secretary in the Chamber a moment or two ago and perhaps he has been bought another pair of shoes—that it is not clear from the amendments whether the setting up of a charitable foundation would mean that no tax would be payable on the price of a ticket.

If there is any form of tax, one of the ambitions to make it impossible for the Government to engage in substitution would go out the window. While there is a tax, demonstably it can be altered over time. It can go up or down and I suspect that I know in which direction it is likely to go.

In an enterprise of this kind, we are concerned to ensure that there is more to it than simply the making of money. It is not that we are anti-profit, but the exercise is not wholly or mainly about putting dividends into the pockets of private people. The whole purpose of the lottery, as described by the Secretary of State, the Minister and others, is to raise new money for the good causes on the face of the Bill. If that is the case, I see risks in relying on the private sector to ensure that that is achieved in an open and accountable way, as is broadly proposed in the Bill, because the private sector will face other pressures.

The Minister may want to think very deeply about my next point before the lottery is up and running. Under the arrangements proposed by the Government, the lottery will rely to a large extent on the competence of the people in the distribution bodies who will need to build on and extend the skills that they presently exercise when handling money from Government by way of grants.

My hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby referred to what, on the face of it, appears to be a fairly high proportion of the moneys that go on administration. The Minister will be as aware as I am of criticisms which are made from time to time about what I would broadly describe as bureaucracy around the Arts Council and the Sports Council. Such claims are perhaps easily made.

The Sports Council, the Arts Council and similar bodies were designed to listen to, meet and represent the constituent bodies that are part of the particular sectors of sport, the arts or whatever. Trying to make such a body more accountable and democratic will cost more in administration than a purely commercial exercise. There is a price tag involved, although it need not be a large amount.

That is a price worth paying to achieve that involvement. It is also a price worth paying to have bodies that are open and accountable to those on whose behalf they were set up by the House and, in addition, accountable to the House where—if not on the Floor of the House then through the Select Committee system—they can be asked to explain what they have been up to.

I do not want to finish before paying tribute, as I am sure we all do, to the work of Denis Vaughan, the executive director of the Lottery Promotion Company. He has been extremely persistent in his efforts to get a national lottery off the ground. He feels—I perhaps share this sentiment to some extent—that his case, which is reflected in the amendments, has not received a satisfactory response from the Government. The Government have not established whether their proposal is unarguably better than the charitable foundation route suggested.

Even at this late stage, and before the Bill goes to another place, the Government should take another look at the mechanics and return to the position as it was when we set out to put the Bill on the statute book. We should try to have a system that can persuade people that there is no intention to have substitution. Although I accept that, it must be demonstrated. Perhaps we can find a better way to demonstrate that to people whom we want to participate in the national lottery.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: I welcome the tribute that the hon. Gentleman has bestowed on Denis Vaughan and the Lottery Promotion Company, but does he realise that Denis Vaughan is not alone in his view? Millions of people would prefer the lottery to be run as a charitable foundation, rather than as big business: they would like it to be a free foundation, rather than being in the grip of the Secretary of State and the director general.

Mr. Corbett: That is an important point, but, although the mechanics involved in achieving the desired result are not unimportant, the central issue is substitution. I would have been more impressed by the case that has been made had it been founded on the principle that the Chancellor should take no tax from a charitable foundation. That may or may not be possible.

I know that the Government are aware of our concerns. Perhaps, in the other place, they will find a way to demonstrate that the fears expressed by some hon. Members today bear no relation to their intentions.

8 pm

Mr. Key: I pay tribute to the work that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence) has done for some years. He must be very proud of the progress that the Bill has made, but he must also be frustrated by the fact that it is not proceeding in the exact form that he planned. Having read the debate that he secured just over a year ago, before the general election, I know that his idea of a national lottery attracted wide support—and someone else who has attracted wide support and has campaigned for years is Denis Vaughan, to whom tribute has already been paid.

Let me answer some of the specific points that have been made before dealing with the principles. New clause 10 seeks to allow Parliament to prescribe the powers and duties of the director general by affirmative resolution of both Houses; that, of course, is already in the Bill. Amendment No. 127 would leave the Secretary of State with no means of controlling, for example, certain sorts of game that might be considered undesirable on social policy grounds, but which would not give the director general similar cause for concern.

Amendments Nos. 124 and 128 to 158 would change the director general's role entirely: instead of taking sole charge of the regulation of the lottery and the licensing of the game—which together would constitute no small task—the director general would also have a controlling role in the distribution of the money available for good causes.

One of the strongest points that emerged from the consultation period that followed the White Paper's publication last year was that the functions of running the game and distributing the money should be kept separate. The powers that the amendments would give the director general would allow him to decide on, for example, changes in the shares going to each of the five beneficiary sectors and on the matters that the distributing bodies should take into account when deciding on grant applications.

Amendment No. 160 would give the director general complete discretion in regard to the number of staff in Oflot, and their pay and conditions. Amendments Nos. 125 and 126 would make it a statutory requirement that the licence to run the lottery, and the licences to run games as part of the lottery, could be held only by a charitable foundation. There is nothing to suggest that a charitable organisation would be able to introduce a more successful United Kingdom lottery than any other organisation. Amendment No. 159 would remove the Secretary of State's power to enforce the Bill's provisions as appropriate—a power that is not unusual in legislation.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton is inviting us to go back to the drawing board—to produce a completely different national lottery. Let me make it clear that the Government have been thinking about and working on the lottery idea for more than a year. We have sought advice widely; we have examined the experience of more than 50 lotteries around the world. We have taken a view on a number of difficult issues and have come up with an animal which is indeed rather different from the original proposals of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker) before the general election. We have done that for good reasons—precisely the same reasons that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton now suggests that we consider.

First, there is the suggestion that the lottery should be politician-free. Everything that the Bill is designed to achieve is indeed at arm's length from Ministers. Ministers will not be able to decide who is given any money; that will be entirely up to the distributing bodies. We decided to establish more than one such body, for the good reason that a single body would constitute another substantial bureaucracy, duplicating the expertise that already existed in the bodies we chose—the Sports Council, the Arts Council and the National Heritage Memorial Fund. We decided that, rather than establishing a single ministerial-led body to deal with charities, it would be far better to establish a system with the charities board that would have the confidence of charities, which would know that it would distribute money fairly between charities and across the nation.

A different set of considerations apply to getting the money in. We felt that the efficiency of the lottery should be paramount and that the maximum possible sum should be raised for good causes. There are various ways of approaching that aim. We decided that the most efficient private-sector operations should be invited to compete and that competitive tendering was most likely to put downward pressure on profits, to ensure that excess profits were eliminated and to maximise the efficiency of the machinery for securing the money.

There is, of course, another overriding factor, in the form of the members of the public who are to part with good money. The main objective of the lottery is to provide fun and prizes for those who put up the stakes. We decided—admittedly, it was not a difficult judgment to make—that the chance of winning was what would encourage people to have a bit of fun, in the same spirit in which they might buy a raffle ticket for their local church or a political party. We felt that people's motives for taking part in a national lottery would be quite different from their motives in giving money to a charity or other good cause at a time of crisis. We believe that those motives will continue to flourish in this country, as in others. There should be no confusion in people's minds between charities and the efficiency of a national lottery.

Mr. Tracey: The House appreciates the way in which my hon. Friend is setting out the argument, but he must be aware that, in one regard, the lottery is not politician-free. I refer to the level of taxation. The public, and the various good causes that will receive the proceeds of the lottery, are still very unhappy, even with a 12 per cent. rate. I know that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said that he had originally envisaged a higher rate, but 12 per cent. is still too high.

Mr. Key: I was coming to that, as they say. The taxation issue is crucial. My right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley and others always envisaged a tax take; it is a fallacy to pretend that, if the whole operation were run as a charitable foundation, it would somehow escape taxation. Taxation is right for a national lottery because expenditure is displaced from other parts of the economy on which tax would be levied.

Mr. Renton: I apologise for interrupting my hon. Friend in full flood, but I must tell him that I disagree with his comment about the White Paper produced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker). As Minister for the Arts at the time, I played a part in its composition: perhaps over-optimistically, we felt that we had a real chance of getting away with no tax at all. [Laughterter..] I understand why hon. Members laugh at our naivety, but I am merely taking up my hon. Friend the Minister.

I fully understand the work that has gone into developing the model in the past year, and that other models around the world have been looked at. But, as my hon. Friend will know, the Irish national lottery, which I visited twice and which impressed me with the way in which it was run, pays no tax. It is an arm of the treasury, but it pays no tax. We hoped that perhaps we would get Another point that my hon. Friend may consider—forgive me, Mr. Deputy Speaker; I shall bring my intervention to a close soon—is that the real difficulty is that if an arts company already does not find favour with the Arts Council for subjective reasons, perhaps because it does not like the quality of its performances, and therefore does not receive the amount of subsidy for its current expenses which it feels that it deserves, it will have to go back to the same lady bountiful for its capital requirements from the national lottery. It could lose on both counts.

Mr. Key: My right hon. Friend is far more experienced in the art of politics and the art of the possible than me, but he was perhaps over-optimistic in thinking that there might be no tax on the national lottery. Of course, he was there and I was not. If he says that that is what he and the Government envisaged at that time, I accept it. But it was always my understanding that it was accepted that there would be some level of taxation.

The point on which I shall finish is central to the argument about the national lottery. We decided that it was crucial that, if changes were to be made to the lottery, they should be made by Parliament. We decided that Parliament should have the last say and that the operators and distributors should ultimately be responsible to Parliament through the Director General of Oflot and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage.

Probity and transparency are fundamental to the success of a national lottery anywhere in the world. Once there is any idea in the minds of the public that a fiddle is going on at any level, the first thing that happens is that receipts drop off sharply. That is why we have improved the transparency and accountability of the lottery since the Bill first appeared, as we have been requested to do. But we do not want a director general of some charitable foundation to decide who gets what. We believe that the construction of the lottery with 20 per cent. bands is sensible.

We shall come to the millennium fund later. We believe that it should receive 20 per cent. After the millennium, the amount will reduce and that money will go to the other four areas. So Parliament will have the final say. It will be able to change the 20 per cent. distribution figures. Parliament will be responsible for ensuring that there are fair shares for all the beneficiaries and that the Government keep their word on additionality.

We could not have been more clear about additionality. It would not have been possible to make it clearer that the money for the national lottery was outside the planning total and that we have no intention of substituting it for other money. However, ultimately substitution will be in the hands of the distributors. For example, if a distributor in sport slips into the habit of giving grants for parts of sport which would normally be funded by a local authority or the Sports Council, it will have only itself to blame if in future years a Chancellor of another political hue said, "They are funding that themselves now."

The intention is clear. We have done all that we can. I hope that I have answered my hon. and learned Friend in the serious way in which his arguments should be addressed. He invites us to start again and produce a different model of national lottery. His new clause and amendments would certainly have that effect. They would take us back to the drawing board. I could not recommend that to the House for a good reason. Every day that we delay the implementation of the national lottery, good causes will suffer.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. The hon. and learned Gentleman has the right to reply.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for his helpful and well-meaning speech. I appreciate that the argument is not one-sided. Things can be said on both sides—[Interruption.] If my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman) will allow me to think without babbling away behind me, I shall be grateful and my remarks will be shorter.

I fail to see how my hon. Friend the Minister can sustain the argument that the national lottery will be politician-free in the light of clause 11, which says:

"The Director General shall in exercising his functions under sections 5 to 10 comply with any directions that he may be given by the Secretary of State."

8.15 pm

Clause 5(6) clearly states:

"A licence under this section shall include a condition requiring the licensee to pay to the Secretary of State at such times as may be determined by or under the licence such sums out of the proceeds of lotteries forming part of the National Lottery as may be so determined."

He who pays the piper calls the tune and he who takes the money also calls the tune. That is the politician.

It would be sensible if I did not press the new clause at this stage because it is clear that the Government of a year ago had a different view from that of the Government of today about how the national lottery should proceed. If such a change can take place, perhaps with a little more time the change can be reversed. That time will be provided by due consideration in the other place. That consideration will not be helped if I press the new clause tonight. So with the leave of the House, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 4

Overriding duties of the Secretary of State and Director General

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): I beg to move amendment No. 8, in page 2, line 16, at end insert—

'( ) The Secretary of State shall provide for monitoring to be undertaken in order to determine the effect, if any, of the National Lottery on the level of charitable income.'

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 9, in page 6, line 37, at end insert—

'; and such report shall include an estimate of the effect, if any, of the National Lottery on the level of charitable income during that financial year.'.

Mr. Howarth: The purpose of the amendment is to place an overriding duty on the Secretary of State to ensure that the effects of the national lottery on charitable donation income are identified and monitored. That was, indeed, a recommendation of the National Heritage Select Committee. Several members of the Committee have participated in our debates this afternoon.

Paragraph 11 of the Select Committee's report of 14 January 1993 states:

"A fourth matter of concern to the Committee relates to the position of charities and the likely impact of the Lottery on their resources. The Bill contains proposals intended to make small charitable lotteries more attractive. But the Committee remains concerned that competition from the National Lottery will have an adverse effect on the level of funds donated to charities. Nor is it convinced that the distribution of funds through the new National Lottery Charities Board will leave no individual charity in a worse position. The Committee accordingly recommends that the Department of National Heritage should monitor the possible impact of the National Lottery on charities."

It is against that background, and because I feel that it is extremely important that monitoring should take place, that I have tabled amendments Nos. 8 and 9.

I am glad that amendment No. 8 was selected. I believe for two reasons that it is preferable that the duty to monitor be placed on the Secretary of State. First, it will ensure that the Secretary of State has control of the methodology of monitoring. Secondly, it should mean that the funding necessary to conduct the exercise will come from the Department rather than from the proceeds of the lottery. Placing that general duty on the Secretary of State will make it possible for the appropriate research to be carried out into any area where the possible effect of the national lottery on charitable income may be a matter of concern.

Three areas of concern have already been identified. Rigorous impartial research to establish the position in each of those areas as the national lottery becomes established and proceeds would make it possible to determine whether any action to restore the financial position of charities were required. I believe that the Government ought to accept this responsibility since they are creating the national lottery and unleashing an immense force, the effects of which cannot be predicted with precision but which will undoubtedly be important.

The first area of concern that I wish to see monitored is that of any possible reduction in funding from local and central Government. I fully accept the genuineness of my hon. Friend's pledges that it is the Government's intention that the resources generated by the national lottery should be additional to any funding that the Government would in the ordinary way provide for the good causes that will also be beneficiaries of the lottery. It is critical that the generation of funds from the national lottery does not, over time, lead to a reduction in the existing funding of charities from either local or central Government.

I greatly welcome what I regard as a significant statement made by my hon. Friend the Minister in the previous debate, when he made it clear that it was his view that Parliament should monitor the issue of additionality. If we are to monitor, we will need the data that a monitoring exercise sponsored by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State would provide.

It is disappointing to hon. Members on both sides of the House that the Government have not found a way to write their pledge on additionality in watertight terms into the Bill. To be fair, I accept that that is an extremely difficult thing to do—I cannot see how it can be done—but the fact that it is impossible to do so in the way that we would desire, makes it all the more important that the monitoring should take place.

The second concern that should be monitored is the impact that the national lottery may have on the income from small charitable lotteries. There are reasons to be apprehensive that the introduction of the national lottery may lead to a decline in charitable income from small lotteries, and it is a matter of regret that the Government rejected amendments in Committee to prevent the use by the national lottery of games giving an instant win. I would have preferred that the Government had been willing to allow charities to have a clear run in instant lotteries. That would still leave the national lottery immense scope to raise funds for its purposes.

The third area of concern that ought to be monitored is the impact that the national lottery will undoubtedly have on charitable donations. Research carried out by the National Council for Voluntary Organisations suggests that the level of charitable giving will decline with the advent of the national lottery. My hon. Friend the Minister again made it clear that, in the context of taxation, the Government accept that the national lottery will displace expenditure elsewhere. That is the basis on which the Minister sought to justify the level of taxation that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has proposed. If expenditure on the national lottery displaces expenditure in other areas, that will obviously include charitable giving and it is important that we should follow exactly what happens.

The NCVO has estimated, based on market research conducted by NOP that the national lottery could lead to a loss in charitable donations income of around £250 million per year or 7 per cent. of the income currently received by charities from the public. That figure of £250 million has been decried as an exaggeration. It is, of course, based on certain assumptions and scenarios. The NOP survey concluded that the lottery is perceived by the public as a scheme to benefit "good causes". That picture of the lottery, as revealed by that survey, is one which accurately reflects the Government's own purpose.

The NCVO concluded from that survey that £230 million is likely to be lost in donation income. That figure, I fear, is within the realms of possibility. I hope that those of us who have this apprehension are proved wrong, but it is on the cards that we could see a diversion of the donations given to charity of that order.

I welcome the commitment given on Second Reading by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, and confirmed by the Minister in Committee, that it is the Government's intention that the lottery will not be promoted in ways likely to lead to a reduction in donation income. I should like that commitment to be expressed in the Bill. Even if forswearing that kind of promotion may mean that the loss to the sector proves to be less than the 7 per cent. that I mentioned, research still suggests that it could well be in the region of 4 per cent. of donation income.

The report of the Rothschild royal commission on gambling quoted its own market research, conducted in 1978. That research suggested that the lottery would result in a loss in income to charities of about 4 per cent. More recently, the report of D&M Economic Consultants, commissioned in 1991 by the Irish An Post National Lottery company, also revealed that 4 per cent. of those who bought Irish state lottery tickets said that, in the absence of the state lottery, they would have given the money to one charity or another.

I concede that market research has its limitations. It does, after all, ask people to consider their likely future actions and none of us can be certain of them, not even Ministers, to their own surprise, they may be moved to accept amendments—if not today, perhaps in another place. However, as the Rothschild royal commission accepted, market research is the best means that we have to reach a judgment about the likely activity of the public in such matters.

A drop of 4 per cent. in donation income may not sound terrible, but given the scale of charitable giving in this country, it would mean a considerable loss in cash terms. The same NOP survey revealed that the public donated £3·1 billion to charity in 1992. A drop of 4 per cent. in that income would mean a loss of £120 milion per annum. A loss in income on such a scale would mean a reduction in services to some of the most vulnerable groups in our society that the charities serve.

In Committee, my hon. Friend the Minister referred to the overriding duty placed by the Bill on the director general and the Secretary of State to maximise the proceeds available to beneficiaries from the lottery. The expressed aim of the Bill is to ensure that the lottery generates maximum additional resources for the specified "good causes"—arts, sport, heritage and charities. The available evidence, however, suggests that the lottery would result in a reduction in donation income and public support to charities.

It is possible that lottery proceeds may fail even to compensate for the income lost to charities as a result of the lottery. Surely it is intended that proceeds from the lottery will not only compensate for any loss, but provide additional new money. In Committee, the Minister said that the Government had acknowledged that probable outcome by including charities in the list of beneficiaries, which was not part of the original intention, on the assumption that proceeds from the lottery would, in part, compensate for the resulting drop in income. That decision has been greatly welcomed.

The corollary of the Government's concern that they will wish to satisfy themselves about the practical effect of their policy. As things are, however, nothing in the Bill provides for the effect of the lottery on charities to be monitored. It is vital that its impact on voluntary sector donation income is monitored and assessed.

In Committee, my hon. Friend the Minister also gave a welcome assurance that the impact of the lottery on voluntary sector income would be taken into account when beneficiary shares come to be reviewed. That being so, surely it is sensible to incorporate amendment No. 8, or something along the same lines, to ensure that the Government have the data and the information on which to base their consideration of the effect of the lottery on donations to charities.

Mr. Orme: The issue of additionality is important, because there are signs that the Government are considering funding the millennium fund for the year 2000, out of lottery proceeds. Who is to say that the Government would have donated such money to that fund if those lottery proceeds were not available? This issue is important because hon. Members on both sides of the House are concerned about it. How does one check it? How can one tell what the Government would have put into sport or the arts without it? It is only human nature, is it not? My experience of the Treasury, as a Minister and as a Member, is that it cannot be trusted when it comes to finance on this sort of scale.

I accept that the Government have given an undertaking that lottery proceeds should be additional to the funds provided by normal Government expenditure programmes, but there is no evidence of how it will be programmed or monitored. Experience in other countries suggests that unless very firm measures are put in place this undertaking will be eroded after a relatively short time. Elsewhere in the world lottery proceeds are dedicated to particular causes, as they will be in the United Kingdom, either to the arts or to sport. The mention of sport prompts me to refer to the rather small attendance in the Chamber this evening which may have something to do with the fact that England is playing Holland at the moment.

Mr. Corbett: What is the score?

8.30 pm

Mr. Orme: I have no idea, but England is playing Holland at Wembley at the present time, and some of our thoughts are with the English team.

Let me give an example of the erosion of funding. In 1976, the Massachusetts state lottery was set up to raise money for the arts. State funding from taxation for the arts gradually decreased until by 1992 all public funding in that state had stopped. Similarly in New Zealand a lottery for the arts was set up in 1987. For the next three years Government funding of the arts remained at the same level, although without any increase for inflation. Four years after the lottery was established, the Government grant for the arts in New Zealand was cut by half.

We must take these things into account. For instance, a study has shown that, in the state of New York, the decline in support for education programmes set in five years after the establishment of the lottery. In New Jersey it was six years. However, in Michigan and Illinois, the states in the study which has most recently established their lotteries, the decline in expenditure by the state on education was almost immediate.

We are, of course, opposed to any of this money going into education or social services or any other particular area—a point that was made by the right hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton). But I warn the House that there will be pressure from some sections of the public that this be taken into account, and unless the guidelines are very firmly established and hon. Members clearly stipulate what they want to happen, the effect could be disastrous.

The evidence from Ireland regarding additionality is even more striking. The hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) referred to DKM carrying out research in 1989 on behalf of the Irish An Post lottery company. It estimated that, between 1987 and 1989, 49 per cent. of lottery funding substituted for Government expenditure and only 51 per cent. of the total received by the beneficiaries from lottery proceeds represented new money.

In the light of this evidence, it is of the utmost importance that the monitoring proposed in the amendment should also take into account the effect of the lottery on public support of causes benefiting from the lottery. This is particularly important for the charitable and voluntary sectors. Voluntary organisations currently receive almost £600 million per annum in support from local authorities. A National Council for Voluntary Organisations survey in 1991 revealed that in the previous financial year this funding had been cut by almost £29 million.

Local authority support for voluntary organisations is discretionary. It is therefore one of the areas of local authority funding most under threat at times when public expenditure is tight. The availability of new sources of funding locally, such as the lottery, may tempt local authorities into using it as a justification for further reducing their support for voluntary organisations.

The Government have made it clear that they do not intend lottery proceeds to be a substitute for local and central Government support for charities, the arts, sports and heritage projects. They have made that declaration. But we want a guarantee that this will not take place, and many of us are concerned that, in the case of a new opera house or even the development of Covent Garden, or some other spectacular development, much of the money could be siphoned off into that project when it should be funded by the state because of its national status.

Monitoring mechanisms are therefore important. I do not expect the Government to accept these amendments of clauses 8 and 9. Nevertheless, I hope that they will take into account the importance of additionality and monitoring and of the fact that many people will judge the success or otherwise of the national lottery by its development and by its independence from the Government, not least from the Treasury.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): I support the amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon. The amendment came about as a result of fears voiced to us by a considerable number of charitable and voluntary organisations which can see themselves being totally swamped by an enormously successful national lottery. I fear that the Government are almost backing away from envisaging just the kind of figures that the lottery could bring in. Experts who have studied lotteries in other countries and based their analysis on the success of those lotteries estimate that, within four years of being established, a national lottery in this country could bring in an income of about £2·8 billion in one year or, to put it differently, £55 million a week.

Just how can small voluntary or charitable organisations stand up to such a stupendous success unless provision is made to protect their interests? It is therefore vital that the Government not only monitor the progress of the income of voluntary organisations but put that commitment to monitoring in the Bill so that there will be no doubt about their sincerity. I know that they have taken the point and that it has been heard in Committee. Nevertheless, there is a slight flaw—the belief that somehow or other all will be well on the day.

The voluntary organisations have a real concern that they could be totally overwhelmed and that their donation income could sink unless we pay due attention to the problem. We must make sure that the money they lose is more than made up by additionality which could accrue from the national lottery. I support the amendment, and I trust that those considerations will be taken into account.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): I declare an interest, although not a financial one, in two charities: the Foundation for Management Education and the Cancer Research Campaign, both of which have reason to expect—particularly the latter—that their incomes will be adversely affected by the Bill.

Historians may look back on this as the point when the country first failed to match its aspirations, with Exchequer money, by backing projects that it valued with taxpayers' money. The passage of this Bill is likely to mark the point when a great nation turned away from funding important projects in the arts and in sport in this way. Instead, like the Roman empire in decline, we have begun to rely on lotteries and the impulse of greed to meet our aspirations. Charities will probably begin to feel the adverse effects of the change more immediately than any other sector.

The hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) was right to try to chart the consequences of what we are doing.

Mr. Renton: I do not want to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but he has just made the most astonishing statement. Does he not know that the Sydney opera house was built from the proceeds of a lottery? No one could possibly call Australia a declining or tired nation. How was the British museum built, if not from funds raised in a lottery? It was built to house the Sloane collection in the second half of the 18th century. We are only going back to the same means of raising money for good causes that was followed successfully by our Georgian and Victorian ancestors.

Mr. Maclennan: Our Georgian and Victorian ancestors —particularly the Victorians, who are often prayed in aid by the Government—had a greater sense of civic pride and responsibility. The great municipal collections and institutions were the result of private giving or of municipal endowment. Only in the 20th century have we sought, using taxpayers' money, to establish institutions on the scale that we have come to enjoy. It is a sad comment on the decline of this country that the Government have begun clutching at straws, for that is what this Bill amounts to. Some people have been remarkably naive to believe that the Bill will have any lasting beneficial effects on the good causes that it purports to help.

I say "naive", because it is not possible to write into the Bill any sort of protection for additionality. Ministers have given their word in this respect in earlier debates, but already the Department of National Heritage has been blighted. I cannot prove this, but I would be astonished if the Minister said that the Chief Secretary to the Treasury did not tell him during the last public expenditure round, in which the Department took a savage cut by comparison with other Departments, that he could look forward to the bounty of a national lottery to make up the shortfall in the Department's vote. That was but a foretaste of what is to come. Future public expenditure rounds will show up the consequences of this unfortunate measure.

8.45 pm

The charities did not ask for this. The Government have claimed that charities will be protected, in the sense that they will benefit. To the extent that that intention is translated into fact, it will be necessary to judge the impact on charitable giving. The hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon has done us a valuable service, although it will be very difficult to chart the impact charity by charity, as people change from putting something in the tin proffered at the underground station on behalf of guide dogs for the blind and instead buy lottery tickets from a kiosk. That this change will happen, however, is certain. I hope that the Government will respond positively to the amendment.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I can well understand the concerns voiced by my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) and other hon. Members about the effect of the national lottery on voluntary organisations' incomes. Much of the debate inside and outside Parliament since the national lottery became a real prospect has centred on this.

[Mr. Peter Lloyd]

The evidence from abroad is inconclusive, but I believe that most people will go on giving to their preferred charities and taking part in their small lotteries, which the Bill includes major measures to encourage.

Nevertheless, I have a great deal of sympathy with the motives behind the amendments. I know that my hon. Friends the Members for Stratford-on-Avon and for Sutton and Cheam (Lady O. Maitland) have actively sought to protect the interests and incomes of charities in the new situation that the Bill will create. I applaud their objectives, although I do not think that they will be effectively advanced by adopting these amendments at this time.

In any survey it would be very difficult to separate beyond dispute the impact of the lottery from the effect of other factors, such as changes in the economic climate or in the voluntary sector. Although I did not agree with everything that the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) had to say, his scepticism about how far research can dissect what has occurred is well placed.

I do not believe that a requirement to make a comprehensive assessment of the impact of the national lottery on every part of the voluntary sector every year, as the amendments would require, would be illuminating or a good use of resources. It would be quite expensive; there are 500,000 voluntary organisations. The charities board, however, will have to keep a sharp eye on all charities as it decides how best to distribute its share of the funds raised by the national lottery. It will soon learn of it if charities are experiencing a drop in their incomes, for charities will not be slow to let the board—and Ministers—know if they believe that they have lost out.

The Charities Aid Foundation also provides statistics which are illuminating—as far as they can go. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary will be able to set in train research when he judges that more information on a certain sector is needed. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary said that he expects the issue to be considered by the House every Parliament so that the House can express its view on these matters.

I accept my hon. Friend's essential point that the Government and the House must continue to take an informed interest in how the charities succeed in living and hopefully prospering, with the national lottery. There are more flexible and useful ways to get the necessary information and to inquire into prima facie problems than the amendment would provide.

Additionality lies slightly outside the scope of the amendment, but it is important and was mentioned by the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme). The Government have given undertakings that lottery money will not be used as a substitute for public spending. The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) opined some scepticism. As I have said, the hon. Gentleman was right to say that it was difficult to judge whether, ultimately, there has been substitution because public expenditure moves up and down and there are always complaints.

However, it would be difficult to see whether the movement had been affected in any way by the lottery. Suffice it to say that recipients of money from the lottery who felt that they had lost an equivalent or greater sum than that which they could have expected from the Treasury will not be slow to say so. There will be not a dearth of information but a surfeit and hon. Members, the Select Committee and others will have to make a fair and reasonable judgment upon it.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon for drawing our attention to this issue and for making it clear that it requires continuing attention. It will certainly have the Government's sustained interest and I am glad that the amendment has enabled me to put that on the record. The Home Secretary and I will seek to produce methods that will show useful known trends in charitable giving and the effect of different lotteries. However, I suspect that we shall rely much more on the resources of outside resource bodies, which will keep an eagle eye on what is happening.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland), the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme), and the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) for taking part in the debate. I do not agree with everything that the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland said in his lugubrious analysis, but he certainly underlined the importance of the lottery's impact on charitable giving and on other aspects of our national life.

I am grateful to the Minister for his recognition of the importance of the issue. I agree that it would be a technically difficult, extensive and demanding exercise to carry out the sort of systematic monitoring that I continue to think it is incumbent upon the Government and Parliament to find ways to carry out. I am grateful that he acknowledged that it is important to continue the search for ways to enable the Government and Parliament to follow closely and assess critically and intelligently the national lottery's impact.

The Minister used a phrase that gave me some encouragement because he suggested that it was not appropriate to legislate now. Perhaps the issue will be further examined in another place. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 5

Licensing of a body to run the National Lottery

Mr. Corbett: I beg to move amendment No. 101, in page 2, line 22, at end insert—

'( ) A licence under this section shall include a condition forbidding the licensee from making arrangements which seek to prohibit the sale of tickets in local or society lotteries in outlets authorised to offer for sale tickets for the national lottery and those lotteries forming part of it.'.

The amendment is designed to avoid what happened in Ireland, where, over a period, those who operate the national lottery have driven from outlets authorised to handle national lottery tickets those who sell society and local lottery tickets. The Government cannot want that to happen, so there should be no difficulty in accepting the amendment or its principle.

The Under-Secretary of State may say that this is a matter for the Director-General of the National Lottery, but it is too risky to leave to him or to the good sense of those who will eventually be licensed under clause 5 to operate the lottery. The retail outlets that will be authorised to sell lottery tickets are matters for the commercial judgment of the lottery operators.

There must be ground rules, and the first, must be that exclusive arrangements which compel shopkeepers to get rid of local lottery and society tickets if they want to sell national lottery tickets are unfair and anti-competitive, and should not be tolerated. In a phrase that will doubtless appeal to the Under-Secretary and his hon. Friends, the decision should be left to the person running the retail outlet and his customers. It is for them to decide and decisions must not be imposed upon them by those who operate the lottery.

There is no reason at all why the national lottery operators should try to do that, because we are virtually agreed that, generally, the two sets of tickets are competing for different money, probably from different people. I am glad to see that the Under-Secretary of State nods. However, there is a suspicion that in circumstances where the national lottery is not doing as well as expected, the operator may feel that the best way to drive up custom is to bear down on shopkeepers and threaten that unless they stop selling all other forms of lottery tickets they will not be allowed to sell tickets for the national lottery.

Under competition policy, a shopkeeper, probably a customer and certainly a large retail chain would be able to take action. As the Under-Secretary knows, that is the case in Ireland and I suspect that it is a fairly long route. When local lottery and society tickets have disappeared from the shop counter, the shopkeeper may decide to acquiesce and agree to what is going on.

If the Minister feels unable to accept the amendment, perhaps he will acknowledge its principle and think about ways to try to ensure that this does not happen, so that retailers and customers can decide on the tickets they want to buy—none or both, one or the other.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I endorse the arguments of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett). It is important that we do what we can to ensure that the national lottery does not become a monopoly. We can guard against this by legislating to ensure equal opportunities for small lotteries in the marketing and distribution of tickets in the United Kingdom. As he said, in Ireland the national lottery reinforced its monopoly position by practices that severely restricted the sales of tickets for charity lotteries. We would do well to learn from the experience of Ireland, where the system is similar in many ways to the one that will exist here.

Within two years of the introduction of the national lottery in Ireland, sales of charity lottery tickets were reduced by 60 per cent. The reason was mainly a concentrated selling campaign by the national lottery and its insistence that sellers of national lottery tickets did not sell the tickets of any other lottery.

Mr. Key: I know all about that.

Mr. Howarth: I am glad to see my hon. Friend acknowledging the importance of that experience. I would expect him to be aware of it. It is important to state on the record now what has happened and the danger that we need to guard against.

The tactics went further, in that the best sales outlets of charity lotteries were specifically targeted to sell national lottery tickets. When a market for those tickets had been built up, the operators refused to supply further national lottery tickets unless the outlets stopped selling tickets for any other lottery. That resulted in the national lottery coming to control 98 per cent. of the market. An outcome along those lines would be a disaster to charities here.

I accept, as the hon. Member for Erdington said, that national and European legislation forbids such restrictive trade practices, but by the time that action can be taken under such legislation the damage will already have been done and it will be too late to save most small lotteries. The practices of the national lottery in Ireland were the subject of protests to the Office of Consumer Affairs and Fair Trade and a restrictive practices order was made in May 1990, but I am advised that those practices continue and that the problem has not altogether been resolved.

Furthermore, another practice has been developed. The Irish national lottery sets much higher targets for retailers handling other lotteries and, if they miss their targets, they lose the agency, or the most lucrative part of it. That threat has worked and charities in Ireland have found it impossible to persuade shops and other outlets to take on their business. It is important that there should be specific provision in the Bill to prevent such an experience in Britain. Unless it is written into the Bill, small lotteries will be at a severe disadvantage and in danger of being forced out of business.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I support the amendment. It is necessary to protect small lotteries as much as possible. I have here a letter from Bradford Northern rugby league football club. I am sure that the Minister will know that it has the best amphitheatre site in the north of England and probably in the country, but it has financial difficulties in maintaining the ground and the site. I will not go into the detail of the letter, because this is not the debate in which to do so, but it makes the point that small lotteries such as the one that it runs could be in difficulties as a result of the national lottery unless statutory protections are given, to enable it to run its lottery, as it does now, to provide income for the worthy cause of helping to maintain rugby league football at Bradford Northern.

The club says that, already, much of the Bill is designed to make life as difficult as possible for the small local lottery. It feels that some of the Bill's provisions are unnecessary. Therefore, a safeguard on the sale of tickets would be a useful protection for small lotteries. I am sure that the Minister does not want to see worthwhile ventures such as that pushed out of existence. If that occurs and the lotteries run by Bradford Northern are prejudiced, it will be a serious financial blow to them. Like most Bradfordians, and many others besides, I want rugby league football to be maintained in Bradford for many years to come.

Mr. Davidson: One issue has been concerning small lotteries, and I hope the Minister will address it. As he will be aware, in Committee we debated what should happen in the event of there being more than 52 Saturdays in a year. Has the Minister made an adjustment to the rules covering that? Another amendment deals with the matter, but I hope that he will take the opportunity to address it now.

Mr. Key: That last point is important. However, it is the subject of a different amendment, and it would be helpful if we dealt with it in its turn.

[Mr. Key]

The hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) is right. We do not wish Bradford Northern or any other club to be prejudiced. That point was dealt with by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office and we will bear it in mind. It is also relevant to the clause, because it is a question of fair trading. I hope to reassure the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) that I concur with his instincts, and my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-upon-Avon (Mr. Howarth) that we have learnt from the Irish experience.

The concerns behind the amendment, which are well taken, were addressed in Committee. It seeks to prevent those who deal in national lottery tickets from entering into exclusive deals with retailers that would preclude the selling of other lottery tickets. As I said in Committee, a contract that sought to hold a retailer to an exclusive deal would have the potential to be anti-competitive and would be open to scrutiny and challenge by United Kingdom competition authorities—principally the Office of Fair Trading—and by the European Commission. It would also come under scrutiny by the lottery's director general.

There would of course be nothing to stop an operator establishing its own shops or franchises dealing exclusively in national lottery products—that is a separate issue—but an operator would clearly be open to challenge if it entered into exclusive, anti-competitive deals with general retail outlets, as would pools companies or United Kingdom charity lotteries.

Although I agree with the principle behind the amendment, it is not necessary. I realise that it is based on fears expressed by charities as a result of practices in the Republic of Ireland, which were graphically described this evening, where the Irish national lottery marketed itself very aggressively against existing lotteries. It is made clear elsewhere in the Bill that such practices will be dissuaded. There is no intention to market the national lottery against existing lotteries.

The United Kingdom is not the Republic of Ireland. The economy and the market in which the national lottery and other lotteries operate in the two countries are significantly different in a number of ways. We have also had the benefit of observing what happened in the Republic of Ireland, and of course we recognise that such practices are undesirable.

Those who run small lotteries in this country will be quick to spot tell-tale signs of uncompetitive behaviour and it will need only a telephone call to Oflot's director general to alert him to the problem. I do not accept that that will be a long and bureaucratic procedure.

Mr. Cryer: That is the very point that concerns me. It might be helpful to have some indication in the Bill so that people do not become bogged down. If an exclusive trading agreement is reached which puts out a local lottery, and if several weeks elapse before any effective alteration can be made, the local lottery will be severely handicapped during that period. I suspect that the Minister wants to avoid that as much as I do.

Mr. Key: Yes, we both want to avoid that happening. I made the point earlier, in a different context, that we have more than a year to get this right. Precisely that sort of detail must be addressed by the lottery's director general. It would be against the operator's long-term interest, if it wants its contract to be renewed—because contracts are likely to run for only two or three years under clause 6—to enter into anti-competitive deals that would prejudice its future. I hope that I have reassured the House that the situation does not call for the amendment. When the director general is appointed, he or she will want to bear that aspect in mind, because it will be in no one's interests to damage club lotteries, large or small, or any other lotteries.

Mr. Corbett: The Under-Secretary of State has again demonstrated that he is not only or mainly the gas and gaiters that he may have inherited from his father. He has listened and demonstrated that he understands the anxieties voiced tonight and those of the organisations that properly expressed their concerns to us.

I am also grateful to the Minister for putting it on record that the lesson from the Irish experience has been learnt. I feel as satisfied as anybody can be that those who are thinking about applying for a licence under clause 5 will know that this has been said and that the director is likely to jump on them hard if they try it on. With the leave of the House, therefore, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Maclennan: I beg to move amendment No. 3, in page 3, line 8, after 'lotteries', insert

'other than lotteries using scratch-off instant tickets'.

If the Minister has paid great attention to the experience in Ireland, I hope that he will give a sympathetic hearing to amendment No. 3. Its intention is to deal with a problem that has been identified in Ireland in the working of the national lottery there.

The Irish National Lottery Company has used aggressive practices, as the Minister said when he replied to the previous debate, and has, apparently, put pressure on retailers not to sell competing charity scratch card tickets. Many retailers there no longer accept these tickets for sale, with the result that charities find it difficult to obtain good sales outlets.

It is fairly widely accepted that the main motivation of lottery operators in using instant win scratch card games is to drive charitable lotteries, particularly small ones, right out of the market. Evidence of that has been drawn to the attention of hon. Members by the National Council for Voluntary Organisations, in New Zealand and a number of other countries. We are not in entirely uncharted territory.

Scratch card tickets can account for as much as a quarter of the revenue of state lotteries abroad, so it is not an insignificant amount, particularly if it is transferred directly from charitable giving. That is why I move the amendment, which is intended to restrict the use of scratch card tickets in the national lottery. I do not doubt that the charitable sector will inevitably lose income from small lotteries as a result of the national lottery, but if we do not do something about instant win scratch cards in particular, its position will be substantially worse.

I need not delay the House unduly on an amendment whose purpose is widely understood.

Mr. Orme: This matter was raised by the Minister in Committee. He said:

"The operators will have to form a view as part of their overall marketing strategy. It may be reasonable not to have instant gains, but we want to leave that up to them."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 4 February 1993; c. 74.]

I was astounded when I heard that the national lottery would allow scratch games to be played. I had assumed that the national lottery would be a weekly affair and that people would buy a ticket for it. Scratch cards are used by football clubs, charities and political parties and bring in a great deal of revenue. Scratch cards will, I believe, demean the national lottery.

The Government, I acknowledge, have gone a long way towards meeting the issues raised in many of the amendments and that they have met some of the anxieties that have been expressed. However, many of us still oppose in principle the establishment of a national lottery. However, it is our job to try to improve the Bill and to safeguard the charities which it will put in jeopardy.

The House will obviously approve the Bill, which will go to another place and receive Royal Assent. It will establish a national lottery, but we do not need scratch cards within that lottery, and I ask the Minister to acknowledge that.

9.15 pm

Mr. Graham: I agree entirely with my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme). Many organisations in my area, which work on behalf of people with mental handicaps or for football clubs or the scout organisation, rely on charitable ventures and use scratch cards, domino cards and spot-the-ball games. The Minister should not allow the national lottery to stray into scratch card territory. Scratch cards are like an instant lottery, and political parties use them all the time. My idea of a national lottery is something like that which operates in Spain, for example. If we allow the national lottery to use scratch cards, we shall be adversely affecting charities, sports clubs and other organisations which the Minister would like to help.

Most of the instant scratch cards are sold by guys in pubs and clubs—Labour has had some success in that way—and usually cost 10p or 25p. I plead with the Minister not to allow the wee clubs to be harmed, although I fear that the national lottery will clearly affect those which raise their own funds. I hope that he will take steps to ensure that they can still earn their dough through the scratch card.

Mr. Key: There are many lotteries in life, one of which is up and running and doing well at the moment—I gather that England was 2:1 up at half time and that Wales drew 1:1 in Prague. However, the lottery with which we are dealing is not yet up and running, but I want it to be up and running and to be a huge success.

If there is any misapprehension about the nature of the national lottery, let me dispel it. It will consist of more than one game. Different types of game will be licensed under clause 6. The issue of scratch cards, which was raised at length in Committee and again this evening, is important. National lotteries worldwide are a mixture of longer-term draw games and instant games. At the birth of this new enterprise—raising money for good causes—we should not shackle it with primary legislation ruling out an entire important category of lottery.

Instant games are an important source of income in the majority of national and state lotteries. Instant lotteries operate in all the states of America in which lotteries are run and contribute about 26 per cent. of overall turnover. In other countries, the contribution made by this type of game can be as high as 40 per cent.

Mr. Graham rose——

Mr. Key: I shall give way in a moment, but I must make a little progress.

The impact of outlawing instant games as part of the national lottery could therefore lead to the loss of many millions of pounds for good causes, including charities, and may call into question the very viability of a national lottery.

Mr. Graham rose——

Mr. Key: I promise that I am coming to the hon. Gentleman's point about local charities. If I do not, I shall of course allow him to intervene.

The Bill does not designate particular games for the national lottery. Such legislation could soon become outdated and would place burdensome restrictions on the director general and the operators. Each individual game will require a clause 6 licence from the director general, who will be able to examine in detail the proposed workings of a game. Games should not be accepted or rejected at this stage by rules set in stone a full year before the lottery even begins running.

I am aware that the promoters of some society and charity lotteries are worried that the national lottery will provide them with direct competition backed by a higher market profile. However, as we have argued for some hours, the national lottery will be an entirely different proposition from charity lotteries.

No one will be in any doubt about the distinction. The lottery will not be marketed in the same way as charity lotteries. I expect that, within reasonable limits, marketing decisions will be taken independently of Government. Evidence submitted by respondents to the White Paper, and other contributions that have been made over the past few months, have suggested that the fun, winning images of national or state lotteries are by far the stronger in promotional terms. The motivation is what matters, and the motivation for buying charity or club lottery tickets is very different. Charity and sports club lotteries are played by people who, for the most part, identify with the cause that they are supporting. I am sure that we shall continue to purchase lottery tickets and raffle tickets for local good causes and other causes dear to our hearts.

Part III makes further provision for charity and society lotteries, raising the existing limits on turnover and on prizes and improving their ability to continue to raise funds. Motivation is what the hon. Gentleman was concerned about, and I believe that people will continue to support their local football clubs, local charities and other clubs, in addition to any fun that they may derive from buying national lottery tickets.

I know that some hon. Members are concerned that instant lotteries may be addictive. It is impossible to state categorically that no one will find a certain form of game addictive, but our intention is clear: the director general will not license games structured or marketed in such a way as to heighten the aspects of a lottery which most appeal to the gambler. If at any stage such tactics appear to be a problem, the Secretary of State can use the powers in clause 11 to direct that certain types of game should be ruled out altogether. However, to rule out every sort of instant game at this early stage could in effect ensure that the national lottery was a failure, so I hope that right hon. and hon. Members will join me in opposing the amendment.

Mr. Maclennan: This has been a short debate, but I hope that it will not be considered unimportant. I realise that the Minister, who has shown good temper and patience throughout the proceedings, would no doubt like to canter quickly through the latter part of the process.

Mr. Key indicated dissent.

Mr. Maclennan: I am delighted that the Minister is still so enthusiastic about his job.

I do not wish to press the amendment to a Division, and I hope that the debate will be noticed in another place so that the matter can be raised again.

I do not think that the Minister's answer to the debate, and especially to the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme), was wholly adequate. He sought to make comparisons with the United States, and did not deal with the example of Ireland at all. The position in the United States is simply not comparable. The whole ethos of charitable giving in the United States is made entirely different by the tax structure in that country, which positively induces people to give money to charities and other good causes. In this country people are not drawn to give in the same way, because there is no obvious benefit in doing so. In the United States there is far less reliance on the scratch card technique of fund raising.

Mr. Graham: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman heard the Minister say that scratch cards may be used and that the quick money makes roughly 26 per cent., so there will only be that opportunity to make all that money. In that case, why do the Government not take control of all types of gambling in which instant money can be made? It goes against the grain if we are to punish organisations that use instant scratch cards, and the Government will not allow them to carry on, so that the charity organisations will lose again unless they get money from other sources.

Mr. Maclennan: I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman is right. My point about the United States is that lotteries relying on scratch cards there do not have the adverse effect on charities that they will have in this country where charities rely on scratch cards to a far greater extent. There are different tax incentives for private giving in the United States.

I find it notable that the Minister failed to address the Irish example. In Ireland, there has been a charted decline in charitable giving which the Irish attribute in no small measure to the use of instant-win scratch cards. I do not wish to repeat the arguments that have been well made by others in this debate. However, I wish to signal clearly to the Minister that the matter will be returned to in another place.

I acknowledge that none of us can predict with certainty what the outcome of the Bill will be. He and I are both in the dark to some extent. However, when so many charitable organisations whose very existence is at stake take a certain view, we as a legislature are obliged to give them heed.

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): I support what my hon. Friend the Minister has said tonight.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) referred to scratch cards in the United States. Is he aware that scratch cards printed in this country cannot be imported into the United States? Does he agree that it would be highly undesirable for tickets printed in the United States to be imported into this country for the purposes of the national lottery?

Mr. Maclennan: I did not know that. I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's support. On first blush, I think that the hon. Gentleman must be right. I hope that that point is also borne in mind by the Minister.

Scratch cards are a major issue. The Minister illustrated their significance when he said that, if the lottery was not able to use that technique, it could make or break the lottery. By the same token, if it makes or breaks some of our major charities, it will have a damaging effect which can be no part of the Government's purpose. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 7

LICENCES UNDER SECTIONS 5 AND 6:

FURTHER PROVISIONS

Amendments made: No. 27, in page 3, line 41, leave out 'and' and insert 'including'.

No. 28, in page 3, line 42, leave out 'documentary form' and insert 'writing'.—[Mr. Robert G. Hughes.]

Clause 12

REGULATIONS AS TO THE PROMOTION OF LOTTERIES

Mr. Pendry: I beg to move amendment No. 23, in page 5, line 36, at end insert—

'( ) the use which may be made in advertising and promotion of reference to charitable causes which may be likely to receive moneys from lottery proceeds;'.

The purpose of the amendment is to ensure that the regulation-making powers of the Secretary of State include specifically the possibility of the imposition of requirements or restrictions on the use of images or other materials derived from the charity sector in the advertising or promotion of the national lottery. The Secretary of State gave an assurance on Second Reading that the national lottery would be marketed as a lottery and not as a charitable enterprise. That assurance can only be welcomed. However, I am glad that the Secretary of State is in his place because I want to point out to him that his statements relating to the issue appear to be contradictory.

The Secretary of State said that the lottery—[Interruption.] The rugby crowd are in. The Secretary of State said that the lottery would attract those interested in having a flutter who would also contribute to a good cause. He thus appeared to acknowledge that the good cause element would encourage more people to participate in the lottery. That was confirmed—I am sure that the Secretary of State is all ears as I proceed with the argument—by the findings of the NOP survey commissioned by the National Council for Voluntary Organisations. Some 24 per cent. of those questioned said that their main reason for purchasing national lottery tickets would be to make a donation to a good cause. That research clearly shows that the term "good causes" is identified in the public mind with charities.

9.30 pm

There is a potential danger, therefore, that, unless there exist specific controls on the ways in which the lottery may be promoted, it will be promoted using captions and images that are likely to mislead the public. The NOP research shows—and other research studies confirm these findings—that projects that meet people's urgent needs, such as those assisting the elderly and the disabled, are more popular causes than sports, arts or heritage. The lottery operators may therefore be tempted to use images of charitable organisations in their advertising material.

Lottery operators could, for example, use to a disproportionate degree in their promotional material images of famine relief work undertaken by organisations such as Oxfam or the work of organisations such as Help the Aged, recognising that images of starving children or isolated elderly people will be more likely to encourage people to buy tickets than images of sports stadiums or restored monuments.

Although the Minister gave an undertaking in Committee that the amount of stake money available for good causes would be included on the ticket, that will not rule out lottery advertising of a nature that encourages the public to slide into the assumption that a greater proportion of lottery proceeds than is actually the case will be passed on to good causes, and to charities in particular. If that happens, it will have a serious effect on charitable donation incomes, as people will feel that they have given to a charity when they buy a lottery ticket and will therefore be less inclined to give directly to charity.

There is also the issue of the sort of images of charity work that are used in advertising material. A number of charities have made efforts to ensure that their work is presented to the public in a way that does not patronise or offend the groups of people for whom they are working. It will be important that those promoting the lottery obtain the advice of charities on how to present their work and develop good practice. That is especially important, as the advertising budget for the national lottery is likely to rival that of some of our largest corporations.

The Minister may respond by saying that our anxieties are unnecessary because the Advertising Standards Authority would be able to address such problems if they arose. The ASA has a responsibility to monitor advertisements and investigate complaints if advertising material is not legal, decent, honest or truthful. We are arguing not that the lottery promoter will make unfair claims about what proportion of the lottery proceeds will go to good causes but that lottery promotion may be of a nature that encourages the public to believe that charities will benefit more from the lottery that is actually the case. That is more intangible and difficult to monitor than the making of false claims.

Although the ASA would have a role in monitoring and responding to anxieties that lottery advertising implied exaggerated claims, we should prefer the Government to give a commitment to prepare and consult on regulations imposing restrictions on the use of charities in lottery promotion material. On the issue of the presentation of charitable work in lottery advertising, the ASA would provide some, but not sufficient, protection.

The ASA responds to complaints that advertising has caused grave or widespread offence. Therefore, it would only offer protection in some of the more extreme cases to charities anxious about how their work was being presented to the public. Although we appreciate the good work of the ASA, we consider it vital that the Government introduce specific regulations covering the way in which the lottery uses good causes in its promotional material.

The question of lottery advertising is important to charities, as I am sure the Minister will agree. The way in which the lottery is promoted will directly affect the income of the voluntary sector and will also have an impact on the public's perception of the work of charities. I therefore hope that the Government will be prepared to accept the amendment and, in consultation with the charities, to consider further the restrictions that should be placed on the use of charities in lottery promotional material.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I have a great deal of sympathy with the objectives of the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) in moving the amendment, but I fear that considerable problems of definition and practicality will be involved in the achievement of that objective. I wonder whether the right way to achieve such restraints on detrimental advertising is not through contracts with operators rather than through the Bill.

As my hon. Friend the Minister considers the amendment, I invite him to reflect on the desirability of taking steps to ensure that the national lottery cannot advertise in terms that are effectively disparaging of small charities' lotteries. That will be very important in relation to scratch cards where the competition will be intense.

The national lottery will have available to it the saturating power of large-scale advertising backed by very big money. It is extremely important that the lottery should not abuse that position by suggesting to members of the public that they can win only peanuts if they buy a ticket in a charity lottery, while they can win a massive jackpot in the national lottery. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will consider that point.

Mr. Cryer: It would be a good idea to incorporate the provisions in the amendment into the Bill. The power for the Secretary of State is not mandatory, it is permissive. Clause 12(1) states that the "Secretary of State may by regulations make such provision", and clause 12(2) states:

"Such regulations may in particular impose requirements or restrictions".

The Bill does not state that the Secretary of State shall impose the restrictions. The power is permissive. It is all very well for Ministers and others to talk about the existing provisons for curbing false and misleading advertising, but it takes time to implement those provisions.

If the Secretary of State is given a permissive power on the face of the Bill, he can say that if the national lottery pursues particular practices as it promotes itself which are detrimental to small lotteries, such as the lottery promoted by Bradford rugby league club at Odsal stadium, the Secretary of State can say that he will introduce regulations fairly quickly. As the Minister is aware, regulations can be introduced very rapidly.

The regulations to which I am referring relate to the negative procedure. They can be stopped only if they are prayed against or if a revocation motion is made subsequently. The power is in the Secretary of State's hands. Knowing the object and aim of our debates, the Minister can bear our comments in mind and, if he sees abuse of the sort described tonight, he will feel bound to introduce regulations, and that will probably be sufficient to stop the abuse and exploitation which would militate against the good causes for which many local lotteries already seek to provide.

As has often been said, the national lottery will be disruptive. The national lottery will be new on the scene and it will cause many difficulties for local lotteries and for existing organisations such as the pools promoters. If that is so, the Government have a duty to provide protection for small lotteries. The amendment offers a means of incorporating that protection on the face of the Bill.

It would be extraordinary if the Minister were to reject the opportunity to have reserve powers which may never be used. If the Minister is right, they might never be used. However, if he is wrong, the powers will be contained in the legislation ready for him to operate and so end any difficulties that might occur.

Mr. Key: I believe that this is the first occasion that I have heard the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) urging a Minister to take a permissive power to himself. My initial reaction is that there must be something wrong here. I will have to resist the temptation to accept the amendment.

However, not for the first time, the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) has made an important contribution to the debate. I detect that his thinking on the advertising and promotion of the national lottery has moved on since the Committee stage, as has ours. We have made progress in the past five or six weeks. We have talked to a good many people about the issue, because it is clearly very important.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon is right: the establishment of a national lottery should not denigrate smaller lotteries, nor should such a lottery seek to market itself in a way that detracts from the success of local or charitable lotteries. One way of safeguarding against that is to market the national lottery with its own logo, thus making it clear to purchasers of tickets that they are entering that lottery.

The hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde is right to say that we should consult the charities, and other beneficiaries of the lottery, about the most appropriate way of promoting their causes. However, it is clear from the experience of successful lotteries in other countries that productive marketing depends on a number of factors—in particular, the fun of participation and the prospect of winning. The benefit gained by a good cause is a non-specific seondary effect, which serves as a non-specific reinforcement but is not a principal stimulus that can be exploited as a marketing tool.

That is why the national lottery will be clearly differentiated from lotteries whose whole purpose is to raise money for specific causes. Such lotteries have the advantage of benefiting specific causes, which encourages people to participate; if they are sensible, they will capitalise on that when the national lottery is introduced.

If a lottery operator chose to market itself primarily on the basis of the good causes that it helped, it would have great difficulty finding an effective focus, given the wide variety of causes that would benefit. Such a campaign might lead to considerable under-performance by the lottery and the director general would then become interested in what a cursory look at lotteries abroad would suggest was an inept strategy.

I am reluctant to accept the amendment. It is too specific and not in keeping with the broad enabling thrust of the Bill. However, I am grateful to the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde for his important contribution to the debate. We have now reached a stage in dealing with the details of the Bill which means that we have time to get it right and we shall consider the hon. Gentleman's proposals over the next year.

We shall bear in mind the problem that the hon. Gentleman has outlined. I hope that he will not press the amendment; I believe that we can achieve his objective in a better way.

Mr. Pendry: As I am sure the Minister would expect, I found his reply rather disappointing. However, I believe that the issue is likely to be raised in the other place; I also take on board the Minister's assurance that the position will be monitored over the next year. He can rest assured that we shall do the same.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 20

APPORTIONMENT OF MONEY IN DISTRIBUTION FUND

Amendment made: No. 29, in page 9, line 16, at end insert 'and held in the Distribution Fund for that purpose'. —[Mr. Key.]

Mr. Pendry: I beg to move amendment No. 90, in page 9, line 18, leave out '20' and insert '25'.

Madam Speaker: I understand that it is convenient to discuss also the following amendments: No. 91, in page 9, line 20, leave out '20' and insert '25'.

No. 92, in page 9, line 22, leave out '20' and insert '25'.

No. 94, in page 9, line 24, leave out from 'expenditure' to end of line 26.

No 95, in page 9, line 24, at end insert—

'(4) Until the year 2000, of each allocation specified in section 20, 5 per cent. shall be spent on projects approved by the Millennium Commission established under section 36 to mark the year 2000 and the beginning of the third millennium.'.

Mr. Pendry: I must say that, from the beginning, I have had difficulty with the concept of the millennium fund. According to the White Paper "A National Lottery: Raising Money for Good Causes", published last March, national lottery proceeds would benefit "arts, sport, heritage and charities".

It was last year's Conservative party manifesto that introduced the fifth beneficiary, the millennium fund. How does the manifesto describe the purpose of the fund? It says that it will be used for projects to "commemorate the start of the twenty first century and will be enjoyed by future generations."

I consider that a pretty vague and unsatisfactory description of the aim of a fund that will receive 20 per cent. of net proceeds. We hoped that the Minister would further clarify the Government's thinking on the fund in response to probing in Committee. However, after the Committee stage, we are left with no clear idea of how eligibility for the fund might be determined.

9.45 pm

The Conservative party manifesto last year provided a list of undoubtedly worthy projects which could receive millennium fund money. They include restoring historic buildings, improving amenities of canals and rivers and bursary schemes for volunteers. However, that list makes me more dubious than ever about the worth of establishing a separate millennium fund with separate bureaucracy to administer it.

All the projects that I mentioned would surely be eligible for funding as the main beneficiaries of the lottery —arts, sport, heritage and charities. So why set up a separate and expensive bureaucracy funded from the lottery proceeds, thus reducing the total amount available for good causes, to make decisions better made by the four specialist distribution bodies?

One of the only projects mentioned in the Conservative manifesto which would not be eligible for funding for the arts, sport, heritage and charities is an international trade fair. I shall deal with another one in a moment. I know that industry in Britain is in the grip of recession, but does the Minister really believe that an international trade fair is a good cause which should be funded from lottery revenues?

The list of projects set out in the manifesto also gives rise to a more important query. I address this point to the Secretary of State. The manifesto suggested that the Manchester bid for the Olympics could receive funding. Yet that is a scheme in the pipeline and not, in our view, one which should be eligible for public support. How can the Government claim that they want to safeguard the additionality of lottery funds and then announce that a project such as the Manchester bid for the Olympics could be funded from lottery proceeds?

Opposition Members are as anxious as anyone to see the Manchester Olympic bid succeed. I have a sports portfolio and a Greater Manchester constituency, so I am as anxious as anyone to see it succeed. But the funding should be provided by the Government. They secured a high profile by acclaiming Manchester's previous unsuccessful bid when the games went to Atlanta. Chris Patten, the then Secretary of State for the Environment, gave an assurance that adequate public funding would be made available if Manchester's bid was successful. That should be the case with the current bid.

More importantly, in the context of the Bill, the Government's suggestion that the Manchester bid could receive national lottery funding highlights the Government's inconsistency on additionality. The Government's position in the Second Reading debate was clearly stated by the Secretary of State. He said:

"I am excited by the potential of the millenium fund. It offers a scope for making real improvements to the face of the United Kingdom. Because it will be funded out of a new income stream, which will not count as public expenditure, the projects that we will be able to take forward will be additional to those already planned and in prospect. This will apply to the private sector as well as the public sector, for I envisage that the main large-scale projects will involve funding partnerships with the private sector."—[Official Report, 25 January 1993; Vol. 217, c. 728.]

The Opposition concur with those remarks.

However, it would appear that Ministers, including the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister no less, are not ruling out funding from the millenium fund some of the planned projects already submitted to the International Olympic Committee in the official bid document. Clearly, that is a breach of the Government's stated aim on additionality spelt out by the Secretary of State on Second Reading. I have here documents on some of the plans that are already in the pipeline. Therefore, I ask the Minister to deal with that specific and important point.

The Bill creates three new bodies—Oflot, the National Lottery Charities Board and the Millennium Commission. We acknowledge the need for a lottery regulator and for a new board to distribute funding to charities, as recommended by both the National Council for Voluntary Organisations and the Association of Charitable Foundations in reports on the distribution of lottery proceeds.

We do not object to setting of the Millennium Commission to assist in decision-making. However, we object to the creation of an unnecessarily large bureaucracy. As the Bill is currently drafted, the Millennium Commission will employ staff who will take decisions on projects which may be considered by the other four distributory bodies—the Arts Council, the Sports Council, the National Heritage Memorial Fund and the National Lottery Charities Board.

May not the Minister be setting up a body which simply duplicates the work of those institutions in relation to lottery funding? Has he also considered that a further difficulty will arise because staff of the commission will not have the same expert knowledge as those employed by those institutions necessary to decide what counts as a good arts or sport project? A project could meet whatever criteria are set by the commission to receive funding, but I am at a loss if I try to speculate on just what specific criteria might be set for millennium projects. Experts in a particular sector may still consider that such projects are not of sufficient quality to be funded.

The Opposition are not killjoys. We like the idea of grants to celebrate something, even something as nebulous as the start of the next millennium. Therefore, we do not oppose the idea of the Millennium Commission, which would approve millennium project applications. We believe that it would be prudent, however, if those funding decisions were made in partnership with the specialist bodies that distribute the lottery money to the arts, sport, heritage and charities. We believe that the millennium fund should be excluded from the Bill and that the allocations to the arts, sport, heritage and charities should be increased from 20 to 25 per cent. of net proceeds.

We believe that 5 per cent. of each beneficiary allocation should be ring-fenced for millennium fund projects. Each distributory body would submit a programme or projects to the Millennium Commission, which would approve the spending of that ring-fenced 5 per cent.

Would it not give the Minister a warm glow to be able to increase the amount that will go direct to charities and other good causes at so little cost to himself? He must be only too well aware that, with a taxation rate of 12 per cent. on lottery proceeds, lottery beneficiaries are disappointed about their share. Who knows what that percentage will be after the first year of operation?

If the Minister were to accept the principle of the amendments, which represent a sensible modification to the Bill, it would increase the amount of money going direct to the distributive bodies for the arts, sport, heritage and charities. That would be partial compensation for them for the fact that they must pay a higher level of taxation.

The proposal would mean minimal staff costs for the commission and would therefore mean that more money was in the fund to be distributed to good causes. It would also mean that the decision taken would be more likely to be sound, since projects would be referred to the commission by experts in a particular sector.

When we discussed this issue in Committee, the Minister suggested that the system proposed would result in the creation of more bureaucracy and that those seeking millennium funds would need to go, cap in hand, to eight bodies. That reveals a lack of understanding of what we are proposing. Our suggestion would result in a reduction in bureaucracy. It would mean that organisations in the arts, sport, heritage and charities would apply to one body responsible for funding rather than to two.

The Minister raised a further difficulty about the distributive bodies being restricted as to the areas of activity that could be funded through millennium resources. It was suggested that the proposal would make it more difficult to make imaginative decisions. If that is so, surely there are other ways round it than through the creation of a large bureaucracy.

I hope that the Minister will think again about the millennium projects about to be funded and will look closely at the constructive approach offered by the amendment.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I do not agree with the Opposition proposal that the millennium fund should no longer be one of the beneficiaries of the money raised through the national lottery. I believe in the millennium fund and I believe that it will be possible to do some exciting, important things as a result of it which would not otherwise be done. I am sure that we should resist the amendment.

We are faced with a problem, however, because I am concerned that too small a proportion of the resources of the lottery will go to good causes. After all, the object of that lottery is, overridingly, to benefit such good causes.

If one breaks down the call on the proceeds, it appears that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor intends to take 12 per cent. in tax; the Government have said that they expect 50 per cent. to go on prizes and my hon. Friend the Minister has said that he expects administrative and operational costs to range between 8 and 18 per cent.—an average of 13 per cent. That leaves only about 25 per cent. of the turnover of the lottery for good causes.

That must be divided five ways if the millennium fund is to remain among the beneficiaries. That in turn means that only 5 per cent. of the turnover of the lottery will go to charities and in most people's perception, "good causes" means charities. It is, sadly, a small proportion for good causes and particularly for charities. Then we must take into account the displacement of charitable giving which we are apprehensive that the national lottery will induce, and we are all aware that additionality is not quite cast-iron.

My hon. Friend is the Minister of pastime and pleasure and I have no desire to be a killjoy, but I find it difficult to see how the Government can justify diversion of money within our society on this enormous scale, with all this immense activity and the profits of the operators, unless a higher proportion of the money involved goes to good causes. A year ago, the White Paper suggested that one third of the money from the lottery would go to good causes.

The Labour party proposes to address this problem by cutting out the millennium fund. I do not agree with that. There are two other ways which we could consider and which would be preferable. We could look at prizes. I understand the need to have substantial prizes—if we do not have them, the whole soufflé may collapse—but we face a dilemma. Huge prizes will increase the likelihood that charitable giving will be displaced. I am unhappy about that, because, instead of people giving 100 per cent. of their donation to charity, they will buy a lottery ticket and, at the end of the process, only 5 per cent. will go to the charity. In that sense, it is a very poor deal for charities.

What I hope my right hon. and hon. Friends will be prepared to reconsider is the question of rollover. If we are to have rollover, as the Government seem determined we should, we will be looking at rollover jackpot prizes of the order of £20 million. I have seen persuasive calculations to suggest that that will be so; it could well be more. In Ireland, the average spend per head on the lottery is £72. In the United States it is $110, which is almost exactly the same. If we assume a greater native caution in this country and contemplate the possibility that expenditure will be £50 per head, the computations indicate that rollover jackpots could be as large as £40 million.

I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to think very carefully about what they would be doing in creating such a situation. The lure of such great prizes may provoke people's fantasies and they may flock to buy tickets, but a considerable number of our compatriots may say that there is something rather indecent about prizes on this scale and about huge sums of money being gambled in a scheme not only authorised but created by the Government. They may look at the pockets of poverty that remain in our society, even after all the enormous social progress achieved by the Government, and at the other problems in society, and ask whether it is right that such huge sums should be absorbed in a national lottery.

It is my belief that the scale of pools prizes has in the past been enough and that the national lottery could prosper sufficiently on the basis of smaller prizes and without rollover. My hon. Friend the Minister earlier in the evening said emphatically that this is not the United States of America. Quite so. We need not emulate the United States in this respect. We do not need the $118 million jackpot that the state lottery of California has created or the $106 million jackpot of Florida. The national lottery here is overridingly for good causes, and I should be happy to see a smaller proportion of its turnover go on prizes and more on good causes.

I appreciate that prizes must be attractive, but we should not overdo it. I would be happy to contemplate a smaller turnover and a higher proportion of that turnover going to good causes, if that were necessary. The object should be not to maximise the total take of the lottery, but to maximise the amount that goes to good causes. So I ask my hon. Friend to reconsider the question of rollover.

We could use another angle of attack to deal with the problem that the amendment seeks to tackle: how to increase the proportion that goes to good causes. We can look at the tax treatment of the lottery. I suggest the Minister encourage the Chancellor to adjust his approach to taxing winnings instead of what he proposes to do.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business),

That, at this day's sitting, the National Lottery etc. Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Robert G. Hughes.]

Question agreed to.

As amended (in the Standing Committee), again considered.

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Howarth: In the United States of America, the tax on winnings is often as high as 30 per cent. The public there seem to accept that, even though the culture does not favour high taxes. In his Budget speech, the Chancellor sought to justify the 12 per cent. rate on the basis that it would compensate the Treasury for income lost on account of the national lottery.

I was surprised by this proposition and I should be interested to know my right hon. Friend's evidence for it. It would be helpful if he revealed it. Surely the national lottery will generate additional revenue for the Exchequer, especially downstream tax revenues based on construction activity and a host of other activities that will be generated —even administrative and operational activities associated with the lottery will yield resources for the Exchequer: income tax paid by national lottery employees, VAT on purchases and so on.

I therefore anticipate that the revenue that the Chancellor will receive, generated by the lottery, will be significantly more than the 12 per cent. figure that he gave us. He will probably take in tax from the national lottery three or four times the amount that will go to charities.

Public expenditure is no doubt a good cause, at least in nearly every instance, but I submit that the public may take it amiss if they begin to perceive the national lottery as disguised extra taxation. The real good causes should not be an obscure residual, the poor relations to the Exchequer in the competititon for funds from the lottery. Ultimately, society's evaluation of the national lottery and the Government's policies in this regard will be based on its effect on good causes.

If Ministers are not prepared to write into the Bill the commitment that I have sought in an unselected amendment, that 35 per cent. of the turnover from the lottery should go to good causes, will they at least undertake to write that into the contract with the operator? Although I oppose the Opposition amendment, which would remove the millennium fund from the ranks of the beneficiaries, as a means of ensuring that enough can go to charities, the arts, sport and heritage, I ask Ministers to look again at this problem.

Mr. Andrew Hargreaves: I am pleased to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) on this issue. He has said, in much the same vein as many of his colleagues in the Committee said, that it is desirable to try to ensure that between 30 and 35 per cent. of the total take goes to good causes. We discussed this subject at some length in Committee, so it is not worth detaining the House further, except to say that I am confident that the Minister has realised that Conservative as well as Opposition Members want a larger take for good causes.

I would only ask the Minister to assure the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) that the very purpose of the arm's-length commission for the millennium fund is to ensure its independence. I oppose the amendment.

Mr. Key: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. Hargreaves) for his contribution. The Millennium Commission is an arm's-length organisation and I am glad that my hon. Friend has drawn attention to that. I should like to think carefully about the wide-ranging speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth). However, I can say at once that I shall have to disappoint him in terms of writing a 35 per cent. figure into any contract, let alone into the Bill. My hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office has said that the Government will produce proposals on rollover. They will be considered in another place.

The hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) asked me to address the issue of Manchester's bid for the Olympics. The Millennium Commission is an independent body and will make its own decisions in the light of the quality of the applications it receives. There is no possibility of the Government allocating any money for a specific project, whether a facility for the Manchester Olympics or anything else. Legitimate applications for funding from the Millennium Commission will be judged by the commission, on which Ministers would be in a small minority. The hon. Member for Stalybride and Hyde will recall that I conceded that in Committee.

A substantial amount of public money is already committed to Manchester's bid. When Manchester wins —hon. Members representing Manchester constituencies are in no doubt about that—there will be substantially more money. Perhaps one of the special or one-off projects for the Manchester games in the year 2000 would be appropriate for an application. It will not be in my gift to say whether it will succeed. The arguments in Committee about additionality and the Manchester games were thorough and I have nothing to add to them.

The amendments seek fundamentally to alter a key provision in the Bill to establish a commission to mark the beginning of the third millennium and the year 2000. Far from having a rosy cheek if I accepted the amendment, I would undoubtedly have a blush of shame at deserting an important national lottery objective, which is to find an appropriate way to mark the new millennium for the nation.

The Bill as drafted establishes an independent commission, appointed by the Queen and free to make its own decisions on spending from a discrete pot of money that will form 20 per cent. of the lottery proceeds until the end of the year 2000. There is provision to extend the amount of time during which money will flow into the funds in order to allow funding to continue for projects that overrun. This is clearly prudent and it is not, I hasten to add, an invitation to profligacy. I am sure that hon. Members will agree that a half-finished millennium project which no funding could be found to finish would be regarded less as a memorial to the achievements of the previous millennium than a monument to folly and the short-sightedness of the House.

I have been at pains to point out that the United Kingdom national lottery and the benefits accruing from it should be set in the context of a vision of improved quality of life for the whole nation. The amendments seek to blinker some of that vision and to change the character of the Millennium Commission and of the Bill as a whole.

The provisions are also impractical. We envisage that millennium projects should consist of a small number of large projects and a larger number of small projects, which might be of local significance, as well as bursaries, which might be for people from particular walks of life to undertake work within the United Kingdom on projects that will enhance their contribution to the community on its completion. However, exactly how the money is used will be a matter for the commissioners themselves. They will take a bold, forward-looking approach to their task, and it is important that they they have discretion in this area.

I have already said that they will fund a small number of large projects. They need access to reasonably large funds to do this, and a reasonably free canvas on which to work. Going cap in hand to eight or more bodies for money to spend and being constrained over areas to work within will not make for imaginative decision making. If the bodies were tardy in releasing funds, a mechanism to require them to do so would be necessary. There might be a need for appeal machinery and so on. We should be creating a bureaucratic framework for what is a simple process, already effectively provided for in the Bill as drafted.

I regret that I cannot agree to the amendments. They are outside the spirit and vision of the Bill and would fundamentally alter its purpose. I am not willing to accede to that.

Mr. Pendry: That was a disappointing reply. My hon. Friends have told me that the Minister was saying no. He missed the point about what the Secretary of State said on Second Reading on the Manchester Olympics bid, which was that no lottery money would go into the planned projects. That will not be the case. The matter will run and run—but not now, as it is obvious that the House wishes to make progress. Therefore, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Corbett: I beg to move amendment No. 102, in page 9, line 19, at end insert 'including films,'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient also to discuss the following amendments: No. 119, in page 9, line 19, at end insert—

'including films, for which purpose monies shall be allocated to the British Film Institute and the National Film Corporation.'.

No. 120, in page 9, line 25, leave out '20' and insert '5'.

No. 121, in page 9, line 26, at end insert;

'and

(f) 15 per cent. shall be allocated for expenditure for the purposes of film, to be divided between the British Film Institute and a body established for the purpose of assisting British film production and approved by the Secretary of State under directions provided in section 21.'.

No. 104, in page 9, line 28, clause 21, after 'arts', insert 'and film'.

No. 193, in page 9, line 29, leave out '97.2' and insert '82.2'.

No. 103, in page 9, line 30, after 'Britain', insert 'who shall distribute such proportion as they think appropriate for the purposes of film'.

No. 122, in page 9, line 30, after 'Britain', insert 'who shall distribute such proportion as they think appropriate for the purpoues of film between the British Film Institute and the National Film Corporation'.

No. 198, in page 9, line 30, after 'Britain', insert 'who shall distribute not less than 15 per cent. for the purposes of film to the British Film Institute'.

No. 194, in page 9, line 30, after 'Britain', insert—

'(aa) as to 15 per cent. for distribution by a sub-committee of the Arts Council of Great Britain, for expenditure on or connected with film, and'.

Mr. Corbett: The amendments bring us to the British film industry. The House will recall that we could hear the cheers down Whitehall when the Secretary of State expressed his delight at the six Oscars that British entries took at last month's awards and then claimed that that demonstrated that Britain was "a centre of excellence" for cinema film production. It is true that we have excellent writers, producers and directors, but they work mainly for foreign earnings in foreign lands. The film industry is in crisis.

Mr. Key: Nonsense.

Mr. Corbett: I hope that the Under-Secretary will listen to the facts behind that assertion.

Last year, just one big feature film, "City of Joy", was made here. As to the Oscars, most of the cash for "Howards End" and "The Crying Game" came from abroad, with British contributions limited to welcome slices from Channel 4. There is nothing the matter with that. I am not complaining. I am asserting that we do not do enough to ensure that more films are made in Britain, whether by British producers, writers and directors or anyone else. Fewer and fewer genuinely British films are being made by the cinema. Only 15 cinema films were made last year by British production companies. Some 59 films were shot, but most were low-budget, partly financed by television and consequently with limited cinema potential.

As Derek Malcolm, the distinguished film correspondent of The Guardian commented after the Oscar awards:

"If we do well"—

that is, the British film industry—

"the government suggests that we don't need assistance. If we don't, the government complains that we hardly deserve support."

That is about the length of it.

Although we welcome the round of talks about the future of the film industry on which the Secretary of State has embarked, we want that talking followed by action. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition told the Prime Minister:

"our film industry could be even more successful if it received the same backing and support from Government as do its competitors in other countries".

By that, he meant capital allowances and tax breaks that many, if not most, other European countries offer to those making films.

The Prime Minister's response was somewhat mean-spirited. He said:

"Once again, the right hon. and learned Gentleman equates real encouragement with the spending in subsidy of taxpayers' money".—[Official Report, 30 March 1993; Vol. 122, c. 152.]

No one is asking for subsidy in that sense. Alongside what the Government decide separately to do, the amendments are designed to ensure that our film industry, especially its independent sector in production, distribution and exhibition, gets a proper share of the cash available for the arts from the national lottery.

When that matter was debated, the Under-Secretary of State said that a special Arts Council committee, including film industry representatives, would be established to deal with the allocation of money from the lottery. He undertook to reconsider the arrangements for distribution to film but alas, despite talks with the British Film Institute and other bodies, no changes were proposed.

10.15 pm

The present arrangements are not believed to be sufficient. The Arts Council remit on film, as the Under-Secretary of State well knows, is very narrow and confined to activities relating to avant garde films and documentaries about artists. Of course those have their place, but the arrangements do not begin to address the problem confronting the British film industry. In any event, the Arts Council is far detached from the industry.

The BFI argues that there is a need to assess how the development of film and video should proceed across the whole country and to back that with lottery distribution. It adds:

"If the present proposal is maintained, we fear that film will continue to be treated as the poor relation within the national funding system."

The amendments seek, on behalf of the BFI, to establish a separate film committee of the Arts Council's lottery committee, so that people with expertise and knowledge of the industry can help direct where lottery moneys can best be spent to support it. That sub-committee should examine applications for funding relating to film and video and make recommendations to the Arts Council's main lottery committee. The Minister will be aware that such an arrangement does not fully meet the film industry's wishes, but it does go with the grain of the Bill.

I hope that the Government feel able to accept the spirit of the amendments, if not to the letter, and will agree that such an arrangement can be sensibly considered and made in the year before the lottery comes into force. That would give another signal to the industry that the Government do more than talk and generally want to act to help the British film industry.

Mr. Cryer: I shall concentrate my remarks on amendments Nos. 119 to 122 and 198, which I tabled and which fall into two categories, and declare my interest as a governor of the British Film Institute. Although I am very pleased to hold that office, I hasten to add that I receive no remuneration—I just have the pleasure of taking part in the work of the most important body in the country working for the preservation and promotion of the visual arts.

Being the Member of Parliament for Bradford, South, I represent the city that is the home of the National Museum of Photography, Film and Television, which is extremely successful. A new cinema, Picturedrome, also opened there recently—and that cannot have happened in many cities. Picturedrome is promoted by the museum and has become a centre of interest and importance for film and television.

As a matter of historical interest, the major office of what used to be Gaumont British was centred in Bradford. It was promoted by the Ostrer brothers, who were very big in the wool industry as the owners of a firm called Isaac Holden (Saltaire) Ltd. As one of them was a socialist, he offered the whole Gaumont British film circuit and the Gaumont British film studios to Ramsay MacDonald's Labour Government, who told him firmly that they did not think that Governments should have anything to do with film production. We have come a long way since then. The Ostrer brothers developed that great circuit from their offices in Bradford. I want to persuade the Minister that the Government should have something to do with promoting film archive work, protection work and representation of the industry work and with the production of films.

My amendments provide for a reduction in the Millennium Commission's funds and for the allocation of money to film—to be divided between the British Film Institute and a national film corporation. They also provide for money to be provided directly to the BFI from the sections allocated to the arts. An allocation percentage is provided for. I point that out so that the Minister will have plenty of alternatives on which to draw when making the sympathetic reply that I know he will wish to make.

It is important to emphasise that this money is not designed to be a substitute for existing grant aid on which the BFI exists. Therefore, I draw the Minister's attention to the purpose for which this money for the BFI, if supplemented, could be used. At the Elstree studios near Borehamwood, film archives for the old Associated British Picture Corporation were established. When the old ABP studios were sold off to Cannon, Cannon sold off the film archives—the visual treasures of our nation's history, going back to the 1890s—to an American company, the Wasserman Organisation.

Elstree studios were sold off by Cannon, and some of the ground area has been converted into a supermarket. The result is that the film archives are being transferred elsewhere. The BFI wanted to buy those precious film archives, for they represent living history, answered in a way that has never been possible before. Those precious assets belong to our nation. Although it made an effort, the BFI did not have sufficient money, from its existing grant, to purchase those precious millions of feet of film and preserve them for the nation, although that is the very purpose for which the Department of National Heritage is designed. When archive material of that nature becomes available in future, lottery money could be used to obtain it. However, those archives have been sold off to a French firm, Le Studio Canal.

If film archives were considered to be works of art, an export licence would be required if somebody wanted to export that material, but no export licence is required to export film. Many great British films are regarded by everybody as works of art. It is the most popular form of artistic culture that we have ever achieved. It reaches more people than any other art form. It combines all the arts into one medium which, at its best, can be the most powerful medium that humanity has known, yet those millions of feet have simply gone outside our control. The allocation of lottery money to the BFI could be used for that important purpose.

Let us take another example—the archives at Berkhamsted, where precious film which has been purchased, allocated or donated to the British Film Institute is carefully preserved. As the House is no doubt aware, though, until the mid-1950s film was developed on cellulose nitrate stock. Cellulose nitrate stock is fragile. It has the extraordinary and very disturbing property of being self-combustible at certain stages of degeneration. If, therefore, films are to be preserved, they have to be transferred to cellulose acetate stock, which is not subject to that degenerating process and is permanent.

The problem is that the transfer process is costly and is being undertaken by the BFI from its existing funds. We hope that the annual allocation by the Arts Council to the BFI will be a fixed percentage, if the Minister agrees, so that the BFI can calculate what sort of programme it can undertake and the transfer programme can be undertaken with money which is not part of the BFI's existing grant. That would mean that, if there were any serious deterioration in the nitrate stock, the stock could be transferred much more rapidly. I mention that as an example of what the BFI and other bodies could undertake if there were an allocation of funds from the lottery beyond their grant aid, which would give them more certainty for the future.

I know that it is late; the Minister should not frown about that, because the Government should have realised that such important legislation would be subject to scrutiny on Report. It is right and proper that the House should spend some time on this examination.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) mentioned film production. Some of my amendments would allow for an allocation to an organisation developed for the promotion of British film production and to the BFI, or to the BFI alone. The British Screen Advisory Council sent me a proposal for film production which, in essence, involves the development of a national film corporation. It was only a proposal, so the amendments provide for the creation of a body that could be authorised by the Secretary of State to allocate money. The amendments are highly flexible, which means that the Minister has a number of choices.

Film production is very important. The United States has two major exports. Aerospace items are first on the list and film and television programmes are second. They create revenue but also a cascade effect for a range of products. If British films are selling well abroad, the likelihood is that British aerospace items, British textiles and British engineering will benefit from their success. If the films are seen by millions of people—they will be if they are successful—they can establish a benchmark of excellence. That is what has happened in the United States because of the success of its manufacturing technology. It is not a question of production for production's sake—it is a matter of our national presence in the rest of the world.

We have the advantage of speaking English. The American market is the biggest English-speaking market in the world. It is worth bearing it in mind that this country has unsurpassed standards of technical excellence. That is why Steven Spielberg produced so many films here before the erosion of the capital allowances reduced the American presence in this country.

Spielberg attended a meeting in the House and I asked him whether it was true that, despite the fact that America has a great history of making classic films which we have all had the pleasure of enjoying, the standards of technical excellence in this country were as good as or, in many cases, better than those in the United States. Spielberg answered that it was true: the standards of technical excellence in this country are better because of our system of apprenticeship and the gradation of age. Older, more experienced people can pass on knowledge to younger people in the industry. If we have no British film industry and no British film production—we are already reaching that stage—the reservoir of knowledge and expertise will be eroded.

In 1991 there were 59 feature films, in 1992 there were 42, and as for this year, Screen Finance, produced by the Financial Times on 24 March 1993, said:

"Just four films involving British production companies and intended for a theatrical release are likely to have gone before the cameras by the end of the first quarter of 1993, according to information collected by Screen Finance. The figure, which includes three co-productions, is six fewer than in the comparable period in 1992 and five fewer than in the first three months of 1991".

So the prospect is not hopeful.

10.30 pm

The British Screen Advisory Council suggests that, especially in view of an increase in cinema admissions in this country from the low of 53 million in 1984 to more than 100 million in 1992, a national film corporation should be established on the basis of the successful period of the firm EMI, in which it had a pre-selling arrangement with the United States for five successful major feature films—"The Deer hunter", "Death on the Nile", "Convoy", "Warlords of Atlantis" and "The Driver". Only when EMI began to promote its own films in the United States did it pursue a disastrous production course, and it then lost about £90 million.

The company's earlier success was achieved on a basic budget of $9 million, which produced a gross profit of about $24 million for EMI, irrespective of the additional profit for the United States. That is the basis proposed by the British Screen Advisory Council, but that sort of money is needed to start things off.

A criticism of the EMI programme is that it could be argued that, apart from "Death on the Nile", the films involved were much closer to the United States than to indigenous British life and did not reflect our aims, culture and ambitions—which they should have done. However, on the back of successful co-productions, we could have smaller productions that reflected our way of life—films such as "Gregory's Girl", which was made for £350,000 10 years or so ago, and took more than £2 million.

My amendments cover such a proposal, and I hope that the Minister will respond sympathetically because, as a result of various failures which I do not have the time to enumerate—Goldcrest was a symbol of over-expenditure and financial failure, as subsequently was EMI, as I have just explained—the film industry now has a proposal for a potential success, but only if it receives help from the Government through the lottery. The Minister may say that that is not the Government's policy, but other nations in the English-speaking world are providing the help that has supplied the basis for export success. We have only to consider Australia to realise that its film production industry has been successful because of a basis of central and state government help.

I hope that the Minister will consider my proposal sympathetically. We must bear in mind the fact that, as he has repeated several times, he is considering the whole period of 12 months over which the lottery will be brought into operation. Proposals such as mine could be incorporated into the legislation so that we could both give the British Film Institute the extra money with which it could do so much to preserve our film and cinema heritage and enable British film production to get off the ground again—I must tell the Minister that it is on its knees at the moment.

Sir Anthony Durant (Reading, West): As the other governor of the British Film Institute, from the Government side, I should like to contribute to this short debate.

There is no doubt that there are concerns in the film industry about the lottery and the way in which it is being handled. When the Government were returned at the general election, the industry welcomed the policy of having one Department to look after it. That was a great step forward, for which the industry had pressed for years. It was fed up with being handled partly by the Department of Trade and Industry, partly by the Education Department and partly by the Home Office. Being looked after by three Departments made it difficult for the industry to get its cause before the Government, so it welcomes as a great step forward the fact that there was to be only one Department.

The film industry has also welcomed the discussions that it is having with the Secretary of State. However, it feels that, because the Minister is suggesting that the money will go through the Arts Council, it will be sidestepped and will not have the opportunity to put its own case and to get its own money. The British Film Institute does not have great confidence that the Arts Council really looks after it. The institute feels that the Arts Council does not entirely understand films. Why not have a specialist committee to distribute money to the film industry? I urge the Minister to consider that point again.

The film industry remains a mixture of an art form, an entertainment medium, an educator and a big business. It is the art form—the cultural form—about which we are talking principally tonight. We need a greater British input to highlight our national heritage and culture. We make very good films when we are given the opportunity, and they do very well. However, the opportunities to make such films are diminishing. Distribution is one of the difficulties we face, although that is a side issue in this debate.

We should put more money from the lottery towards the film industry by the methods that the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) has mentioned to the BFI. I urge the Department to talk to the Treasury. The classification of film as a capital item some years ago revived the British film industry. It really got going, but then the scheme was stopped. It was a wonderful opportunity. An opportunity was created for people to invest money in the film industry, which is the key to it all, and it got the film industry going again.

We could use some of the lottery money on the Children's Film Foundation. It is a tragedy that the television companies do not make films for children, but only children's programmes. The foundation has done a remarkable job over the years in making very suitable films for children, especially for the Saturday morning matinees. That is a positive, educational and constructive area into which we could put some of the lottery money. I urge the Department to look again at the proposals for the film industry and at the way in which the money is distributed.

Mr. Key: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West (Sir A. Durant) for his contribution, and to the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer). My hon. Friend raised some important and interesting issues. I shall consider the question of the Children's Film Foundation and learn about its contribution. It is clearly a matter of great concern to my hon. Friend.

My hon. Friend asked why we could not have a sub-committee for film. In a nutshell, the answer is that, if we had a sub-committee for film, we should have to have a sub-committee for every other branch of the arts. That would be wasteful and would not address the problem of how best to provide a fair distribution of resources within the 20 per cent. category for the arts as a whole. I take the point that the world of film feels that the Arts Council does not love it. That notion has been around for a long while. I do not intend to comment on the substance or otherwise of it. Nevertheless, it is a perception that we cannot ignore. I shall explain how we shall seek to address that point.

The hon. Member for Bradford, South made a very helpful contribution, and I am grateful to him for raising what he described as right and proper concerns even at this hour. I take on board what he says about Elstree. I recall my visit to Pinewood not so long ago, when I met a number of the interests there. I was, as ever, impressed by the capability and competence of our production centres. I include in the same breath Shepperton, which still makes a remarkable contribution and is very much part of our heritage. It is well represented by its Member of Parliament, my right hon. Friend the Member for Chertsey and Walton (Sir G. Pattie), who is here tonight.

The hon. Member for Bradford, South also drew attention to the interesting ideas in the amendment. We shall think about them. I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's various suggestions.

I shall disappoint the House by not accepting wholesale —[HON. MEMBERS: "Or retail."] or, indeed, retail—the amendments on offer tonight, and I shall seek to explain why. I shall also seek to explain why I am prepared to listen and to work during the next 12 months to ensure that we get the answers right.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has initiated a new round of discussions with the film industry. We have already had the first session, and we shall have another tomorrow, and a number are planned for the coming weeks. We are very much in listening mode and have specifically asked the film producers—and will ask the industry more widely—to think for themselves and then to share with us thoughts about the ways in which we might legitimately make progress on the issue of the national lottery.

I am well aware of the importance of the United Kingdom film industry; that goes without saying. I enjoy as much as anyone else taking my family to the cinema, and I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State recently went to a cinema in my constituency to see an excellent British film. I am very proud of what the industry has been able to achieve. Although Oscars do not mean everything, those awarded recently mark the success of the United Kingdom film industry, which has been very significant of late. As the House knows, we support the film industry in a number of ways.

In the Bill, we have chosen to use one body—the Arts Council—to distribute lottery money to the arts. We are quite clear that the arts include film and crafts. We decided that it would not be practical to use a specific film sub-committee, because if we did that for film, we would have to do it for every other sector of the arts: there is no reason why we should not multiply the number of distribution bodies in other sectors to follow that argument. In effect, we would be opening the floodgates, and I do not think that that would be an effective way to proceed.

Under clause 24, we will direct the Arts Council to take into account the need to fund film and craft applications and we will generally direct the Arts Council and other distribution bodies that, if they do not have specific expertise in a particular area, they should seek it from a relevant expert body—unless, of course, that expert body is the one applying for the funding.

In considering applications for lottery funding, the Arts Council proposes to use a special lottery committee which will have on it at least one member with expertise on film and one with expertise on crafts. Those members will call on the advice of many expert bodies, such as—but not exclusively—the British Film Institute, to help them to make their decisions. We think that that provides a very flexible framework within which film stands to benefit a great deal from lottery proceeds.

I fully accept the spirit of amendments Nos. 102 to 104, although I hope to reassure the House that they are unnecessary. The Arts Council charter makes it clear that the council can fund film. I have said that, under clause 24, we will direct that it should fund applications from the film and craft sectors. In its annual report on how it has distributed the lottery proceeds, the council will have to publish the directions and demonstrate achievement against those directions. If film is not being given a fair share, it will be quite clear to the House.

On a practical level, it is now up to the Arts Council and the interested bodies to work together to find the best way to develop the film element. There is a read-across to other areas: the Sports Council will clearly be able to fund football and hockey from its lottery allocation, but we do not need—nor do we want—to specify that in the Bill.

Co-operation and a willingness to work constructively and with enthusiasm for the task are the key, as is an ability to use imagination and to regard the lottery money as a new source of funding that should be considered in a new way. Organisations, whether in the film world or in other areas, should not look to lottery funds as a means of financing long-cherished grant strategies or as a source of core funding. The intention of the lottery is to develop projects that are developed from the ground, not dictated as part of some grant plan. That is why I was especially grateful for the practical suggestions made by the hon. Member for Bradford, South.

The House should remember that, once the Bill is passed, the Arts Council and film representatives will have a year or so to get things right and to work out a suitable system to enable film to benefit to its maximum potential.

I cannot accept amendments Nos. 119 to 122, as they bring into play two additional bodies, including one which does not at the moment exist. The British Film Institute is very important and that is why we choose to allocate to it £15 million a year. However, it is only one player in the varied world of film and to name a particular body in the world of film in respect of the amendment would, to say the least, be a source of contention.

The BFI has a clear opportunity to work with the Arts Council and to discover the best way to distribute money for film within the framework offered by the Bill. The amendments also suggest removing most of the allocation of lottery proceeds from the Millennium Commission and giving them to film outside the arts allocation. I cannot accept that. The Millennium Commission is an intrinsic part of the Bill and film will clearly receive funding from the arts element.

10.45 pm

The amendment specifically mentions film production. The Bill does not rule out the possibility of funding film production. The exact use to which lottery money should be put will be for the distribution body to establish with the expert bodies in the film world. At the Secretary of State's first meeting on film last week, we specifically asked the film producers to work out ideas on how they believe lottery money might reasonably be applied. That will be of great assistance to the Arts Council, which will, in any case, consult widely about how money for film should be distributed.

We have an open mind and believe that the provisions in the Bill provide a wide canvas to create an excellent distribution mechanism that will work to the best advantage of film. I hope that I can persuade hon. Members not to press the amendment. I hope that I have been able to reassure them that we understand the problems of the film industry and that we will understand them better after we have completed our round of consultation.

As the Minister responsible for film, I will of course be paying the usual visit to the Cannes film festival. I expect no tears about that. It will be an extremely hectic and short weekend and I am warned that there will be no time for fun. Later in the year I will visit Paris and Berlin with David Puttnam to learn more about their industries. I will go with him so that I get the proper perspective.

I hasten to add that, following the examples of the French and the Germans, who have particular problems in having lesser used languages, does not necessarily mean that we would wish to emulate exactly what they do. Film producers have repeatedly stressed to us that they are not simply coming with a begging bowl looking for subsidy. They have a sophisticated and precise range of requests to which we are listening.

I have described a distribution mechanism that we have constructed which I believe will deliver to film and crafts a fair share of lottery proceeds.

Mr. Corbett: With the leave of the House, I would like to reply.

This has been a helpful and useful debate with some extremely informed contributions from my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) and the hon. Member for Reading, West (Sir A. Durant) with their great interest in the film industry.

The Minister's remarks are helpful, as they were designed to be, not least perhaps to the Arts Council, which will know that the film industry expects more than a nodding acquaintance in the distribution of lottery moneys under its auspices. The Minister is right to say that in no sense should the film industry look to lottery funds to take on the bulk of whatever may be decided as a result of the Secretary of State's consultations with the film industry and the propositions that it makes about how the Government may better help the industry. I understand that important distinction.

On the back of the Oscar awards, it does not help to say that they mark the success of the British film industry. The most that can be claimed is that they mark the success and excellence of a number of individuals in the British film industry which collectively is, and should be, more important than that. I am not knocking the contribution that those individuals and their colleagues made in the winning of Oscars, but that is no substitute for us having a properly based and organised British film industry.

The consultations in which the right hon. Gentleman is engaging with all branches of the industry prompts us all to ask whether we really want a British film industry. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South demonstrated—I know that he could have said a great deal more—it is not simply a question of what the British film industry can do in terms of our own popular culture, important though that is; it is a question of our ability to do what we have done so successfully in the past through the medium of film. Those films—many sadly, made in black and white—said so much about the Britain of that period. In a sense, they represent a sort of visual BBC World Service—but we should also see films as many of our European partners do: as a source of revenue for the industry and the country.

The debate has been worth while, and I thank the Minister for what he has said. I am sure that he appreciates that this is not the last that we shall hear of the matter, but I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Pendry: I beg to move amendment No. 14, in clause 20 page 9, line 21, at end insert 'of which some proportion shall be allocated for expenditure on or in connection with football'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may take amendment No. 15, in clause 21, page 9, line 35, at end insert

'who shall distribute such proportion as they think appropriate to the Footbal Trust'.

Mr. Pendry: Rather than speaking to the amendments, I had hoped to be returning from Wembley after cheering on our national side. I had to give the tickets back; I hope that someone will shout out the score before I finish speaking.

The amendments go to the heart of a vital issue. We must ensure that, in introducing a national lottery, we safeguard the interests of football in this country. I hope that the Minister shares my view that football has particular needs which must be taken into account: it is our national game, and it is an important part of the fabric of many people's lives.

Happily, the game is thriving at all levels, from the very top of the professional game down to junior boys' and —in these enlightened times—girls' teams. Football has no parallel in terms of the extent and depth of participation; and, of course, no sport has such spectator appeal. The huge following that the game attracts represents a special dimension when we consider the needs of the sport.

It is right for the Government, and all of us, to take every possible step to ensure that our football grounds are safe. Clubs must meet the requirements laid down by Lord Justice Taylor in his report following the Hillsborough disaster of 1989, and ensure that spectators enjoy the standards of safety and comfort that they have every right to expect. I have no quarrel with any of that, but we must recognise that football faces a huge task in converting grounds to all-seated accommodation, and—in the lower divisions of the Football League and in Scotland—ensuring that any retained standing terracing is safe.

A great deal of ground development work has still to be done, and football faces an enormous bill in completing it —probably as much as £400 million in the years ahead. The traditional source of funds for football—indeed, until the recent television agreements, virtually the only source —has been the football pools. That is one of the main reasons why all my hon. Friends—and, I suggest, many Conservative Members as well—are so insistent that there must be fair competition between the pools and the national lottery. The lottery gives us the chance to do more for football, and that is the purpose of these amendments.

How can the funds best be channelled into the game? That is no easy task, as the Minister recognises. The needs and resources of clubs vary enormously. Clubs at the grass roots need basic facilities like pitches and changing rooms; as we move up the leagues, the requirements become greater. Certifying authorities are rightly concerned about safety and crowd control; that concern is reflected at the lower levels of the league as well as at the top. Many conference and feeder league clubs need to undertake major ground redevelopment work for safety reasons and to meet league requirements.

Fortunately, we have the Football Trust, a body vastly experienced in the complex matter of grant aid in football. I am sure that we are all aware of the crucially important work carried out by the trust. It provides essential help to football clubs from the top level to the grass roots of the game throughout the country. It has provided more than £150 million in grant aid to football at all levels since it started life as the Football Grounds Improvement Trust in 1975.

In 1990, the Government reduced pool betting duty by 2·5 per cent. on the understanding that the funds produced —some £20 million a year for each of the five years for which the agreement with the Government runs—would be used to help clubs to meet the requirements of the Taylor report.

The Government chose the trust as the vehicle for channelling much-needed support into the game. The Opposition fully understood why that decision was made. The trust has a long history of distributing grant aid money. It has tackled its priority task of helping clubs to implement Taylor. It has particularly helped clubs in the premier league and first division of the Football League to convert their grounds to all-seated accommodation. That has been a great success.

Grants totalling more than £63 million have been made to major ground redevelopment works, costing some £235 million. All that has been achieved with the interests of efficiency, cost-effectiveness and accountability firmly in mind. The trust has proven procedures in place involving professional surveyors and accountants designed to ensure the proper appraisal of clubs' plans. It has an annual budget of more than £36 million and a staff of only nine. Its administration overheads account for less than 2 per cent. of its income.

I have seen a letter, as I am sure the Minister has, from Sir Peter Yarranton, the chairman of the Sports Council, to Lord Aberdare, the chairman of the Football Trust, in which he acknowledges the position of the trust in channelling funds to football clubs. He says in his letter: "the Football Trust is clearly the appropriate organisation to continue its excellent and highly regarded work in this sector.

[Mr. Pendry]

I envisage that the Sports Council for England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland would each wish to devote a significant share of their lottery revenues to annual allocation of the Football Trust, taking full advantage of your well tested methods of appraisal and allocation."

I quote that letter because it describes perfectly the sensible position that the Opposition wish to reach. I look forward to the Minister's commendation of it.

The Government have said that once they are satisfied that the football leagues and clubs are playing their full part in meeting the cost of ground redevelopment work from their own resources, they will extend the life of the reduction in pool betting duty for a further five years from 1995, to match the Taylor timetable. Football has already demonstrated that it is taking its responsibilities seriously and providing a reasonable part of the cost of redeveloping grounds from its own resources. I hope that football and the trust will not have to wait much longer for confirmation that the life of the betting duty concession is to be extended.

The point of the amendment is to say to the Minister that the Sports Council does not have a relationship with professional football and needs the assistance of a football trust and people with expertise to channel the moneys into the proper quarter.

Someone has told me that the score is England 2 Holland 2. I say that for the benefit of the Minister, but he knows already. I hope that the Minister accepts that we need a professional body linked with the Sports Council which can channel the money effectively to ensure that our football grounds are safe in line with Lord Justice Taylor's report. [Interruption.] I hope that the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. McLoughlin), who is a Derby County supporter, agrees with me.

Mr. Key: I believe that we all agree about the importance of football as our national sport. In the past week, the saga of Gazza's knee has been a source of great concern to many people in England. The capacity crowd at Wembley has carried the burden of anxiety for many people tonight as England played Holland and drew, 2-2.

Other national teams of the countries of the United Kingdom were facing similar challenges tonight. Scottish hearts were turned to Portugal; Scotland, I fear, went down 5-0; the hopes of Wales were set on the Czech Republic, where the team drew; 1-1 while Northern Irish eyes were directed to Spain, where, unfortunately, their team went down 3-1.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): Can we have the rugby league results as well?

11 pm

Mr. Key: Later.

The prospect of all four nations being represented at the world cup in the United States next year is rather a faint one at the moment.

I understand the intention behind the amendment, but I am reluctant to agree to it. It would have many undesirable consequences. For example, to single out professional football for special treatment might be highly contentious—some hon. Members in the Chamber might agree—and could be detrimental to other sports.

The argument against singling out one potential beneficiary in the Bill was put when we discussed the film industry. I do not accept that, as a result of the lottery, the pools will suffer and so the income of the Football Trust will fall. I do not accept that, given competent management, the pools should suffer as a result of the national lottery. The changes already made to the pools regime places it in a far better competitive position than it has ever occupied. It would not be surprising if the pools increased its current turnover.

The income for the Football Trust comes partly from the 2·5 per cent. pools betting duty, contributed by the Treasury, and a contribution from the spot-the-ball competition organised by that happy band of Littlewoods, Vernons and Zetters. That is a proper contribution to the game, without which that band's competition could not exist.

It would not be right to name the Football Trust as a beneficiary in the Bill, but we are determined that football should be able to benefit from the lottery. It has been suggested that, as the Sports Council has not funded football hitherto, it will not do so in the future. That is not so.

How football clubs use their programme money is dictated by a set of priorities according to the level of resources available. Those clubs will, of course, be able to apply for funds from the lottery and it will give them far greater sums to use, according to applications received. Applications by that sport will be judged, genuinely, on their merits. The Football Trust will also continue to carry out its valuable work. That means that the sport will be in an extremely good position.

The amendment is unnecessary. We have no doubt that those connected with football will be able to apply for funds and that the Sports Council will do its duty. I hope, therefore, that the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) will not press his amendment to a vote.

Mr. Pendry: With the leave of the House, I wish to reply.

The Minister has missed the point completely. In Committee, I asked him if he would endeavour to build a bridge between football and the Sports Council and he said that he would. I had expected him to give a much more positive response tonight.

I support the Sports Council, but its staff do not have the necessary expertise to do the jobs that football requires to be done as a result of Government legislation, no less. The sport therefore needs a much more positive response from the Minister. I hope that he will reflect on the matter.

I shall not press the amendment to a vote, but I should like to visit the Minister, if he will receive me, to put the case more clearly, if I did not do so tonight, because he has missed the point. I shall then try to offer him a better explanation of our argument. At this stage, however, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

No. 39, in page 10, line 6, after 'held' insert 'in the Distribution Fund'.—[Mr. Brooke.]

Clause 23

APPLICATION OF MONEY BY DISTRIBUTING BODIES

Mr. Key: I beg to move amendment No. 40, in page 10, line 12, leave out from 'body' to 'for' in line 13 and insert 'shall distribute any money paid to it under section 22'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Government amendments Nos. 41 and 42.

Amendment No. 11, inclause 24, page 10, leave out lines 33 to 35.

Government amendments Nos. 43 to 47.

Amendment No. 22, in clause 24, page 10, line 45, at end insert—

'(4A) The Secretary of State shall, before making directions under subsection (1) and (3), consult the parties concerned and publish reasons for the making of such directions.'.

Mr. Key: I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon may wish to speak to his amendments Nos. 11 and 22, which are grouped with amendment No. 40. That is certainly acceptable to me, if, Mr. Deputy Speaker, it is acceptable to you.

On Second Reading my right hon. Friend made it clear that we were considering how the drafting of parts of clause 24 might be changed. In Committee I undertook to table amendments which would take account of some of the concerns expressed to us. The first change that we propose—amendment No. 42—would change the contents of directions which I might give to the distributing bodies. The original draft of the Bill would give the Secretary of State the power to direct bodies as to the purposes for which the money might be distributed or applied and adds the conditions which must be satisfied before money is distributed or applied.

We have listened carefully to the concerns of potential beneficiaries and of disinterested parties that, under these powers, a Secretary of State might be unnecessarily prescriptive. It is certainly not the intention to be so, but I understand that the original drafting gave cause for concern and that the distributing bodies might be presented with either a shopping list which they would be required to fund or with a long list of proscribed projects.

We propose, therefore, to replace the current subsection (1) of the clause with the one now on the amendment paper. This new subsection will enable the Secretary of State only to direct the bodies on matters which must be taken into account in distribution decisions. With this amendment there is no scope for the Secretary of State effectively to take the distribution decision himself. However, he will be able to set broad criteria for applications, for example, that capital projects should be favoured where possible—this might not be appropriate in the case of the Charities Board—or that partnership funding arrangements are to be preferred.

Amendment No. 45 specifically extends the scope of directions to the National Heritage Memorial Fund so that the NHMF must comply with them when applying money. This takes account of the fact that the NHMF has the power to apply money on its own behalf, to purchase objects or buildings of importance to the national heritage and to hold these for a transitional period.

Amendment No. 47 requires the Secretary of State to consult a distributing body before giving any direction to it. This is to ensure that directions cannot be made which are unworkable or without the views of the body concerned being taken into consideration and it reflects the undertaking that I gave to the Standing Committee.

In amendment No. 47 we accept the principle behind the first part of amendment No. 22. It is desirable that the issuing of directions should be informed by the experience and opinions of the distributors. I cannot, however, accept the second part of amendment No. 22 because the Secretary of State may not refuse to account for decisions taken in the fulfilment of his duties. But to require the reasons for every decision to be published would place on the Department the duty to produce documents which, to a great extent, would not be of interest to anyone save the distributors themselves.

During the consultation process, before a direction is issued, the distributors will be made aware of the intentions behind each direction. If a direction appears to be based on unreasonable grounds, the Secretary of State can be asked by Parliament to account for his decision. I hope, therefore, that hon. Members will agree that amendment No. 22 is not necessary.

I cannot accept amendment No. 11. Our purpose in drafting subsection (2) was to ensure that the distributing bodies did not act in a way that might give rise to conflicts of interest. A conflict of interest would arise if a distributor made grants to a body which it owned or wholly sponsored, or whose members were all appointed by the distributor, or whose membership was conterminous with that of the distributor. It is vital that the Secretary of State should be able to make it clear that certain categories of potential beneficiary should not receive money. This power is exercisable only by order, so Parliament would have the opportunity to scrutinise and the Secretary of State could be required to account for decisions taken on the use of the power.

In drafting the clause we considered whether it might be possible to state this aim explicitly in the Bill, and amendment No. 10 attempts to do just that. However, there would be problems in reaching a statutory definition of a controlling interest, particularly since we are likely to be dealing with public bodies which are not always constituted in similar ways. In addition, the inclusion of a statutory definition would remove any discretion on the part of the Secretary of State to take a reasonable view.

It is possible that a body might appear technically to be substantially controlled by the distributor, but the working arrangements might make a conflict of interest unlikely. The option suggested here would be to remove the Secretary of State's power entirely, and that we cannot accept. The subsection as drafted would make it possible for certain types of potential beneficiary to be ruled out, but at the same time to ensure that a decision to do so could be scrutinised. So I hope that right hon. and hon. Members will agree that this mechanism is necessary and desirable and that they will agree to retain the subsection.

Mr. Corbett: I thank the Minister for the way he has responded to the concerns voiced by hon. Members on both sides of the House. He understands them and has set out fairly to meet them.

As the Minister knows, both the Sports Council and the Arts Council have close working relationships with the Department of National Heritage, but they are their own people. They work closely with and consult officials in the Department, but in a hands-off way. I am quite sure that those officials would never try to lean on the Sports Council or Arts Council when those bodies came to distribute the grants allocated to them. The councils lead lives separate from that of the Department, although they sensibly get together with Department officials from time to time.

I invite the Minister to acknowledge that this is so—that the Government have no intention of disturbing the relationship. I hope that he will confirm that the councils' role as distributors is not to be altered. The Minister, I am sure, can easily give this undertaking; but he will understand that there is some nervousness about the future. We are all reluctant about and resistant to change, and especially suspicious of anything new. I am sure that the Minister can make a statement to allay these fears.

Mr. Alan Howarth: This is a very important group of amendments. In Committee, my hon. Friend the Minister undertook to redraft subsection (1) of clause 24 to make the powers contained in it less sweeping. He has been as good as his word, and I welcome the Government amendments, which limit the Secretary of State's powers in a reasonable way and require him to consult before making a direction.

My amendment, No. 22, contains, as the Minister observed, a requirement additional to the requirement that the Secretary of State would place on himself by means of Government amendment No. 47. He would be required not just to consult but to publish reasons when he makes directions. I believe it right that if the Secretary of State uses his power in an area where traditionally the Government have dealt at arm's length, he should explain what he has in mind.

I did not entirely follow the Minister's problem with the documents. No one is asking for immense numbers of documents to be published. We simply want some explanation of why the Secretary of State intended to use his power of direction in this sensitive area.

Subsection (2) will also give rise to some anxiety. In his letter of 3 March to members of the Committee, the Minister explained that it is intended to ensure that the distributing bodies do not act in a way that would lead to conflicts of interest. The provisions of subsection (2), however, give the Secretary of State a much broader power to restrict persons or classes or descriptions of persons who may not be funded by the distributing bodies. The subsection therefore needs re-examination.

Amendments Nos. 11 and 10 attempt to deal with the matter in such a way as to make the Bill reflect more precisely the intention behind subsection (2), as set out in the Minister's letter. I hope that the Minister will accept the purpose of the amendments, which is to address in a more precise way the matter about which he is concerned.

Amendment No. 10 places a clearly stated duty on the distributing bodies to ensure that no possible conflict of interest arises, or seems to arise, in their grant-making decisions. Amendment No. 11 seeks to remove the more general power of direction to exclude beneficiaries, a power that I cannot imagine the Government wishing to use.

Unless clause 24(2) is replaced or redrafted, it runs the risk of affording some future Secretary of State the opportunity to forget the intention behind the clause and to use it to restrict the payment of grant to organisations that are perceived to be at odds with Government policies. We rightly pride ourselves on being able to operate an effective arm's-length relationship between Government and the voluntary sector, as well as the arts, heritage and sport. I am certain that we should not do anything to undermine that proper liberal principle.

11.15 pm

In the Committee debate on the clause, the Minister emphasised that the power in subsection (2) could be invoked only by order. While that represents some safeguard against the power being used unreasonably, it does not provide the same watertight guarantee that would be provided by redrafting. The terminology of the amendment is taken from the Local Government and Housing Act 1989 in which the question of local authority interests in companies is dealt with.

No doubt the amendment would technically need to be accompanied by other amendments to clarify aspects of its definitions and so on, but if my hon. Friend considers that the amendment is not the appropriate means of specifying his intention, perhaps he will undertake to look at the matter again with a view to tabling an amendment in the other place so that the matter may be made clear in the Bill.

Mr. Key: I thought that I had covered all but one of the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth). The exception was the detail in amendment No. 10, which I do not think is necessary.

We are satisfied that the intention of amendment No. 10 is correct, that bodies should not distribute money to bodies in which they have a controlling interest. We thought carefully about a number of wordings, any one of which was similar to the amendment. However, I regret that the amendment as drafted would not work. Defining a controlling interest would be impossible and would be open to many interpretations and challenges. We concluded that the measure in clause 24(2) is the most practical approach. It might look draconian, but it is not intended to be.

I should like to read my hon. Friend's remarks to see whether I have failed to answer all his points. Perhaps he would also read what has been said, and we shall see whether we need to reconsider the matter.

I have no difficulty in giving the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) the reasonable assurance that he seeks. We have no intention of disturbing the relationship that we enjoy, and the arm's-length principle remains intact because it is a well-proven way forward.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 41, in page 10, line 16, leave out from 'manner' to 'if' in line 17.—[Mr. Key.]

Clause 24

CONTROL OF DISTRIBUTING BODIES BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE

Amendment made: No. 42, in page 10, leave out lines 26 to 32 and insert—

'(1) A body shall comply with any directions given to it by the Secretary of State as to the matters to be taken into account in determining the persons to whom, the purposes for which and the conditions subject to which the body distributes any money under section 23(1).'.—[Mr. Key.]

Mr. Hinchliffe: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 10, line 32, at end insert

"except that in exercising their functions under section 21(2) above, the sports councils shall in no circumstances distribute money to any organisation which practices discrimination as between players in amateur and professional sport".

I appreciate that it is late and that hon. Members have had a long and hard day. However, the issues with which the amendment deals are serious, and some of us have been waiting a long time for a proper debate on them. People have been waiting since 1895. The amendment is an all-party attempt to address discrimination in sport. Were it to relate to women or people from ethnic minorities, such discrimination would be illegal.

Mr. Maxton: That is not correct, because private clubs and sporting organisations can and do discriminate against women in many ways, and are not breaking the law in doing so.

Mr. Hinchliffe: I did not expect an intervention before I had put the arguments in support of the amendment. It addresses specifically what is deemed amateurism within the regulations of the Rugby Football Union and concerns the relationship between that and rugby league players, not just professionals but amateurs. The vast majority of rugby league is played by amateurs, not professionals. The professional game is a small part of rugby league and it annoys many of us interested in the game to hear it described as a professional code.

Some hon. Members will recall a recent early-day motion, 1342, on some of the issues with which the amendment deals—in particular, the case of Steve Pilgrim, a rugby union player who until recently played for Wasps in London. He also played as an England B team rugby union international. He had the audacity to go for an unpaid amateur trial with Leeds rugby league football club. As a consequence, he was automatically banned by the Rugby Football Union from playing rugby union football for two years.

The interesting point is that, if Mr. Pilgrim had gone to the Headingly rugby league ground in Leeds, but appeared on the other side of the main stand, on the Yorkshire cricket ground, for a professional trial for Yorkshire cricket, he would not have been banned. Had he gone to Elland Road, and been paid for playing for Leeds United, he would not have been banned. Had he been playing professional tennis, professional golf or even American football, he would not have been banned. Unfortunately, he played the game of rugby league.

He has not received a penny for playing rugby league, although he has had trials since then with the Halifax rugby league club. Neither club has signed him on, and he is now between the devil and the deep blue sea—not signed on by rugby league but banned from his previous sport. In the view of many decent, thinking people in sport as a whole, including many in the sport of rugby union, that is unacceptable in this day and age.

I mentioned 1895 because that was the year when what was then the northern rugby union split away from the rest on the issue of broken time payments. They are related to the fact that in the industrial north, and elsewhere, working-class people could not afford to miss time from work to play rugby union; therefore, young men were paid to cover the money that they could not earn in their normal course of employment because they were playing rugby. The ultimate result was the development of rugby league football.

Unfortunately, since 1895, some in the 15-a-side code have attempted, right up to the present day, to kill off the game of rugby league—both the amateur and the professional games. Many who have been involved in both rugby codes feel that that is unacceptable in this day and age. It is some measure of rugby league's strength and popularity that, despite all those attacks over nearly a century, the game continues to thrive and prosper, at both the amateur and professional levels. I shall be pleased to attend the nation's main sporting event on Saturday, to watch Widnes win the rugby league cup, along with the 75,000 other people who will pack Wembley to witness a great sporting occasion.

It is some measure of rugby's league greatness that, despite the obvious prejudice of the establishment, the media, the education system and the armed forces against the 13-a-side code, the professional sport of rugby league is second only to association football as the most popular spectator team sport in Britain. It would be encouraging if media coverage of rugby league reflected the fact that it draws crowds second only to those attracted to soccer. In terms of spectators, it is more popular than rugby union and cricket. The House has not considered the fact that rugby league is such a popular sport.

Amendment No. 1 attempts to address the discrimination against those who play rugby league football as amateurs of professionals that is still evident nearly 100 years after rugby league's break with rugby union.

Some years ago, when I played both league and union, I participated in a game of rugby union at a club in Otley, which is an area that the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) knows well. When I entered the club house, I noticed a painting of the team that had won the Yorkshire rugby cup two years before the 1895 breakaway. A number of the faces had been blanked out. They were players who had, after 1895, moved from northern rugby to play in the new northern union. They have never been forgiven. I want to see the day come, before too long, when the faces of those players are painted back into that picture, and an end to the nonsense of the past 100 years.

I speak with some passion because I, as an amateur league player, was banned from playing rugby union. Many of my friends and peers in Wakefield of a similar age still retain the letters that they received from local rugby union clubs saying that they were no longer welcome because, after the age of 18, they had played rugby league. We were considered sporting lepers. I will never forget that experience for as long as I live. Sadly, that attitude still prevails. Tonight, we hope to do something about making a long-overdue change to that period of history.

I pay tribute to those of my hon. Friends who, some years ago, achieved—at least in theory—a free gangway between the code of amateur rugby league and rugby union. I say "in theory" because I could give example after example to show that, often, that free gangway does not exist in practice. I shall cite just one that came to my attention as joint secretary, with the hon. Member for Keighley, of the parliamentary rugby league group.

In Reading, an attempt was made to form the Unity rugby club, to play both rugby league and rugby union under the same banner. That is entirely reasonable. Plenty of clubs play cricket and rugby, or soccer and rugby. Why not rugby league and rugby union? Why should they not use the same facilities, pitches and equipment? It would be sensible. However, permission could not be obtained from Twickenham, simply because, they were told, they were playing rugby league. Had it been cricket, soccer, or any other sport, there would have been no problem. There are many examples of the rugby union establishment leaning on the game of rugby league.

11.30 pm

My hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) has had to leave the Chamber, but before he did so he drew my attention to correspondence that he had received about a rugby league tournament that is held at Swansea Uplands ground in Wales. Amateurs from both codes are involved in games there each year. Rugby union players received letters threatening them with action if they took part in an amateur tournament, where the trophy was presented by Jonathan Davies, who, it just so happens, has left the rugby union code and gone north.

There have been many examples of what can only be described as blatant discrimination in the armed forces against people who want to play the game of rugby league football. We met Lord Merlyn-Rees, a former Defence Minister, who headed the delegation. The prejudice with which we were confronted at that meeting had to be seen to be believed. We were told that the armed forces could not afford to fund the game of rugby league. We made the point that the same balls, jerseys, shorts, boots, socks and other items that rugby players wear are used in both codes, but we were told that, because of insufficient resources, rugby union, not rugby league, was played in the armed forces. It is high time that we did something about that prejudice.

Mr. Hargreaves: Many of my hon. Friends probably share the hon. Gentleman's concern, and what he has said is enlightening. Those of us who served on the Committee probably missed out by not having this matter drawn to our attention earlier in the debate. However, at this stage of the proceedings on the Bill, is this the right place to raise such an important issue concerning rugby? Ought it not to be the subject of a debate?

Mr. Hinchliffe: I should be only too happy to initiate such a debate. The reason for the amendment is that many of us feel that although the rugby union game receives substantial public funding, particularly from the Sports Aid Foundation, the Sports Council and the education system, it practises blatant discrimination against rugby league players. That is why we feel that the Bill is an appropriate mechanism to get rugby union to take account of the strength of feeling in the nation about the way that it treats rugby league players.

The rules relating to amateurs appear to apply only to people who are concerned with rugby league, not to rugby union, although those people are, to all intents and purposes, professionals. We know for a fact that rugby union players are paid and that they receive rewards often far in excess of what is payable in the rugby league game. In France—which is a party to the International Rugby Board's rules on amateurs, which forbid professionalism in rugby—entire rugby league teams have transferred to playing rugby union because they can get more money from playing rugby union. In New Zealand and Australia, payments are commonplace. Can anyone tell me that David Campese is an amateur? Does he go to Italy every winter to play for nothing? Of course he is a professional, and rightly so. He is an excellent rugby player, so why should he not be rewarded for his skills and for the fact that he, like many others, entertains vast numbers of people?

Payments are also commonplace in South Africa. Recently, my own team, Wakefield Trinity, was in the process of signing a Springbok rugby union player called Albertus Einslin. He pulled back from signing the deal because he had been offered £200 a match and a job playing "amateur" rugby union in South Africa. It is absolute nonsense to suggest that rugby union is an amateur code. Many of us are annoyed that the South African Rugby Union has attempted to stamp on the development of rugby league in the black townships on the basis that its amateur code there will lead to professionalism although, as everyone knows, the South African Rugby Union is semi-professional, if not wholly professional.

In this country, the Pugh report considered the British rugby union players who went on the so-called centenary tour of South Africa against the advice of the various home unions. The Pugh report, which has been suppressed, suggested that those players received about £30,000 each. Let us remember that that was in an "amateur" game.

"Week In Week Out", a BBC Wales programme, recorded a player—I seem to remember that he was an international player—saying that, to his knowledge, payments were made in Wales in the dressing room, in front of a Welsh rugby union official, an official from the union that banned Jonathan Davies from commenting for the BBC at Cardiff Arms Park because he had gone north to play for Widnes rugby league club. That is the union that continues to ban Stuart Evans from returning to playing rugby union in the valleys because he flirted with St. Helens' rugby league club but unfortunately did not have a very successful career in the 13 a side code.

We have in the House an hon. Member, who is not here tonight, whose main distinction in life was not arriving here some years ago but playing in my team, Wakefield Trinity. He told me one night that he had received far more money playing rugby union than playing for teams such as Wakefield Trinity.

The parliamentary rugby league group, which comprises about 70 members from this place and another place, has become rather impatient about this matter. We contacted the International Rugby Board to ask it to explain what its rules on amateurism meant in this day and age. Last Wednesday, we met Mr. Dudley Wood, the secretary of the Rugby Football Union, and Mr. Bob Rogers, the chair of the English Rugby Football Union amateurism committee. On behalf of the parliamentary group, I must say that we were most grateful that they were prepared to meet us. They had a fairly hot reception.

The two gentlemen said that the problems which they conceded were occurring in certain unions—not the English union—were due to interpretation of amateurism, not the principle. They insisted that, although there were problems in Wales, France and here, there and everywhere, in England everything in the garden was fine. They said that there was no evidence of any payments to players in the English Rugby Football Union.

The most memorable part of our meeting was a comment from the right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling), who told us of his experience of standing as the Conservative candidate in Wakefield against my predecessor's predecessor in the 1959 general election. Because of contacts with the local Conservative party—at that stage, the chair of Wakefield Trinity was a prominent member of the Conservative party—the right hon. Gentleman was allowed to kick off the Wakefield Trinity versus Hunslet league match.

I was present, and there was a crowd of about 15,000. The local Conservative parliamentary candidate was allowed to kick off, which would be a huge boost to anyone campaigning in an election in that area. The right hon. Gentleman kicked off, the incident was reported in the press, and he found that he had professionalised himself and was banned from playing rugby union. The right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale—he is not an Opposition Member; no hard lefty he, but a former Minister and Government Chief Whip—is still banned by the rugby union. Thirty years of anger came out in the right hon. Gentleman last Wednesday in Committee Room 14—and rightly so. That nonsense is still with us, and we are sad that such attitudes still prevail.

There have been one or two developments since last Wednesday's meeting; things have moved quite rapidly. First—I believe that it happened the day after we met the two gentlemen—in Edinburgh the International Rugby Board came to the decision that rugby league professionals who have never played union would be allowed to play rugby union within two years of making their desire to switch codes known, but union players who have turned to league are still banned from returning to union. That reads like a Monty Python script.

The news was picked up in The Independent yesterday, when Alan Watkins wrote about what nonsense it was:

> "Religious conversion is much in the air these days, with several Anglicans going over to the Church of Rome. If we regard rugby league players as Anglicans, and union players as Catholics, it will be as if Anglicans can become Catholics and Catholics Anglicans. But Catholics who become Anglicans will not be allowed to revert to their original faith.
> As Winston Churchill once said of his own early shifts of political loyalty between the Conservative and Liberal parties: anyone can rat once, but it takes a man of character to rat twice."

Alan Watkins makes the important point that the lack of equality between the codes means that

> "White Jonathan Davies", who, of course, will play for Widnes at Wembley on Saturday,

> "cannot return to Llanelli, or Martin Offiah to Rosslyn Park, there is nothing to prevent Ellery Hanley, say, from signing on for the Harlequins as Peter Winterbottom's successor, playing a couple of seasons at the Stoop, and then returning to Leeds or some other Northern club to see out the autumn of his days."

What absolute nonsense—yet that is the present position.

Another development following the denials of Messrs. Wood and Rogers in Committee Room 14 last Wednesday is reported in The Times this morning. The main article on the sports page is headed:

> "RFU finds breaches of amateurism rife".

That means breaches of amateurism in the same English Rugby Football Union that we were told last Wednesday was totally amateur. We were told that amateurism was its members' sacrosanct principle, and the most important thing in their game. Yet according to the article in The Times, a report circulating in English Rugby Football Union clubs

> "has forced the RFU to confront a situation it denied existed to any serious extent. It reveals numerous illustrations of disregard for the amateur principles which officials at Twickenham insisted had more to do with imagination than reality.
> A working party set up by the RFU to investigate growing allegations of financial benefits for amateur players has found the claims to be substantially true. Its report . . . says many examples of such payments have been received".

Is that not interesting? Yet at a meeting attended by many hon. Members who are in the Chamber now we were given clear assurances that everything in the garden was lovely in the English Rugby Football Union.

To put it mildly, there appears to be some inconsistency between the official position and reality. The official position is clearly in conflict with what we know and what the union, too, knows is happening. The worry is that the rules of amateurism as administered by the RFU apply only to those who have contact with the game of rugby league. It seems that anything is allowed to go on in rugby union.

I emphasise again the fact that many of us have no objection to rugby union players receiving payments. We have no wish to prevent funding from going to rugby union clubs. I have two—Sandal and Wakefield—in my constituency. I played discreetly for both teams many years ago as a rugby league player. I have friends who are involved in both clubs. They are two excellent rugby union clubs which are a credit to the game of rugby as a whole. I have no wish to see them deprived of funds that may accrue from the national lottery. However, the amendment would affect them only if the attitudes to rugby league continued. Through the amendment, we are saying, "For goodness sake, address the issues about which all of us here are concerned and back off. Let us have some common sense after 100 years."

11.45 pm

I am grateful to the House for tolerating a fairly lengthy contribution at this late hour. It is an important matter. The London-based media largely disregard rugby league. Many of us in the north are used to that. We can manage without them. From the point of view of the media, it is sad that they do not see the great sporting spectacle—some say the greatest sporting spectacle and I concur with that view—of rugby league football. What is more worrying is that the media fail to cover the civil liberties questions raised by the issues I have described. They do not cover the way in which players are refused their basic civil rights by those who run rugby union.

I pay tribute to the rugby league press for the way in which it has pushed the matter. I pay tribute to the Rugby Leaguer newspaper, to Open Rugby magazine, which has had a continuing campaign for freedom in rugby, and to the League Express newspaper for its campaign on the issue.

I shall read from the editorial in this week's League Express because its comments put more succinctly than I can the feelings that many people have about the matter. The editorial says:

"If the Union actions did not impinge on League, they could go to hell in their own hand-cart, at their own pace, without any comment from us, but the Union's hypocrisy, dishonesty and blackmail—to give it an honest name—prevent many people who would like to try our game from doing so. The message goes out to schoolboys and adults alike, that playing rugby league can seriously damage your health and career prospects.

As we have endlessly pointed out, professional soccer players, golfers or cricketers, don't need special dispensations from Twickenham to play union. And league players, union players or players of any damn sport at all, should not need permission from Dudley Wood and his cohorts to take some exercise on a football field.

They have no moral, legal or any other right to pronounce on the sport of rugby league, or prevent free men and women playing whatever sport they like. No amount of window-dressing . . . will alter the fact that their game is continuing to use unjust and illegal discrimination against a sport they perceive as a competitor to their own."

There is great anger on the issue. I hope that the Government will grasp the nettle and end this nonsense once and for all.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): I strongly support and warmly commend the words of the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe). Some people—this point was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. Hargreaves)—may consider that the issue does not relate easily to the Bill. As the hon. Member for Wakefield explained, the rugby union is in receipt of substantial public funds through the Sports Council, so public policy issues arise which the Government cannot thrust to one side.

As an adherent of both rugby league and rugby union, like many other hon. Members, I do not seek to adjudicate between the qualities of the two codes. I congratulate Ilkley rugby union football club in my constituency on its achievement in gaining promotion this season. I also pay a warm public tribute to Keighley rugby league club, which had a magnificent season, winning the third division of the league and, equally importantly, attracting massive gates in the process. In the town and in the club there is enthusiasm to go on to greater things. Wigan and St. Helen's should watch out.

It is regrettable that the policy of disallowing a free gangway maintained by the International Rugby Board, which, despite its title, has no responsibility at all for the league game, should still mar the reputation of rugby after so many years. The Rugby Football Union claims that it wants to protect its amateur status. That makes no sense whatever because everyone with eyes to see and ears to hear knows that, in the top echelons, amateurism is an absolute sham. Many international rugby union players quite clearly have the benefit of a car and other benefits —including, perhaps, a job—simply because of who they are and because they are exceptionally good at the game they play.

As the hon. Member for Wakefield said, it cannot be right that a senior player like Steve Pilgrim should be banned from playing rugby union, possibly for life—certainly for a year from the time when he applies for reinstatement—just because he had a trial with a professional league club. That is a case about which Sir Peter Yarranton, chairman of the Sports Council and a past RFU present, has expressed concern.

The hon. Member for Wakefield referred to the fact that my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) was banned from playing rugby union many years ago because, as a parliamentary candidate, he was invited to kick off a rugby league match. I am sure that that goes a long way towards explaining why my right hon. Friend has such strong feelings about the issue.

Some forms of the discrimination practised by the administrators of rugby union may eventually be tested in the courts, where a finding that they are illegal may bring the whole house of cards crashing down. That may apply in relation to differential treatment of former union players who have played rugby league. The payment of money and inducements to move from one union club to another, revealed in the newly circulated RFU report, to which the hon. Member for Wakefield also referred, also casts doubt on the possibility that the present situation can be maintained indefinitely. Not for nothing did an article in today's issue of The Times refer to a "malaise among administrators". One day soon, the little boy who pointed out that the king was not wearing any clothes will prove impossible to shut up.

Tennis, cricket and athletics eventually came to terms with professionalism and in no way was the amateur sport harmed—quite the reverse. In due course, rugby union will have to do the same. In the meantime, however, the Government should take a leading role in making it clear that discrimination—even if well-intentioned but misguided—is not acceptable in any sport.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): As an ex-rugby union player, I find little with which to disagree in the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe). Unlike him, however, I am not happy about the way in which rugby union is moving towards becoming a professional sport. As its rules—or, rather, its laws—stand at present, it is far too dangerous a game to be played for large sums of money. Unlike rugby league, rugby union has not adapted its rules to ensure that people are not in a position to injure other players and, if people were playing for large sums, it could be an extremely dangerous game. People could be seriously injured; there might even be deaths. I deplore that state of affairs. I repeat, however, that I find little with which to disagree in the tenor of my hon. Friend's remarks.

If I have an objection, it is to the wording of the amendment. The hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) said that athletics has sorted out the problems of professionalism. That is not true. The so-called professional Powderhall sprints are held in Scotland every new year. The prize money is about £150 to £200. But someone who wins that race and accepts the £200 is barred for life from taking part in amateur athletics.

If the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Coe) had run in any of those races, he would have been banned from taking part in any other race, yet we all know that, as a result of his prowess as a miler and a half-miler, he made enormous sums of money out of athletics. Not all sports have done away with that kind of discrimination, and athletics is one of them. As it is worded, the amendment would hit athletics as well as rugby union. That may be right.

The discrimination to which I have referred is not the only discrimination that occurs in sport. A very well-known golf club in my constituency is celebrating its centenary this year. It applied to Glasgow district council to ask whether it would hold a civic reception to celebrate its centenary. Quite rightly and very honourably the district council said that it was not prepared to give a civic reception to the Pollok golf club because the club would not allow women to become members.

That golf club actively discriminates, openly and blatantly, against women. However, it also discriminates much more subtly, without any openness, against Jews. There is racial discrimination in individual golf clubs and also in other sports. The House and the sports council will have to address that problem.

Bowls is another very popular sport in my constituency. However, in many bowling clubs, a woman can become a member only if she is the wife of a male member. She cannot join as a woman in her own right. There are other discriminations of which I hope my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield is aware and they, too, should be addressed.

I fully support what my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield said. However, I am concerned that the amendment would cover a much wider range of sports than simply rugby union and rugby league. I hope that rugby union will finally come to its senses and find a better way of dealing with players who play the two codes.

Mr. McCartney: As chair of the all-party rugby league group, I support the amendment. I formed the group in February 1988. I had never played rugby league, although I had played in many positions in rugby union. As I grew older and slower, the positions seemed to change with regularity.

We formed the group to promote rugby league in an amateur and professional way, to try to build bridges between rugby union and rugby league and to use our activities in the House to develop links between the codes in the hope that they would assist to break down the prejudices that have existed for 98 years and continue to exist.

It took five years—until last Wednesday evening—for the English Rugby Football Union to agree to the first meeting. That meeting came about because of the publicity generated in the House over the discrimination against Steven Pilgrim. He has not been banned for one or two years. As Dudley Wood pointed out in the meeting that I chaired last week in Committee Room 14, Steven Pilgrim has been banned for life from playing rugby union.

That ban does not just apply to playing; it applies also to coaching—whether of young children or adults. Steven Pilgrim's ability and right to play the game he loves has been taken from him by a group of elderly and out-of-touch gentlemen.

We did not simply call the meeting because of Steven Pilgrim. As a parliamentary group, we had amassed a growing dossier of evidence of the discrimination at an amateur level with respect to the attitudes towards playing rugby league. I am pleased that the Minister has been able to listen to this debate, because the Government, in relation to Ministers at the Ministry of Defence, have a case to answer. I do not make the point in a partisan way because Ministers at the MOD under the last Labour Government had the same case to answer.

Current Ministry of Defence policy is to try to ensure a complete blackout in the playing of amateur rugby league in the forces. The Ministry does that in two ways. First, rugby league is not allowed assistance from MOD sporting funds for development or insurance purposes, or to cover expenses in connection with playing the game. Secondly, when any attempt is made to organise rugby league—whether it is in the RAF, the Army or the Navy—senior officers take a number of steps to ensure either that the games do not take place, or that they can be quickly stamped out through the issuing of orders at specific stations.

12 midnight

The Ministry of Defence has been provided with the evidence on numerous occasions. We met the Minister of State and came to what we believed was an agreement on the development of the sport and its right to be treated in the same way as rugby union. Last week, in a meeting in Committee Room 14, we asked the Rugby Football Union to join us in agreeing a common approach to the right of armed forces personnel to play rugby league. Mr. Wood refused to participate and indicated clearly that the union, along with its colleagues in the MOD, would continue to oppose the introduction of the playing of rugby league in the armed forces.

Last year, the Government gave the Royal Navy alone some £35,000 in development funds for the full-time employment of rugby union coaches in the MOD. Resources have also been provided for the RAF and the Army. We are not opposed to that; we are saying that people who join the armed forces should be allowed to engage in the sport of their choice and should be given the time and opportunity to do so rather than being discriminated against.

We are concerned not only about the discrimination, but about the web of the deceit involved in sham amateurism. At the meeting, Mr. Wood and his colleague Bob Rogers were questioned in detail about the role of their organisation in relation to payments, or substitute payments, for playing rugby union. Mr. Wood made it absolutely clear that there was no evidence whatever of any payments, direct or indirect, for rugby union played in England under the direction of the Rugby Football Union.

We now know that that was a direct untruth. Not only did Mr. Wood mislead Committee members; when questioned, he deliberately did not inform us that Mr. Rogers—who was also present—had chaired the investigation into the payments made to rugby union players. At the time when he told us that there was no proof whatever, the report was already on his desk awaiting his consideration. That report—commissioned by Mr. Wood and prepared by Mr. Rogers—is dealt with in great detail in The Times today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am listening attentively to the hon. Gentleman; he has not once mentioned the national lottery, to which the amendment is supposed to relate. I do not think that it is in order to deal in depth with the pros and cons of evidence given to a parliamentary Committee. The hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe), who moved the amendment, related his speech firmly to the lottery; even that was stretching it, but I was prepared to be lenient in his case. I do not think that a repetition is necessary.

Mr. McCartney: I made it clear at the outset, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I was speaking in support of amendment No. 1. The wording is quite clear——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The wording of the amendment is, indeed, quite clear. The hon. Gentleman began by saying that he was speaking to it; that was the last that we have heard of it so far.

Mr. McCartney: I am not challenging your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I feel that, in saying that this was an anti-discrimination amendment, I made it clear that I was trying to explain the reasons why an all-party group tabled the amendment and to give evidence. There is no point in tabling an amendment without being prepared to give detailed reasons for doing so. Some Conservative Members may, for whatever reason, find it uncomfortable to hear the evidence. But the evidence must be heard in support of the amendment.

The evidence that I have is not a repeat of that put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) or the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller). It is the evidence of the Rugby Football Union. The evidence should be placed on the record in the debate because the RFU was given an opportunity by an all-party group in the House to put its views on the matter. In the confines of the House, it made it clear and set out in crystal clear terms that there was no evidence of sham amateurism. It said that there was no need, therefore, for an amendment such as amendment No. 1. It is for that reason that I wish to quote the evidence in the report that Mr. Wood has received, produced by his colleague Mr. Rogers, whom we interviewed on 21 April.

The evidence is contained in an article today in The Times, which is not known as a newspaper that supports the game of rugby league. The report was entitled "Inducements to move, incentives to stay and other illegal payments." It produced a "brief but not exhaustive" list of the evidence that it uncovered. The newspaper article said that payments to amateur players in England had arisen through the following:

"excessive expenses, cars, . . . fictitious employment, cash-playing bonuses, clothing, fictitious expenses, housing-mortgage support, writing rugby articles, appearance money, overseas trips, luxury items, free or subsidised accommodation, car passenger expenses, fictitious appearances, sponsorship holidays, and family support."

If that list does not suggest a professional sport, I do not know what is. The list shows hypocrisy. I know of few rugby league players even at the highest level of the game who are provided with such inducements to play their sport.

It is also interesting to note that when members of the Committee raised the issue with the Chancellor of the Exchequer he said that he could not investigate it or put it to the Inland Revenue because rugby union was an amateur sport and, therefore, payments did not exist. Perhaps the report of the debate should be passed on to the Treasury so that it can investigate what is known to go on but is not reported for tax purposes by the Rugby Football Union.

On bank holiday Monday, at Wigan central park, a race will take place between Martin Offiah, a former rugby union player and now a Great Britain international winger who plays for Wigan and hopefully will be man of the match at Wembley on Saturday, Andrew Harriman, the man of the tournament at the seven-a-side world championships at Murrayfield two or three weeks ago, and Rory Underwood, the current English international wing forward.

They will race to find out who is the fastest rugby player in Britain. Under the rules described by Mr. Wood, the players will not be playing rugby and, therefore, will not be banned. They will be in a rugby league ground running against a rugby league player, but because they will not be playing rugby league, it will be OK. They will turn a blind eye to it. Yet Mr. Steve Pilgrim, who played a trial match as an amateur on a rugby league ground has been banned for life from playing the sport in which he wishes to participate. It is a human rights issue and one which for far too long has been swept under the carpet in the House.

Through the Bill we want to put on notice the Rugby Football Union, the Welsh Rugby Union, the Irish Rugby Football Union and the Scottish Rugby Union that unless they end discrimination no resources will be used from either the lottery or public funds to benefit those who, through discrimination, prevent others from playing the game of their choice.

Mr. Davidson: I wish to speak briefly to this amendment. [Hon. Members: "Hear, hear!"] I thank hon. Members for their enthusiastic response.

I do not represent a constituency in which rugby league is played, but I was brought up in an area in which many rugby union players went on to play rugby league. It always struck me as extremely unfair that those players, when they reached the end of their league playing days, were not allowed to return to rugby union to put something back in the game as coaches or in any other capacity.

It is absurd to talk about the national lottery as a means of raising money for sport, when a certain sport refuses to allow former players to put something back, voluntarily, into their sport. Such behaviour should be subject to public policy. We should also question whether public money should be given to organisations that discriminate so blatantly against one group of citizens simply because they chose to play one sport rather than another.

I know that the Bill gives Ministers a number of reserve powers. They should tell us their intentions regarding those powers. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Marten) has expressed his reservations about some sports clubs that discriminate on the grounds of race and other lines. Members have alleged that clubs discriminate on the grounds of sex. That matter, too, should be a matter of public policy. The Minister should make it clear that he wishes to have a level playing field so that all can benefit from the public moneys distributed through the lottery.

Hon. Members have done the country a service by bringing certain issues about rugby league into the open. I hope that the Minister will give a clear statement to the effect that discrimination will not be tolerated. I hope that we can look forward to swift action and pressure being exerted on the English Rugby Union in particular, as well as the other rugby unions and other sports that practise similar discrimination.

Mr. Pendry: I commend what my hon. Friends have done and I am pleased that, after some battle, their amendment was eventually selected for debate.

The late hour may be inconvenient to some, but that is tough, My hon. Friends have raised an important issue and it falls within the context of the Bill, because the Sports Council should not be allowed to distribute lottery money to a body that actively discriminates. The Minister for Sport cannot stand aside after hearing about that discrimination. He should agree with his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. Hargreaves), who thought that a full debate on the issue should be held in Government time. The Minister should nurture that debate.

The Minister is the custodian of sport and he should call for an inquiry into the matter. The House is indebted to my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) and my other hon. Friends for raising the issue. I hope that the Minister's response will be constructive, and I am as anxious as my hon. Friends to hear what he has to say.

Mr. Key: It will come as no surprise to hon. Members to learn that I see myself as the custodian of the Bill. I shall be unable to recommend to the House that the amendment should be accepted for reasons I shall cite. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe), however, for drawing attention to such an extremely important issue.

We discussed the matter briefly in Committee, and I am aware of its importance to our clubs and those beyond our shores. My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) and the hon. Members for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Marrow), for Wakefield (Mr. McCartney) and for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Davidson) have also contributed to a debate in prime Government time - some might find that hard to believe, given the lateness of the hour - during the important Report stage of an extremely important Bill. The issue has been put firmly on the agenda, and I recognise its importance. I undertake to the hon. Member for Wakefield that I shall see whether I can do anything appropriate about it, although it would not be appropriate to accept the amendment.

I believe that this is best left to the determination of the distributing bodies subject, as regards this amendment, to directions laid down in the Bill by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State. It would be quite inappropriate to make it an inflexible exclusion on the face of the Bill.

The policy pursued by a governing body in respect of excluding participation by professional players in its competitions is a matter for it to determine and not a matter on which the Government should seek to dictate through access to lottery funds. Applications for lottery funds should surely be judged on their individual merits.

The sports councils are well aware of the policies of the governing bodies of sport in the United Kingdom. To rule out whole classes of body in advance on the ground that some hon. Members were unhappy with one of the policies of the governing body, whatever the merits either way, would prevent an individual club from ever being able to apply for lottery funds for worthwhile projects and projects which would accord the general sport provision in their communities, for example, for children at local schools. Surely those potential beneficiaries should not be punished because of their local rugby committee which belongs to the Union and not to the League.

12.15 am

The Government must in being the anti-bought principle intact. It is tempting to be drawn into exploring suggestions that I can intervene in the governing bodies of sport to make them change their rules and bans, but I do not find that attractive. It is against the spirit of successive Governments of all political colours over many years. What matters is that there is a proper public debate of the issue, and the governing bodies of the sport perhaps need to have their heads knocked together.

Mr. Churchill: I thank the Minister for his response, and I thank my colleagues, particularly my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Marrow), for their contributions. I did not expect the debate to come from this side of the Chamber and was interested to find that it did. Nevertheless, I understand the points that he made, although I disagree with him. I also thank my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Davidson) for raising the matter in Committee. We take the points that he has made about the situation, especially in Scotland.

I appreciate the Minister's response. I believe that he has taken close note of the comments made by those who have spoken tonight and that, privately, he shares many of the misgivings of hon. Members about the present situation.

I made it quite clear when I moved amendment No. 1 that there was no direct attempt to block funding to the Rugby Football Union, but the discrimination that has gone on now for nearly 100 years is unacceptable. I made it clear that there are hon. Members on both sides who are not prepared to tolerate this practice any longer.

I will in a moment beg leave to withdraw the amendment, having secured this important debate, but I make it clear that this matter may well be raised in another place by those who feel equally strongly about it. There are also moves in the European Parliament, where there is a well-organised and successful rugby league group, to raise it at a European level. But I fear that what will happen to bring this matter to a head will be action taken by particular players through the courts, and that will be to say a matter of great regret. I hope that we can reach a satisfactory sense resolution of the issue after this conflict of nearly 100 years.

Having made those points, and having expressed my gratitude to those who have stayed to take part in the debate, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 42

Registration of Societies

Mr. Alton: I beg to move amendment No. 17, in page 16, line 25, leave out '£50,000' and insert '£100,000'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 97, in page 16, line 25, leave out '£50,000' and insert '£250,000'

Mr. Alton: I will not detain the House long, as we are all keen to make rapid progress.

In Committee the Minister said that he would consider the position of the society and local lotteries dealt with in part III of the Bill. I refer the House to line 25 of clause 42, where the figure of £50,000 appears. Many members of the Committee expressed their anxiety that the figure was too low, and should be increased. I therefore tabled an amendment suggesting £100,000.

Amendment No. 97, tabled by the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme), suggests the even higher figure of £250,000. I understand that the Government are willing to consider that figure, as they undertook to give the matter further thought in Committee.

I am happy to be associated with the terms of the right hon. Gentleman's amendment and will therefore not press my own.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In response to a debate instigated by the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) I said in Committee that I would reflect on this. The House will be pleased to know that I have done that, and that I am happy to accept amendment No. 97—extending my regrets in the direction of Mossley Hill. I hope that the hon. Member will not be too disappointed.

Mr. Orme: It is not often that I get £250,000 from the Government. Some of us, including the lotteries council, met the Minister and discussed the matter with him. We made a strong case for raising the figure to £250,000, and the Government have seen the wisdom of that.

Mr. Alton: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment made: No. 97, in page 16, line 25, leave out '£50,000' and insert '£250,000'.—[Mr. Orme.]

Clause 43

Registration of lottery schemes

Mr. Pendry: I beg to move amendment No. 96, in page 17 [Clause 43], leave out lines 1 to 5, and insert—

'43.-(1) Section 5(3) of the 1976 Act (conditions that must be satisfied for a society's lottery not to be unlawful) shall be amended as follows.

(2) In paragraph (b) (registration of a society with the Gaming Board), after "society" shall be inserted "or a connected company to that society".

(3) In paragraph (c) (promotion in accordance with approved scheme), after "society" shall be inserted "or a connected company to that society".

(4) Paragraph (d) (lottery scheme to be registered with the Gaming Board if the total value of tickets or chances to be sold in the lottery is more than £10,000) and the word "and" immediately preceding it shall be omitted.'.

It is clearly established in charity and tax law that lottery promotion is a trading activity. Consequently, charities undertake lotteries through connected companies controlled by them. Existing small lottery legislation, however, does not allow the Gaming Board to register the connected companies of charities to run lotteries. It allows only for the registration of the charities themselves. Charity, tax and small lottery law are thus incompatible, and the Bill gives the Government an opportunity to remedy that. We understand that Gaming Board practice until recently has been—sensibly—to register the connected companies of charities to run lotteries. In the past few weeks, however, some charity trading companies have had their registration requests refused.

We do not believe that it is deliberate Government policy to impose further tax liability on charities, but we should like clarification that the Government intend to amend the law. If charities are unable to run lotteries through their connected companies, and must pay tax on their small lottery proceeds, it will greatly reduce the value of small charitable lotteries and provide a further disincentive to charities to run lotteries, thus reducing their income.

As we have made clear, we are concerned about the impact that the national lottery could have on charitable income. Therefore, we welcome measures in part III which are aimed at securing charity income for small lotteries, although we think that the Government could go further. The amendment is compatible with the intention of part III. It is vital that the law be tidied up so that charities are not threatened with additional tax liability. We hope that the Government will accept the spirit of the amendement and will assure us that they will consider the matter and remedy the situation.

Mr. Alan Howarth: At this time of night, I shall say only on the substance of the amendment that the hon. Gentleman's arguments and their purpose are absolutely right. If my hon. Friend the Minister has not already discovered that there are insuperable technical difficulties, I hope that he will do his best to persuade my right hon. Friend the Chancellor to support the proposals. The arguments that we have considered in relation to the amendment reinforce my view on Second Reading that it would be sensible for the Gaming Board to regulate all lotteries.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: If I understand correctly, the purpose of the amendment is to enable a wholly owned trading company of a charity to promote lotteries on behalf of that charity. That is already possible, and I shall explain. Contrary to what the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) has been told by some of his contacts, the Gaming Board has not turned down requests for registration. It suspended consideration of applications for two or three weeks while the law was clarified. Under the Lotteries and Amusements Act 1976, it is possible for wholly owned subsidiaries to be registered as charities and to conduct lotteries. There is no problem.

Mr. Pendry: I am happy to have that assurance. I am sure that what the Minister has said is absolutely correct. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 44

LOTTERY MANAGERS

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I beg to move amendment No. 161, in page 17, line 16 leave out 'he' and insert 'that person'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to consider Government amendments Nos. 162, 163, 164 and 165.

Mr. Lloyd: Amendment Nos. 161, 162 and 165 fulfil an undertaking that I gave in Committee to exempt a wholly owned subsidiary trading company of a society that manages a lottery on behalf of that society from a new certification regime for lottery managers.

Clause 44 is designed to bring under Gaming Board supervision what are known as external lottery managers. Those managers undertake the running of a lottery on behalf of a society in return for a management fee, which is often an agreed proportion of the lottery proceeds. It is important to provide for some control over the operations of external managers to ensure that the lotteries that they manage are properly and honestly conducted and to safeguard the interests of the societies or local authorities that employ them.

The same considerations do not apply to a wholly owned subsidiary of a society. Such subsidiaries cannot be described as external lottery managers in the sense that they act independently of the society, and we therefore think it is right to exempt them from the requirement to obtain a Gaming Board certificate.

Amendments Nos. 163 and 164 are technical. Proposed new section 9A(2) to the 1976 Act is drafted on the basis that a society must always be an unincorporated body. In fact, a society may be either an incorporated or unincorporated body, and the amendments alter section 9A(2) to reflect that position.

Mr. Orme: Does the amendment deal with donated expenses?

Mr. Lloyd: No, it does not deal with donated expenses. That is relevant to a later group of amendments.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 162, in page 17, line 21, at end insert—

'(ba) in the case of a society's lottery, a company that is wholly owned by the society,'.

No. 163, in page 17, line 27, leave out 'a society or other' and insert 'an'.

No. 164, in page 17, line 28, leave out 'society or other'.

No. 165, in page 17, line 29, at end insert—

'( ) For the purposes of subsection (1)(ba) above—

(a) "company" means a company formed and registered under the Companies Act 1985 or a company to which the provisions of that Act apply as they apply to a company so formed and registered, and

(b) a company is wholly owned by a society if the society is entitled (whether directly or through one or more nominees) to exercise, or control the exercise of, the whole of the voting power at any general meeting of the company.'.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Clause 45

FREQUENCY OF LOTTERIES

Amendment made: No. 166, in page 17, leave out lines 36 to 39.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Clause 46

RULES FOR LOTTERIES

Mr. Pendry: I beg to move amendment No. 196, in page 18, line 10, leave out '10 per cent.' and insert '20 per cent.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 12, in page 18, leave out lines 12 and 13 and insert—

'(6) The total value of the tickets or chances sold in any one such lottery shall not exceed one quarter of the total value of tickets or chances which may be sold in all such lotteries held in any one year and promoted on behalf of the same society or by the same local authority.'.

No. 4, in page 18, line 13, leave out '£500,000' and insert '£1 million.'.

12.30 am

Mr. Pendry: The purpose of the amendment is to allow societies to offer larger, more attractive top prizes. That should assist small lotteries to survive the competition from the national lottery. Research suggests that the lottery could have dramatic effect on charitable income from small lotteries, as has already been pointed out. Charities in Ireland experienced a 60 per cent. drop in their small lottery income since the creation of the state lottery in 1987 and, according to that oft-quoted Guardian-GAH group report, the drop in small lottery income in the United Kingdom as a result of the national lottery could be as great as 50 per cent.

As we know, the Government introduced amendments to the Bill in Committee which increased the limit of the size of the single lottery from £250,000 to £500,000 and changed the maximum prize limit from £25,000 to 10 per cent. of potential ticket sales, whichever is the greater. While those changes were welcome, as was said in Committee, many charities are still doubtful about whether they will be sufficient to maintain charitable incomes for small lotteries.

The Opposition believe that the Government should do more to ensure that charitable lotteries are strong enough to survive the competition from big prize national lotteries. I am sure that every hon. Member has heard it argued that the size of the top prize in the national lottery will be the crucial factor determining sales. Surely the same argument holds for the smaller lotteries run by charities, sports clubs and community groups. We believe that the maximum top prize in a society lottery should be increased from £25,000 or 10 per cent. to £25,000 or 20 per cent. of the potential ticket sales. As the Bill is drafted, that would mean a top prize of £50,000 in a society lottery.

We also support the amendment proposing that the size of a single lottery should be increase to £1·25 million. The amendment would enable charities and other societies to reach the £5 million turnover proposed in the Bill by running four rather than 10 lotteries. If the amendment were accepted, it would mean that charities would incur lower administrative costs in reaching the total turnover limit. More small lottery proceeds would be available for charity and community use.

In debate on both the issue of single lottery size and the maximum prize level, the Minister said that the Government were not prepared to allow small lotteries that would compete with, and poach sales from, the national lottery. However, a charity lottery with a turnover of £1·25 million and 20 per cent. maximum size could hardly be thought to compete with a national lottery with jackpots that could reach, with the roll-over of three games, something like £44 million at one estimate.

The purpose of the amendment is to make charitable and other society lotteries more attractive and more likely to survive and prosper, given competition from a heavily promoted multi-million pound prize lottery. We hope that the Government will be prepared to consider again both the limit and the size of the single lottery, and the maximum prize in any society lottery.

Mr. Alan Howarth: In deference to the lateness of the hour, I shall be as brief as I can. The House will be relieved to know that this is the last time that I shall seek to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I want to speak to amendment No. 12, which stands in my name and those of my hon. Friends. I have considerable sympathy with the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry). My amendment is an alternative means of achieving essentially the same objective.

I appreciate that the Government have already amended clause 46, and the movement that they have allowed is welcome. The annual limit of £5 million is fair and sensible and I welcome the spirit of the amendment that the Government have already made. However, there seems to be a basic inconsistency in Government thinking on the issue. The Bill allows a society to run lotteries with proceeds of up to £5 million per annum, but limits the size of each lottery to make it impossible, in practical terms, to reach the new limit, because each society would have to run at least 10 lotteries a year.

My hon. Friend the Minister said on a previous occasion that some societies do run instant lotteries 10 times a year. That is possible in the case of draw-type lotteries, which are suitable for football and supporters' clubs that meet regularly—but it is not realistic for national charities whose members and supporters are widely dispersed throughout the country. In practical terms, it is impossible for them to run more than four or five modern, instant lotteries a year on a national scale.

A period of 12 to 15 weeks is needed for each game to be produced, distributed, sold and recovered. Tickets and posters must be designed and distributed to thousands of retail outlets, a publicity campaign organised, tickets sold, and money gathered in. The draw must then be held, and perhaps an event organised in that connection.

Ten weeks is the very least in which that cycle of activity can be completed. I prefer my amendment to amendment No. 4 because it would still require societies to run instant draws every 10 weeks and that is too frequent. More time should be allowed. I note that the Government do not intend to restrict the national lottery's own instant lotteries in the same way.

My hon. Friend the Minister also suggested that societies and charities could run concurrent lotteries, but that is not an attractive solution. It would require a double set of printing, posters, administration, accounting and advertising. That would be expensive and confusing for charities and for the Gaming Board. Also, I am advised that it would contravene the current regulations governing lotteries and would require the amendment of section 10 of the Lotteries and Amusements Act 1976. It seems illogical to allow two lotteries of £500,000 and not one of £1 million.

Charities depend on the efforts of their voluntary workers and everyone wants them to keep their administrative costs down. It is not realistic on either count to ask charities to organise 10 lotteries a year or to run two or three concurrently.

Amendment No. 12 would raise the limit on the turnover for any individual lottery to £1·25 million, with a corresponding top prize limit of £125,000. My hon. Friend the Minister warned of the danger of creating mini national lotteries, but it should be borne in mind that a charity lottery would be able to offer a prize of that size only four or five times a year, at most. A prize of £125,000 would not compete in any real way with the national lottery's weekly prize of millions, as the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde suggested.

Many charities want to continue to raise their own funds rather than rely on the national lottery. It seems unfair to restrict their initiative, particularly if the Government give them a total annual limit of £5 million which it is impossible to realise in practice. Charities should be allowed to run their lotteries on a cost-effective basis and to offer attractive prizes.

My hon. Friend the Minister may argue that the arrangements can be altered by statutory instrument, but it is important not to start off on the wrong footing. I fear that charity lotteries would wither on the basis that my hon. Friend proposes. A prize of £500,000 only would be perceived by the public as just too unattractive compared with national lottery prizes. Irremediable damage would be done before the regulations were altered and charity lotteries would be virtually destroyed—as in Ireland, where, as was mentioned earlier, small charity lottery income has collapsed 60 per cent. If that were replicated in Britain, charity income from small lotteries would fall from the present level of £240 million to less than £100 million, which would be most serious. I ask my hon. Friend to address that point.

Lady Olga Maitland: I support amendment No. 12, which was spoken to by my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth). It reflects my concern about how small charities and voluntary organisations that run their own lotteries can survive the anticipated enormous success of the national lottery. Scratch card lottery tickets are sold by 200 charities and bring in an estimated income of about £40 million a year. They are unlikely to be able to raise similar sums of money if the Bill as it stands becomes law.

Therefore, I ask my hon. Friend to give serious consideration to the amendment, particularly bearing in mind that the Government will be able to be generous after the undoubted success of the national lottery. I ask the Government to support what I call the little fella, the smaller charities, and allow them to raise the full sum to which they are entitled. The means for doing so has not been provided for in the Bill.

Mr. Alton: I wish to associate amendment No. 4—in my name and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan)—with amendment No. 12, spoken to by the hon. Member for

[Mr. Alton]

Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth), and amendment No. 196, which was moved by the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry). If any one of the amendments were accepted, the Bill would be improved and would go some way towards meeting the concerns which the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady O. Maitland) raised this evening, but which she more appropriately raised in Committee, where she explored the issues raised in these amendments rather than scratch cards, with which we dealt earlier this evening.

The amount of money that can be given in lottery prizes by charities, voluntary organisations, football clubs and others is an important matter. My hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Ms Lynne), who has been here for most of today's debate, has made representations to me about the football clubs in her constituency. Recently, I met Liverpool football club representatives, and I know that many other voluntary organisations and charities are anxious about the amount of prize money that they will be able to give. Their concern is that, if they are competing with a lottery that is handing out huge sums of money, they will look like very poor relations.

The arguments have been well put. Whichever of the amendments the Minister could find it in his heart to accept would improve the Bill. Even if he is unable to accept any of them tonight, I hope that he will continue to bend his mind to the issue and accept an amendment in the other place.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: As is clear from all the speeches, these amendments seek to increase still further the limit on the proceeds and prizes from a single lottery. We amended the Bill in Committee to increase the limit on proceeds from £250,000 to £500,000 and the limit on prizes from £25,000 to the greater of £25,000 or 10 per cent. of the proceeds.

Amendment No. 4, spoken to by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton), seeks to double the proceeds limit to £1 million. Amendment No. 12, spoken to by my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth), is even more ambitious, for it would provide, in effect, a limit of £1·25 million. Amendment No. 196, moved by the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry), would double the prize limit, so that the promoter of a £1·25 million lottery could offer a top prize of £250,000.

It is a matter of judgment as to where the line between small and medium-sized lotteries, as provided for in the 1976 Act and the national lottery, is drawn. The Government's view, however, is that lotteries of the scale envisaged by the amendments overstep sensible bounds. We have drawn the line at £500,000 for proceeds and £50,000 for prizes. I accept that it is possible for others to take a different view, but what I do not accept is that the levels that we have provided for put small lotteries at risk. Although I know that some of the lotteries that describe themselves as small would like higher limits, most are pleased about the changes that we have incorporated in the Bill.

It is beyond doubt that the Government's new limits represent a substantial increase on those currently in operation—£180,000 for proceeds and £12,000 for prizes. They will greatly enhance the appeal of such lotteries.

I return now to what the hon. Member for Mossley Hill said, having experienced such debates many times before. It would be sensible at the very least for societies to become accustomed to the new limits before we contemplate further increases. As my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon said, we can keep all the limits under review and we shall do so. If further changes appear desirable in the future, they may be made by statutory instrument. We would not need primary legislation.

I advise the House to accept the substantial increases and to leave matters there for the present.

12.45 am

Mr. Pendry: I expected that reply from the Minister, and I am sure that other hon. Members also expected it. As long as the Minister is in charge, I am happy that he will consider the issue sympathetically. I know that he will not be in his post for too long because we shall be on that side of the House. However, as long as he is in charge, I am sure that he will keep the matter in mind. With those serious remarks, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I beg to move amendment No. 167, in page 18, line 28, at end insert—

'(5A) In subsection (11) (not more than half of a lottery's proceeds may be appropriated for the provision of prizes) for "one half" there shall be substituted "50 per cent.".'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 168, 169, 172 and 191.

Mr. Lloyd: Government amendment No. 169 is the cornerstone of this group of amendments. It would enable the Secretary of State to vary the percentages specified in section 11 of the 1976 Act. The other four amendments make consequential drafting charges.

We have received many representations from football clubs, rugby clubs and others—probably even from rugby league clubs—about lottery expenses. At present, the 1976 Act provides that no more than 25 per cent. of the proceeds of a lottery may be appropriated on account of expenses. This will be of particular interest to the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme). It has been argued that that limit is unreasonably low. Although many promoters of society lotteries are able to operate comfortably within the 25 per cent. limit, we accept that many others—especially those promoting smaller lotteries—find it difficult to do so. In response to representations, we amended the Bill in Committee to raise the expense limit to 30 per cent.

The Lotteries Council, of which the right hon. Member for Salford, East is president, suggested that even that higher figure is insufficient, and the council has argued for a 35 per cent. limit. I am not convinced that a limit above 30 per cent. is necessary or desirable as it would whittle away the amount of a lottery's proceeds which went to good causes. I now repeat what I have said when speaking to a number of other amendments because we are moving into uncharted territory. We believe that it would be sensible to be in a position to alter the 30 per cent. limit without recourse to primary legislation if there was a strong case for a further increase in future.

The amendment would also make it possible to vary by order the percentage limit on the size of the top prize in a lottery and on the amount of the proceeds of a lottery which may be used for the provision of prizes. I stress that we have no plans at present to vary any of the percentages, but the amendment would ensure that we could act reasonably quickly if circumstances changed or if experience suggested that we had not judged one of the limits correctly.

The changes do not mean that we have got it wrong. Experience may suggest that the limits should be altered, and I think that all hon. Members want us to get it right as soon as possible, so it is sensible to have powers available so that we can move by regulation instead of having to find time for primary legislation, which it is often difficult to do.

Mr. Orme: The issue of donated expenses still remains a problem for small organisations. Many such organisations share offices with their lottery companies, and often have overlapping duties, making it difficult for them to determine exactly what constitutes a beneficiary donating expense. That point has been made to me and to many hon. Members by small organisations that fear that the provision could be their Achilles heel.

The Minister has already said that he is prepared to consider the matter again. Will he have one more look at it before the measure goes to the Lords, where it may be discussed further? I have other representations to put to him, and all I ask is that he keeps an open mind for the moment.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: It may be helpful if I say a couple of sentences in response. I do not expect to change the rules because I think that they are adequate and will not be onerous. Expenses incurred solely or primarily to enable the lottery to function, such as the costs of printing tickets and of advertising, must, of course, be counted as the expenses of the lottery, but the definition will not include the use of office space belonging to the club or society if it has not been acquired especially to house the lottery team. That is the kind of principle on which the Gaming Board will work.

I understand, however, that there is considerable worry about the exact side of the balance sheet on which certain expenses will appear, so I have asked the Gaming Board to give societies guidance so that they will know what position they will be in before they make the decisions that might bring them one side, rather than the other, of the 30 per cent. limit.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 48

Powers of the Secretary of State to vary monetary limits and to prescribe or vary fees

Amendments made: No. 168, in page 19, line 24, leave out 'monetary limit' and insert 'sum specified'.

No. 169, in page 19, leave out line 25 and insert—

'(3) For subsection (1)(b) there shall be substituted—

"(b) vary any sum or percentage specified in section 11 above;".'.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I beg to move amendment No. 170, in page 19, line 26, after 'for"' insert 'under'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 171.

Mr. Lloyd: The amendments ensure that smaller lotteries, probably those that operate a series of single lotteries with a turnover of less than £10,000, that are registered with the Gaming Board may pay an annual fee rather than a fee per lottery, as happens now. That will help to keep down the size of the total fees that they pay. I hope that, in conjunction with my acceptance of amendment No. 97, the amendments will meet with the approval of those who have the interests of small lotteries at heart, because it will improve the position of the organisations that run them.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 171, in page 19, line 27, after 'substituted"' insert ', or provide that no fees are payable, under'.

No. 172, in page 19, line 31, leave out 'monetary limit' and insert 'sum specified'.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

Clause 50

Removal of prohibition on the use of premises for the delivery of football pools coupons and stakes

Mr. Pendry: I beg to move amendment No. 16, in page 20, line 32, leave out from first 'competition' to end of line 36 and insert

', in relation to a registered pool promoter, means a competition which is of the same kind as or is broadly similar to a competition held by him before the passing of this Act.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 173 and 174.

Mr. Pendry: It would be churlish of me not to recognise that the Government have come a long way in accommodating the concerns about the sale of pools coupons in shops. Although we fully support the spirit of clause 50 as amended in Committee, we have several concerns about its definition of a qualifying competition, especially the definition in new subsection (4D) (a) of section 1 of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963: "a competition for prizes for making forecasts as to association football games played on a Saturday".

We realise that the Government's new amendments Nos. 173 and 174 make that definition a little broader, so that instead of being limited to football matches played on a Saturday, it will include games played on Sundays and bank holidays. That is a good step forward, but in our view it does not go far enough. Amendments Nos. 173 and 174 do not solve the problem of pools competitions based on events other than football matches, such as major horse races and cricket matches, which now commonly appear on coupons.

It is important that the pools companies are permitted to run their businesses as efficiently as possible, with the minimum of bureaucratic restraints and obstacles. I am sure that the Government would tell us that that is in line with Government policy. It is absurd, therefore, that the companies will be allowed to sell in shops only coupons that use only football matches, whereas on coupons that are sold door-to-door, they will be allowed to use a number of different sports. The ludicrous position would be created whereby the pools companies were forced to issue two types of coupon. The first would be for sale in shops and would relate only to football matches and the second would cover the rest of their business.

My hon. Friends and I can see no reason why the Government would wish to introduce such a petty and needless restriction. It is already established practice to run pools competitions on sporting events other than football. The Minister surely cannot argue that the use of other sports on coupons from shops would be socially damaging or would lead to unnecessary stimulation in gambling. Perhaps he could enlighten us about the reasoning behind this curious measure.

The amendment is a simple method by which to maintain the status quo and to avoid all the problems implied by the needlessly restrictive new subsection (4D). It uses wording similar to that contained in the British Telecommunications Act 1981 when it was necessary to ensure the legality of the collection service in the context of the Post Office letters monopoly. I hope that the Minister has taken that point on board and that he will give me a constructive reply.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) raised several points. The speediest way in which I can deal with them is, before responding to the amendment, to say something about Government amendments Nos. 173 and 174 which deal with several of the points he raised. The Government amendments make modest changes to the definition of a qualifying competition in clause 50. Clause 50, which was added to the Bill in the Committee, allows pools coupons and stakes to be collected in retail outlets. The clause is carefully drafted to confine the concession to the present weekly, long-odds football pools competition. The definition of a "qualifying competition" seeks to encapsulate the key features of such competitions.

The reason for restricting the concession is simple. It is to preserve the existing framework whereby only socially harmless forms of low-stake, long-odds gambling, such as the football pools and lotteries, are available in ordinary retail outlets while harder forms of gambling continue to be confined to dedicated, licensed premises, such as betting offices, where they can be better supervised.

In Committee, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) pointed out that the definition of a qualifying competition would cause pools companies one or two difficulties. The definition refers to a "competition for prizes for making forecasts as to association football games played on a Saturday".

It was put to us that the pools companies were finding it increasingly difficult to obtain 58 first-class fixtures played on a Saturday and were having to resort to using minor league matches. We are told that including such matches on the pools coupon has a depressing effect on turnover. A further difficulty with the definition is that it would prevent coupons from being collected in shops during the Christmas week when the matches contained on the coupons were, in years where Christmas fell on a Saturday, played on a bank holiday Monday or Tuesday.

A final problem arises in relation to the reference to games played. It is not uncommon for matches to be postponed, perhaps because of bad weather—a point made by the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde—and for the results to be determined by the pools panel. I accept those points and would accommodate the first two by including football games played on a Sunday or bank holiday and the third by referring to games to be played.

In Committee, the hon. Member for Erdington raised a more fundamental objection to the definition of a qualifying competition. With the amendment, the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde returns to the fray on the issue. Occasionally the pools companies run competitions on other sports. The Littlewoods coupons for 3 April included a pools competition on the Grand National. I do not know whether there was a box for the false starts. I understand that Littlewoods, Vernons and Zetters also run occasional pools on other horse races, and on cricket and snooker matches.

The entry form for those other pools competitions is printed on the reverse side of the weekly football pools coupon. Under the provisions of clause 50, such coupons could not be collected in retail outlets. The hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde argues that that would be unreasonable. Although superficially I can see why he says that, I do not agree with him. The retail outlet concession is deliberately confined to football pools because of their special character. To allow pool betting on other sports to take place in newsagents and other shops could potentially turn them into unlicensed unregulated betting offices. A whole range of other pool competitions could be brought in by a whole range of other promoters. Some hon. Members may be very relaxed about that, but I believe that many others remain to be persuaded that the system of dedicated licensed premises for betting has had its day.

1 am

Our debate in Committee has affected the proposal made by the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde, who has sought to narrow the effect of the measure. I see exactly what he seeks to do, and if I could find a way of achieving his objective, I would be tempted to do so. I fear, however, that in attempting to solve one problem, he has created another in its place—as I think one always must if one seeks to draft a narrow amendment in this area.

Although the amendment would allow Littlewoods, Vernons and Zetters to market their existing cricket, snooker and horse-racing competitions, which form a small part of their activities, it would also create a closed market. Anyone setting up as a pool promoter following the enactment of the Bill would not benefit from clause 50 and so could not engage shops to collect his pools coupons.

I have no doubt that the existing pools companies would welcome such statutory protection from competition, and the Opposition may feel comfortable putting their names to such an amendment, but it is too anti-competition and too weighted against any newcomer for the Government to be able to commend it to the House. I hope that the House will not adopt the

Mr. George Howarth: The Minister appears to accept the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) sought to make on behalf of the pools companies about this narrow aspect of business, in respect of which forms are often included on the reverse side of existing coupons.

The Minister may be right to say that the amendment has a wider compass than my hon. Friend intended. But the hon. Gentleman said that if he thought that he could achieve the original intention of the amendment, he would be willing to do so. Would he be willing, before the Bill goes to the other place, to look again to see whether he can draft a provision that would achieve what my hon. Friend suggested, rather than having the wider implications which he says the amendment has?

Mr. Lloyd: I have examined the matter carefully since the Committee stage. I do not think that it is possible to amend the Bill in this way without opening up the possibility of large-scale pool betting on all sorts of activities from all sorts of promoters in unlicensed outlets. I shall certainly think again, and if the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) can come up with a foolproof form of words, I shall be interested to see it and shall think seriously about suggesting to my colleagues that it should be introduced in the other place.

Mr. Pendry: Let me reiterate what my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North has said. We have heard a lot about the fact that there will be a year to think things through. I shall not go as far as my hon. Friend in suggesting that something could be done before the Bill goes to the other place, but perhaps during that year a few heads could be knocked together so that words that would be acceptable to the Government can be formulated. With those words of wisdom, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

'and—

(c) one shall be nominated after consultation with the leaders of the minority parties other than Her Majesty's Opposition.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 7, in page 31, line 37, after 'Opposition', insert 'or of any other minority party.'.

Mr. Alton: These two amendments were moved in Committee. The Minister will recall that we were unable to have a Division on the issue of the representation of minority parties in the House on the Millennium Commission.

Despite discussions that have been held in the intermim with Ministers and the Secretary of State, I understand that it has been impossible to make any progress on the question of representation and I give notice that, if we are unable to extract anything from the Minister when he replies as to whether the issue will receive further consideration, I intend to press the amendment to a Division as we were unable to have a Division in Committee.

[Mr. Alton]

I am grateful to the official Opposition and to the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) who, in contrast, has been extremely helpful on the matter and who was good enough to say earlier that the official Opposition support the principle that the minority parties in the House should be represented on the Millennium Commission.

About 20 per cent. of the funds raised by the national lottery will be dispensed by the Millennium Commission. If there is to be political representation—whether there should be political representation at all is open to question and is a matter that the House may wish to consider—and given that the Government have decided to write on to the face of the Bill the fact that two Ministers and one representative of the official Opposition will be appointed to serve on the commission, it seems extraordinary that no representatives of the 43 Members of the House who serve in seven minority parties should be members of that commission.

There are plenty of examples of the minority parties taking collective decisions—for example, through the Committee of Selection. I recall that when I was my party's Chief Whip, on many occasions, I made joint nominations on behalf of the minority parties to serve on Committees in the House. The principle should be no different in respect of the amendment.

There are nine places available on the commission. I cannot understand why the Government decided to take two places and to give one to the official Opposition and none to the minority parties.

The geographical composition is also worth considering for a moment. It will not have escaped the attention of hon. Members that among the signatories to the amendment are spokesmen for the Democratic Unionist party and the Official Unionist party in Northern Ireland and the Social Democratic and Labour party of Northern Ireland.

Neither the official Opposition nor the Government are represented in Northern Ireland, and it would be scandalous if no one from Ulster were represented on the Millennium Commission. I hope that, at the very least, the Minister will promise Northern Ireland Members that one of the nine places will be allotted to someone from Northern Ireland.

The amendment is supported not only by representatives of the three Northern Ireland parties that I have mentioned, but by members of the Scottish National and Welsh National parties. I think that the breadth of opinion represented should in itself commend the amendment to the House. If there is to be a separate fund with its separate bureaucracy—the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde talked about that earlier—and if it is to have political representatives, surely minority parties should be represented. It is an elementary question of fairness.

The Minister rightly took great pains to point out that there was an extraordinary atmosphere of good will in Committee, although many of us held diametrically opposed views on the issue of the lottery iself—often because of constituency, moral or ethical considerations. At the conclusion of the Committee stage, the Minister himself said that all parties had played a constructive and positive role.

The Committee stage was marked by a very non-adversarial quality: there was great co-operation and partnership between hon. Members on both sides of the Committee as they considered the best way in which to make the lottery work. Although many had deep reservations about whether it should be established at all, we did not allow ideological questions to prevent us from proceeding. Surely, hon. Members should adopt the same spirit when considering who should serve on the Millennium Commission.

Another issue should worry hon. Members. Inevitably, people will be concerned about the nature of the money that is being dispensed by the commission. I believe that those who will monitor the operation of the commission would feel far happier if they knew that it contained a breadth of opinion representing all parties in the House and every part of the United Kingdom. That would leave the commission open to far fewer suggestions that it is the result of a carve-up, or is being manipulated or cynically abused.

The Government should consider the amendments carefully, in the interests of fairness. If they do not feel able to accept them tonight, they should at least give us an assurance that they will consider them in another place, thereby avoiding the need for an otherwise necessary Division.

Mr. Key: When we established the Millennium Commission, we recognised that we were establishing a far-reaching and visionary body that would be of interest to the whole nation. We therefore thought that the Leader of Her Majesty's Opposition ought to be able to nominate one member of the Commission; we did not think that the right of nomination should be spread further. In Committee, we amended our proposals to reduce the number of our nominations to three; we considered that sensible. There is no doubt that politicians will be a minority on the commission.

I find it extraordinary that the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) should suggest that we have engaged in discussions or negotiations between the end of the Committee stage and tonight's debate. I have engaged in no discussions whatever. The hon. Gentleman's comments are, perhaps, predictable, but I cannot accept them. I shall oppose the amendments.

Mr. Alton rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I call Rev. Ian Paisley.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) put his points very fairly. Let me point out to the Government that small parties are represented in the House. Do the Government feel that they should have the largest slice of the cake? Are they saying to the official Opposition, "You can have one representative; all the other, smaller parties should be forgotten"? I do not think that that bears out what the Government have continually told us about the objectives of the Bill.

The attention of the House has been drawn to the fact that the three small parties from Northern Ireland will not be represented. They do not always see eye to eye. We are always told that we should see eye to eye, but immediately we do, people want nothing to do with us.

The Secretary of State for National Heritage has read deeply in theology. He will know that the millennium is a wonderful thing. It is 1,000 years of peace and prosperity and the reign of Christ. He will also know that before it there comes a great tribulation. It seems that he would like to throw the smaller parties into the great tribulation rather than bring them into the millennium.

If the Government cannot accede to what has been requested in the amendment, can they give an assurance that Northern Ireland will not go without representation?

1.15 am

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The Social Democratic and Labour party will get the seat.

Rev. Ian Paisley: That is all right. It can get the seat. I am not interested in who gets the seat, but there should be some representation from Northern Ireland. This should not be a party political matter, it should be a matter for the House. The Government would not say to the Opposition that the representative cannot come from one wing of the Opposition, whether it be left, right or centre. That should not come into the matter. That is the way in which I look at this matter.

Everyone knows my views on the national lottery. I have made them clear in the House. But the Minister should give the Northern Ireland people at least some sort of recognition and representation.

Mr. Pendry: We sympathise with the arguments that have been made. I thought that it was discourteous of the Minister not to answer the point that was about to be made to him by the hon. Member for Mossley Hill on whether representations had been made since the Committee. It would have been helpful to the House if the Minister had given the hon. Gentleman the opportunity to make his case.

I wish to make two points. First, if this is a national lottery, it should be seen to be truly so. Representatives from the House should be on the commission and should be from as wide a spread of parties as possible. Secondly, many people would like to see Parliament get closer to the national lottery to provide accountability. Therefore, there is a lot to commend the amendment and we support it.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Order for Third Reading read.—[Queen's consent, on behalf of the Crown, signified.]

1.28 am

The Secretary of State for National Heritage (Mr. Peter Brooke): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

It is a late hour, but there are courtesies to be observed, however briefly. The Bill has been the subject of much interest, both inside and outside the House. It has been subject to a thorough scrutiny by the Standing Committee and by the House tonight, and it has emerged from the Committee and from this evening's debate a better Bill. I therefore pay tribute to all those who served in the Committee for their work on the Bill which, as has often been remarked, is almost unique in its combination of measures—establishing the lottery, making arrangements for the distribution of the net proceeds and taking the opportunity to help small lotteries.

It has fired the imagination and commanded the support of hon. Members on both sides of the House. I congratulate all those involved and I think that we have a piece of legislation worthy of its task, one which I am sure will be looked at enviously by other lottery operators all over the world, and will produce a United Kingdom national lottery which is the best in the world.

In particular, I think that the whole House should be grateful for the sterling efforts of the chairman of the Standing Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack), and to the hon. Members for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) and for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) who were called upon to step into the breach when the chairman was sadly taken ill early in the Committee's proceedings.

They formed an admirable triumvirate, supported by the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Coote), who was ready to assist but never called. We owe them our thanks. The same appreciation goes to those who in the chair in the House have presided over the Report stage with such benign authority that controversy melted away.

We also owe thanks to the Opposition spokesmen, the hon. Members for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) and for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett), for their wise contributions in Committee, via probing amendments and through the fruits of their wide experience in the arts, sport and the heritage. They were joined tonight by the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) and throughout by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton). They and all other members of the Committee were assisted by the excellent Clerk.

I also pay tribute to the skilful and tireless efforts of my hon. Friends the Minister of State and the Under-Secretary of State, whose diligence, constructiveness and good humour were greatly appreciated by the Committee. I also pay tribute to the massive work, done by our officials and advisers, which went on behind the scenes to sustain my hon. Friends.

1.30 am

I thank hon. Members who have helped to refine the Bill and speed it on its way. At the risk of being quoted when the lottery becomes operative, I echo the dodo in "Alice": all have won and all shall have prizes. Through all its stages the Bill has been open to sensible amendment and hon. Members who participated have felt that the Bill has been further improved. It is not a lottery of excess; it is a lottery of access.

Finally, we owe a debt of gratitude to Parliamentary Counsel for the superb elegance of the drafting of the Bill, which presented many difficult and unusual challenges that the Bill solves with creativity and aplomb. The Bill is a model of modern legislation, to be admired for the skill, grace and economy of its structure.

I could say a great deal about the substance of the Bill which would reinforce this categorical eulogy. I propose to resist that temptation and hope that my abstinence will cause others to join me in the good wishes that I have expressed for the Bill as it is poised to leave us now for another place. I commend in particular the work of the Whip in assisting our progress.

1.31 am

Mr. Pendry: I will not thank all those whom the Secretary of State thanked by name, but I echo much of what he said.

On Second Reading I said that it was consistent to be committed to the idea of a national lottery but to retain some deeply held objections to parts of it. We thought that the Bill was flawed in many fundamental respects and we urged the Committee to vote for our amendments and to reject the Bill as it stood.

We said that, unless the Bill emerged on Report in better shape, we reserved our position. Since the Committee stage, there has been some hard bargaining. Following persuasive arguments advanced by my hon. Friends and some free spirits on the Conservative Benches, Ministers did listen to the genuine concerns expressed. To their eternal credit, they promised to reflect on the many points that we had to put to them. That promise was kept.

Since then, there have been a number of meetings with Ministers and some important changes, to the benefit of the charitable sector, the pools industry, and the small lottery operators affiliated to the lotteries council. The House would, I am sure, want me to praise my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme), the president of the council, who has done so much to highlight the problems of the small lotteries and to bring about acceptable changes.

I had intended to make a number of points in the Government's favour, but I judge that Ministers do not want me to at this stage. I will therefore spare their blushes and content myself with pointing out that the Government have made some important concessions. The Bill is still not as perfect as we would like it to be. As it travels to another place I am sure that it will be further improved.

The pools companies, for instance, would like more freedom to advertise on television and radio. In Committee the Minister said that he would consider that, but nothing has been translated into legislative form. We hope that the Secretary of State will fight his corner with the Treasury, because the 12 per cent. tax yield to the Treasury is far too high. I hope that at the end of the first year of operation that percentage will go down and not up.

I trust that the Bill will be improved in the other place because we wish to see a better lottery. The Opposition have always said that decisions on the Bill should be taken by a free vote. People who have fundamental objections to a lottery of any kind should be allowed to express them in the Lobby. However, if there is a Division, we on this Bench, who fought hard to improve the Bill, will vote for Third Reading. We recognise the strength of feeling of those who feel that they still cannot support the Bill and, as they know, they are free to vote against it. I wish the Bill well as it goes to the other place. I hope that it leaves there an even better Bill than it is now.

1.35 am

Mr. Kilfoyle: I was taken by the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry), who said that we have a free vote. I like to think that Opposition Members are a little more democratic than Conservative Members.

I listened carefully to most of the debate, although not all of it, and four points convinced me that I should still vote against Third Reading. I have argued consistently against the Bill within my party, in Committee and on Second Reading. My opposition goes back about 16 months to the time of the Bill presented by the hon. Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence). What I have heard today does not demand me one vote from my view. Conservative Members will be pleased to know that I shall be brief.

The right hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Rumbold) intervened during the speech of the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Mackenzie) and there was an exchange about "this great heritage" of Georgian and Victorian England and about the achievements brought about by lotteries and charities at that time. I remind the right hon. Member for Mid-Sussex that after the Napoleonic wars there was a long and involved debate which in 1823 led to the abolition of the lotteries that existed at that time. He will know that the last lottery was held in 1826 because it was felt that lotteries were not to the interests of the people of this land. The Bill breaks a 300-year-old tradition of not seeking to expand and encourage gambling in this country.

My second point is of special interest to the people of Merseyside because of the Bill's effect on the pools, but it also affects the many groups that lobbied Opposition and Government Members during the progress of the Bill. It is the vexed question of additionality. The Minister of State, Home Office, the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Lloyd), was honest in his reply to the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland when he said that he could give no guarantee about what any future Secretary of State or Government would do.

Experience in countries that have introduced lotteries shows that the principle of additionality goes out the window. As I said in Committee, whatever party the appropriate Secretary of State or Chancellor of the Exchequer belongs to, as sure as night follows day the principle of additionality will disappear and the lottery proceeds will be used as substitute finances, to the detriment of many of the good causes that are supposed to benefit from the Bill.

The Under-Secretary of State for National Heritage was also honest enough during the debate on, I think, new clause 4 about the siting of the national lottery headquarters to say that a guarantee could not be given on jobs. I accept that to the extent to which the Minister intended it. Jobs are of paramount importance to people who represent constituencies such as mine and those of other Merseyside Members of Parliament. We have hammered the point throughout the debate, and the Minister knows that we are sincere. In my part of the world, 4,630 jobs are at risk. I shall not go over the arguments again, but he knows how committed we are to protecting those jobs, and the livelihoods of the people concerned.

It would be naive in the extreme to believe that the tax take will remain at 12 per cent. What has happened in other countries shows that it is an unrealistic tax regime. I noted carefully what the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, although this may not be the appropriate Bill on which to have a debate on the matter. However, it is germane to what the Bill is about. The Chancellor emphasised that the take would be 12 per cent. in the first year. If it came to the crunch and he has to decide between putting VAT on children's clothes and shoes, or raising the tax take out of the national lottery, there would be no contest. The tax regime on the lottery would go up, and that would have a detrimental effect on the charities and other good causes that expect to make money out of this ill-thought-out, ill-conceived proposal.

For those genuine reasons, which are shared by a number of Opposition Members, and notwithstanding the fine efforts of those on the Front Bench to amend the Bill —they have improved it in many ways—we, in conscience, have to vote against Third Reading.

1.41 am

Mr. Mackenzie: I must freely admit that no amendments to the Bill would have satisfied me that I carried a Third Reading. Although I acknowledge the work done in Committee, notably by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Wavertree (Mr. Alton), and by the Opposition spokesmen and many others to improve the Bill, and slightly to ameliorate the directly adverse effect that it will have on charitable organisations, it remains unacceptable.

This is the first time in modern times that the state has deliberately taken it upon itself to promote gambling. I regard gambling as a social evil, and one that will no doubt lead to an increase in crime, particularly among the young. It is not being a spoilsport to deplore that tendency. The Bill is a regressive measure that will hit hardest the least well-off. In a country where the gap between rich and poor is growing wider, the Government are doing more, deliberately, as the Bill so accentuates it, I find it morally repugnant, and I have no hesitation in saying so. I cannot, in the course of the Third Reading debate, confine myself to economics, although no doubt they are dire.

I deeply regret that Parliament has descended to the depths of the Bill. Many have clutched at it, knowing that the Treasury was to tighten the screw on expenditure on arts and the sports, a process that has already begun, also, under a Secretary of State for whom I had high hopes— [Laughter.] I believe that the Secretary of State has the interests of both sports and the arts very much at heart, but he did not devise the Bill. It was thrashed up by others.

The right hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Rumbold) was the first of several Arts Ministers who clutched at the rather vain hope that, for this declining nation, over which the Conservative Government have presided for 12 years, and this economy, which has failed to sustain the arts and sports in any other way, gambling would be the way out. The concept was promoted by a private Member's Bill, and in moving his own amendments tonight, the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence), to a very belated intervention, found occasion to draw attention to some of the dangers—[Laughter.] We must hear some of the blame when the consequences of the Bill are felt by charities.

The principle was supported by the right hon. Member for Wells Valley as some kind of bread and circuses to be thrown before the electorate at the general election.

Mr. Cryer: He was the author of the poll tax as well.

Mr. Mackenzie: And now he has said, without irony, "Those who embraced his policies may feel that they will follow a similar route."

This has been a regrettable episode. Many people who have clutched at the hope of salvation for the arts will live to rue the day, as they see the Treasury using the lottery as an excuse for cutting expenditure raised by taxation on the arts and sport. I shall have no hesitation in voting against the Bill.

1.47 am

Mr. George Howarth: As the Bill was extensively debated on Second Reading, in Committee, and on Report—enough, I shall not detain the House long. I have two main points—one is a form of concession, and the other is an objection to the Bill receiving a Third Reading.

As a result of amendments made in Committee and others altogether, if not passed, tonight, the Bill is a better one than it was, and to that extent I congratulate those of my hon. Friends involved on the success of their arguments, and the Government on having the generosity of spirit to accept them.

However, a number of serious questions have not been answered, and for that reason I find it impossible to vote in favour of a Third Reading.

The hon. Member for Carlisle and Sutherland (Mr. Mackenzie) made a serious point—which was greeted with some hilarity by Conservative Members for some reason that escapes me—about genuine moral objections to state-sponsored gambling. Whatever gloss the Government put on the lottery, there are many well-considered arguments against state-sponsored gambling and a form of taxation—for it is that—that is regressive.

I and many of my hon. Friends are old-fashioned enough to think that the whole point of taxation is to redistribute wealth from one section of the community to another. The Bill will take from certain artistic and school events that are less well-off and give to the better-off. In due course, that inevitable consequence will be proved by the way in which the lottery, and the events that it sponsors, work out.

As the Government are unlikely to accept the arguments, I will make other points concerning my constituency on Merseyside. At the beginning, I and many of my hon. Friends took the view that any development that would mean more job losses for a region already ravaged by recession and unemployment was unacceptable. It was announced—this figure has not been disproved by any empirical evidence produced by Ministers or Conservative Members—that job losses across the country were likely to number 1,400 to 4,400 with 4,400 of them on Merseyside. Some of the amendments to the Bill—the wording, in some cases, of the phasing Bill—mean that job losses are likely to amount now to only 1,200 to 1,800. Yet those job losses are unacceptable to me and my hon. Friends.

For those new reasons—the moral objections, which still have not been answered, and the job losses that will inevitably result from the passing of the Bill as to the extent feeds—I have no hesitation whatsoever in recommending my hon. Friends and any Conservative Members who feel so inclined to vote against Third Reading.

1.52 am

Mr. Allen: Before we proceed to a Division, I intend to put on record my objections to Third Reading. At every other stage I have voted against the Bill, for the reasons that the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) and my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle and Sutherland (Mr. Mackenzie) have already given. Any hon. Member who expresses grave reservations will have no choice but to consider these reasons before deciding how to vote on Third Reading. There are serious job implications. The hon. and learned Member for Barrow (Mr. I. Lawrence) leaves that when he introduced his private Member's Bill, many of us put forward similar arguments. They still remain.

I am particularly grateful to the Home Office Minister, the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Lloyd), who has been present throughout most of the proceedings on the Bill, for trying to meet many of the reasons I—sometimes I am also grateful to the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Ancram) and others from the Department of National Heritage, who recognise that there are implications for youth workers. Those like me, there remains concern within the industry that even the Bill becomes an Act of Parliament, Centres in London, Yorkshire in Liverpool and part of the Commonwealth operations will have to make people redundant. That will mean grave hardship in areas where there is already high unemployment.

For the past 15 years I have represented many people—first as a councillor and then as a Member of Parliament for the past 10 years—who are employed by Littlewoods in Edge Lane, an area only area of Liverpool. I am familiar with many of the families who rely upon the wages that they receive from that work for their livelihood. [Interruption.]

Although it is true that some of those jobs will undoubtedly disappear—the point which I think the hon. and learned Member for Barrow is making from a different position—because of the technology that is being introduced, I think he will be the first to agree that the number of jobs that will be involved in the operation of the approved lottery, whenever its headquarters is situated, will be very, compared with the high level of labour-intensive work that is available through the football pools or pubs.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence indicated dissent.

Mr. Allen: We should not gamble with people's jobs and livelihoods, particularly in a time of very high unemployment.

Mr. Robert N. Fleming (Liverpool, Wavertree): I am pleased to hear what the hon. Gentleman says and I support him entirely. Does he also agree that the majority of the workers who will be affected are women and that in many cases those women are the sole earner in the family, on account of the high level of male unemployment on Merseyside? Those families depend upon the women going out to work; many of them are lone parents.

Mr. Alton: Indeed. I specifically made that point earlier today in the debate on where the national lottery headquarters should be situated. If any area can prove —as I believe Merseyside will be able to prove—that it has lost jobs as a direct consequence of the introduction of the national lottery, we should ensure that its national headquarters is situated in that area, so that some of the women to whom the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) referred will have the possibility of finding employment there.

My second objection is the moral argument about regressive taxation. Is it right that people, who inevitably come from the poorest sections of society, should be encouraged to gamble through the state lottery and thereby subsidise to the greatest extent many of our great national institutions? There is nothing wrong with the Royal Opera House and Covent Garden, but why should people who are the least likely to use those facilities and who come from the poorest sections of society be the ones who most disproportionately will have to pay for those facilities?

Can it be right for the House actively to encourage more state-inspired gambling? More per head is spent on gambling in this country—about £4·50—than in any other country in Europe. Do we want to encourage more gambling and more of a chance society, in which people are encouraged to think that the only way out of poverty and the only way to succeed is by wagering a stake? Surely there are better ways of helping to succeed.

I conclude by recalling the words of William Wilberforce to his friend Henry Thornton in the aftermath of the abolition of slavery. He turned to Henry Thornton and asked, "What shall we abolish next?" The reply was, "The national lottery, I think." In those days, the period to which the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle) referred, the national lottery was so full of corruption, abuses and the fear of syndicates, which has also been expressed today, that there was a national crusade to abolish it. I hope that there will not have to be a national crusade to undo what we are doing today.

Mr. Renton: I understand the concerns that the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) has expressed so well. I shall be brief because it is late, but I must say that I think that he and the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) are wrong. The national lottery will be a great step forward and will do much for good causes in this country.

During my time as Minister for the Arts, I used all my influence to get the notion approved. I was delighted that it was in our election manifesto, and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office, the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Lloyd), and the Under-Secretary of State at the Department of National Heritage on the way that they have argued for the concept today.

There were two good reasons why I was convinced about the idea. The first was that, when talking to other Ministers for the Arts—they are usually called Ministers of Culture in other parts of Europe—I was always struck by their telling me that they had been able to use the proceeds of their national lotteries so successfully. I remember Maire Geoghegan-Quinn in Dublin telling me of the refurbishment and restoration of the Irish national gallery, which was the result of the national lottery. I asked Mrs. Psarouda-Benaki, the Greek Minister of Culture, how she was doing for money. That was the usual question between Ministers for the Arts or for Culture. She said that she was saved by the national lottery.

Secondly, although my predecessor, Sir Richard Luce, and I were successful in getting increased grants from the Treasury for the current expenses of arts organisations, it was clear that there was not sufficient money available to build great buildings or for restoration and refurbishment. It was obvious to me that the large sums needed would come only from a national lottery. I believe that the national lottery will be a great success and that the concerns expressed are not valid.

I hope that when Oflot comes into being, and when the organisation that is to run the lottery has been chosen, they will concentrate on using small shops such as tobacconists' shops and sub-post offices as retail outlets. If anyone visits Wexford in Ireland, they will find three small shops in the high street, all displaying the lotto sign. That brings new customers into corner shops, and we all want to encourage the small shop rather than the supermarket. The lottery could be helpful in that respect.

I was disappointed by the gloomy view that the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) took of the millennium fund. It is a most exciting and imaginative project, which will contribute to the construction of great buildings by which the next generation will remember us.

After the great exhibition, spare money was used to buy the land in south Kensington on which now stand the Victoria and Albert museum, the natural history museum and the science museum.

Over the next six or seven years we can do something comparable, and I believe that it will be for that that the next generation will remember us. We should all be proud to be associated with the project, and I believe that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will carry it forward with great vigour and determination.

2 am

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Although I respect the hon. Members who have taken a principled stand about the idea of the state organising gambling, I have to say that I do not care a stuff for that argument. I believe that in the country as a whole most people will fail to draw any significant distinction between gambling run privately and gambling run by the state. People may be able to make the case that they oppose all gambling, but it is a subsidiary matter whether the state or private organisations run it. Therefore, I have no wish to make more of that issue.

First, I thank the Secretary of State and his junior Minister for the changes that they have made to the Bill. I understand that the pools lobby is now much more satisfied with it. If the pools lobby consisted of Vernons alone I should be content with its response, for I have respected for some time Vernons' stance on the whole issue. However, Littlewoods' attitude over the long term has left everything to be desired in terms of how the company should have responded so as to shape the debate that culminates tonight.

I shall spend two minutes on the subject of jobs. We have had two good monthly returns for the unemployment figures, but two good months do not make an economic boom. Even if they did, we know from the past four or so booms that at the high point of each boom there are more people unemployed than there were at the equivalent stage of the previous cycle. Therefore, the issue of jobs is of immense importance.

Like many Merseyside Members, I represent a constituency in which one in four people are unemployed. Generally there are two reactions to unemployment in my constituency. One is for people to drive themselves demented as they search for that elusive job, and for their loved ones to watch them become demented and to go mad with them, believing that round the next corner, on the next card that they read in the jobcentre or in the next newspaper advert that they read, there will be the sign of a job, and they will be successful.

The other response, which I find even more alarming, and which is becoming more common, is that the only way in which people can survive with that level of unemployment is to wipe the idea of paid work out of their lives. That is the only way to organise and to keep sane. That is an extremely worrying long-term trend for the House to have to debate.

It is therefore immensely serious that at a time of near record post-war unemployment we are debating a Bill that will deny some of my constituents work. Some of those people will be bringing the only wage packet into their households and without those jobs they will join either the group of demented constituents who search vainly for work, or that growing group that can survive only by pretending that working is not an important part of our activities as responsible adults.

I therefore make a plea to the House. While we have that level of unemployment and while that curse is laid on so many of our constituents, although in other circumstances a national lottery would be welcome, and there can be no real worry about the fact that the state rather than private individuals is organising it, the effect on unemployment is a sticking point, so I hope that the House will refuse the Bill a Third Reading.

2.3 am

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): The House will be aware that I have a strong moral conviction concerning the subject matter of the Bill; I have expressed it in the House before. I have been in pastoral work for 46 years, and the description by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) of the frustration of the unemployed is very real to me. It is far more real to me that the unemployed, in that state of frustration, turn to gambling and think that by the cast of the dice they will remedy their position. It is deplorable that the Government and Parliament now take it on themselves to lead the nation in the gambling menace. It is a menace to society. It is sad that the only way in which the Government can preserve our heritage is by inviting people to gamble. That is not the way to preserve the heritage.

I sympathise with hon. Members whose constituencies have a high percentage of unemployment, as we have in Northern Ireland. The jobs lost will not be found easily, as all hon. Members know. That is bound to cause concern to anyone who has a heart and who feels for the unemployed. Nothing devastates a family more than unemployment, and nothing devastates the moral life of people more than unemployment. Despite all the hilarity in parts of our debate, we are not going down a road that will help the nation. That is my personal conviction, so I must say that.

2.5 am

Mr. Cryer: There are a number of objections to the Bill. Although there have been some improvements, they will not provide the safeguards needed by the small lotteries. Ironically, the legislation that allowed small lotteries was introduced by Graham Page, the former Member for Crosby. I do not suppose that he envisaged that the idea would be taken up and converted into a national scheme by a future Conservative Government.

The Bill is intrusive and it will affect many reasonably well-established lotteries which are used for a variety of purposes. I received representations from Bradford Northern rugby league football club, which plays at Odsal stadium in my constituency. Its concerns are not satisfied. The national lottery will have an adverse affect.

The lottery will not be terribly efficient. Barely 25 per cent. of the revenue will got to the so-called "good causes". Some 50 per cent. will go on prizes, 12 per cent. will go on tax because the Government will use the revenue from the lottery for their own purposes, and 13 per cent. or more will go on administration. That leaves barely 25 per cent. —minority—of the total revenue to go to the good causes. The lottery is not a very effective way in which to raise money.

Some 20 per cent. will go on the dotty scheme on the millennium which will not have any clear benefit to the nation except that in the year 2000 there will be some junketing which is not clearly defined. A quango will set up the scheme and spend the money on it. There are better uses for the money. The reservation that I and many of my hon. Friends have is that the revenue will not supplement Government expenditure, but will supplant it. It will be used as a source of revenue to pay for things that could and should come from general taxation. That is the real fear.

There is also good and genuine tradition—Methodist, puritanical or whatever—among Labour Members. We have gambling because footbal pools are a form of gambling. That far and no further should we go. We should not expand it into a national lottery running alongside the football pools which would expand a society that is concerned with consumerism, with status and with a way out through the easy pickings of prizes in a national lottery. They are not easy pickings. Everybody contributes to the prizes. The vast majority will be losers. A tiny proportion will be winners, and the rest will be left with dashed hopes, illusions and the cynicism of a decrepit and corrupt society. Goods and services are out of reach for the vast majority because they have low incomes or no jobs in a society that has an economy that cannot provide for them.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Close the stock exchange.

Mr. Cryer: My hon. Friend talks about the stock exchange. That represents another form of gambling to which I am opposed. I do not see why we should expand gambling to consume the whole nation, with the posh gamblers in the City of London and the ordinary gamblers consumed in the pursuit of false hope. It is not by gambling but by organising together to secure a political victory and to elect a Government with the right priorities that we shall change and improve society. For those reasons, I shall vote against Third Reading.

2.10 am

Mr. Davidson: I oppose the Bill for many of the reasons that have already been given. I disagree with the assertion that it makes no difference whatever if gambling is organised by the state or by private individuals. If the state is seen not only to be condoning gambling by allowing it but actually to be promoting it, a different message is conveyed about the type of society that we want to see.

Ultimately, the money from the national lottery will be used not in addition to but instead of money spent by local authorities or the state. That money will be raised from those who can afford it least to be spent on those who can afford it most. I can imagine unemployed people living in damp houses in my constituency paying money in desperation towards a national lottery in an attempt to escape from their predicament, only to see their money spent on pleasures that are predominantly enjoyed by those who are much better off than they are.

The Bill is a redistributive measure: it will redistribute wealth away from those who have least and in the direction of those who have most. That is why I do not believe that it is morally just or morally sustainable, and I do not propose to vote for it.

I recognise that a great deal of work has been done by those on both Front Benches to make this a less bad Bill than it was, and I pay tribute to them for that work, but I still believe that charitable giving will suffer as a result of the lottery.

The Government have assured us that that will not happen. What do they propose to do if, several months or a year down the road, it is clearly shown that charities are suffering as a result of the introduction of the national lottery, and that local voluntary effort is being diminished as a result of money being bled away from that sector and into the lottery, which will be offering larger prizes? Will they be prepared to accept that something needs to be done to redress the balance?

What will the Government do if it becomes clear that the national lottery cash is being used as substitute for money from elsewhere rather than being additional to it? No doubt the assurances that we have heard have been given in good faith, but it would be much more reassuring to us to have a clear commitment from the Government that they would be prepared to redress any imbalance that developed.

I am worried that the lottery will result in the exploitation of misery by those who wish to reduce taxation and are looking for ways of funding what should be public works. The arts and sports lobbies are clutching at the national lottery in desperation because they see no other source of public revenue. In my view, that is the explanation for their enthusiasm.

On the question of jobs, I echo the anxieties and fears expressed by many of my hon. Friends. As I said earlier, in many families in my constituency, the woman working for Littlewoods pools is the sole breadwinner and she will have no alternative opportunity for employment if she loses her job. That has not been adequately dealt with in the proposals before us. For all those reasons—moral as well as economic—I find myself with no alternative but to oppose the Bill.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

Youth Training (Norwich)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

2.24 am

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): The timing and date of an Adjournment debate is certainly a lottery, but even at this early hour of 25 minutes past two in the morning, I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the subject of youth training in Norwich, to refer to the difficulties that must be faced, and to make positive suggestions about how to tackle them.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Employment for being present on the Front Bench at this late hour. I look forward to his response to the debate tonight. I also welcome my hon. Friends the Members for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Carttiss) and for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown). I am grateful to them for their support. In my last Adjournment debate I forgot to welcome the Whip. I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot) is here to listen to the debate.

It is clear that there are problems in youth training. There certainly have been problems in Norwich, although considerable strides have been made in recent years. I wish to place on record my thanks to Sarah Prettejohn of the university of East Anglia for the research that she has done, on which I was able to draw in preparation for the debate. I am also grateful to many trainees, firms and other organisations in Norwich who have provided a wealth of information which has been helpful for the debate.

I believe that too little is known locally and nationally about the positive work of the Department of Employment, the training and enterprise councils and the careers service in tackling youth employment and meeting young people's training needs. Too little value is still placed on technical and vocational training. Employers and young people often have limited understanding of the importance and relevance of national vocational qualifications. You will have noted, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I spelt that out in full. I have become fed up during my 10 years as a Member of Parliament of everything being referred to in acronyms such as NVQ. It is right that we should spell out what we mean: national vocational qualification. It is important that we press for a better understanding of such qualifications.

Some of our young people are difficult to motivate, partly because of the failure of many of our schools to produce completely literate and numerate youngsters and partly because the training that they are offered is not of high quality. Employers cannot expect to attract and retain high-quality staff unless they contribute more. Higher quality training costs money. Our record in training is still not comparable to that of many other advanced countries. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will address those issues in his reply.

A major publicity drive to raise public awareness of our training programmes and vocational qualifications should be mounted as a matter of urgency or at least as soon as practicably possible. I hope that my hon. Friend will respond to that point. Such a publicity drive would help to change attitudes and make sure that opportunities were not missed.

[Mr. Patrick Thompson]

I should like to be assured by my hon. Friend the Minister that closer links will be forged with the careers service and schools and that earlier and better advice will be given to children well before they reach school-leaving age. The time for education-business compacts has arrived. As a member of the Education Select Committee before the last general election, I visited Germany. It was clear that there was a stronger link than in Britain between industry and the schools. We have a long way to go.

If, as is likely, some schools in Norwich opt for grant-maintained status, links between education and business can be further encouraged. The Confederation of British Industry has recently suggested that the best way of reducing the false distinction between academic and vocational qualifications would be to integrate them within one overall system. I am not sure that that is the right approach. It is important that national vocational qualifications and vocational training generally should have better recognition.

It is not clear whether everyone should gain national vocational qualifications, as some of the training and enterprise councils appear to believe. It is important that quality in training should not be sacrificed in the search for universal qualifications. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister would agree that we must secure the higher quality training, with greater employer commitment, which will enable us to compete effectively with our foreign rivals in the decades ahead.

Almost 10 years ago, in my maiden speech in the House, I praised the Government's youth training initiatives. I have kept my interest in the youth training scheme and in matters concerned with education and training ever since. I have visited many training providers in Norwich. Even this week, I had discussions with the Norfolk and Waveney training and enterprise council. At one time I was also involved with Norwich engineering project, which was founded to increase young people's interest in engineering and related skills in my constituency.

The research that Sarah Prettejohn and I have conducted in the past weeks in Norwich has shown up clearly some of the problems under which the present system operates. In recent months, the Norfolk and Waveney training and enterprise council has been subject to some criticism and a lack of co-ordination with the careers service has been evident.

Although training generally has held up during the recession, the nature and structure of the local economy, which has few large national companies based in the city, has imposed constraints on the opportunities available. The recent decision by Norwich Union to stop taking on school leavers had an immediate impact throughout the area. Matching potential trainees to suitable places became more difficult if youngsters were expected to travel long distances across, or out of, the city.

Employers have, quite naturally, been uncertain about their ability to offer places to young people under the youth training programme because of its two-year life span. If a company is making its adult employees redundant and cannot judge what its markets will be like in three months' time, its reluctance to take on 16 or 17-year-olds is understandable. It has been all too easy to cut training budgets and to fail to offer financial incentives and wider differentials to acquire training qualifications. All that has been left has been seen by youngsters as training in quantity rather than in quality for the future.

It has been said, too, that there has been a problem with the attitude of a small number of youngsters seeking training. One Norwich company told us that its trainees left a lot to be desired. It said that those young people did not understand the need to be at work on time and lacked the motivation to get the most out of their training. The company regarded that as the fault of the schools, which had tolerated those attitudes and downgraded vocational skills. I am sorry to say that there is more than a degree of truth in those charges.

It is not entirely clear how many young people have been training locally, which is due to a difference in the criteria used by the careers service and the Norfolk and Waveney training and enterprise council. The careers service has considered that its figures might be an underestimate while the training and enterprise council thought that they were probably an overestimate and included those who had gone back to school or college. In the training and enterprise council's view, those who did go back for an extra year found it more difficult to get training places once they left school.

An extremely important development has been the creation by the Norfolk and Waveney training and enterprise council of foundation training specifically designed to help youngsters who had experienced problems in finding a training place. By offering preparatory counselling on suitable careers, by involving youngsters directly in training to improve motivation, social and interview skills and by helping them to appreciate the importance of team work, that programme is offering those youngsters the chance to achieve their objectives rather than to fall and to fail at the first hurdle. Training providers will be able to recruit motivated people who want to gain national vocational qualifications and pursue a career with realistic prospects.

We have found that the results of the training and enterprise council's efforts are already beginning to show through. Eight month's ago, there were 1,408 youngsters eligible for youth training, of whom 353 had waited for a start date for more than eight weeks. This month, there were 692 eligible youngsters, with only 11 who had waited more than eight weeks; some of them had either just moved into the area or were long-term sick. I suspect that the recent visit of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment to the training and enterprise council has had a salutary effect to improve the situation. I welcome the recent improvement, and I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to confirm the figures that I have quoted.

Every young person seeking youth training at the beginning of January has now been offered a place, and everyone accepting the offer has actually started on his or her course or placement with an employer. Overall, some 4,200 young men and women are undertaking training under the Norfolk and Waveney training and enterprise council's auspices. I also understand that the careers service and the training and enterprise council are now working more closely together to tackle the employment and training needs of young people, and will go on doing so.

So progress is being made in Norwich. It must be consolidated, locally and nationally. As the economy recovers, employers, particularly in the manufacturing and engineering sectors, will need encouragement to take on trainees and to meet the additional costs of training in their skills. This point has been discussed constructively between representatives of the Engineering Employers Federation and the training and enterprise council. More apprentices will be sponsored this year in spite of a reduced employers' contribution. Better links with teachers are being built. Similarly, a major publicity drive is under way to attract young people into engineering, as the engineering stand at the recent Job Scene East careers exhibition at the Norwich sports village showed.

I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that the recovery in the economy will be abortive if we suffer a skills shortage. I can recall some years ago being called to meetings by employers in Norwich because they were desperately worried about a skills shortage. We have heard less of that recently as the economy has gone through a more difficult period, but I suspect that it will not be long before we start hearing about a skills shortage again. That is why I am emphasising the point now.

I am particularly grateful to have had this opportunity to raise the subject of youth training in Norwich. It is a matter of great importance to young people in Norwich and throughout the country, including young people in the constituencies of my hon. Friends who have supported me tonight, the hon. Members for Great Yarmouth and for Cirencester and Tewkesbury. We must get the right sort of training for our young people who are leaving education and entering the world of work for the first time. It is in their interests and in ours that they acquire skills that will be useful for the rest of their lives.

I believe that these objectives are accepted inside and outside the House, even if there are differing views on how to achieve them. I believe, therefore, that a campaign to stimulate interest in training and enthusiasm for vacational qualifications will have widespread support, and I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary and their colleagues will be able to take a lead in this. I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to respond positively to the points that I have discovered in my research on youth training in Norwich and to the suggestions that I have made in opening this debate.

2.37 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Patrick McLoughlin): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson) for raising this important topic tonight. I know how strongly he feels about the need to ensure that every young person has the opportunity to enter a quality youth training place. I share his concern. I particularly pay tribute to the way in which he has championed and fought for the rights of young people in his constituency. Let me, therefore, first of all make it clear just how important youth training is to the Government.

Our record on providing training for young people shows what progress we have made in the past 10 years. There were only 7,000 young people in Great Britain on training programmes under the last Labour Government in 1979. The numbers now entering youth training and training credits exceed 200,000 each year. This is an outstanding performance at a time when our economy has been under considerable pressure.

Before this Government came to power there was no such thing as today's youth training. Very few people then understood how important it was to provide well-structured routes for all young people, helping them with the transition between schooldays and working life. Thanks to this Government, the picture is now vastly different.

My hon. Friend has stressed both the need to raise the profile and status of vocational qualifications and employers' commitment to training. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made clear her intention to have a promotional drive to underline the importance of employers meeting the Investors in People standard and the importance of national vocational qualifications for business and individuals alike. My hon. Friend's point about the need to promote NVQs more vigorously is not lost on the Secretary of State.

The Department has been holding detailed consultations with TECs, industrial training organisations, the National Council for Vocational Qualifications and others on how best to deliver such a campaign. My right hon. Friend will be making an announcement shortly.

We have made available £844 million this year to fund youth training. This is despite the continued reduction in the number of young people joining the labour market immediately after school leaving age—partly because more stay on and partly due to the falling number nationally in the age group. I repeat, as I have so often in the past, that the Government remain fully committed to the youth training guarantee and that no training and enterprise council will be prevented by lack of resources from meeting it.

Through the training and enterprise councils, we have given leadership in delivering training programmes to key players in the local business community. This approach has tapped in to the commitment and ideas that people on the spot have to offer and means that local programmes are tailored to the needs of the local community and overseen by business-led bodies: the TEC boards. To allow TEC boards to exercise their business acumen, we make it their responsibility to contract with local providers to secure the training which the Gvoernment fund.

On the Government side, the contracts are managed by the Employment Department's regional offices. It is the responsibility of the regional office to liaise with the TEC, to monitor performance and try to resolve any emerging local difficulties. This, of course, includes any difficulty the TEC may have in meeting the YT guarantee in a particular area.

TECs work with the careers service locally to ensure that the contracted provision fits the needs of all school leavers wanting to go into youth training, and that no young person misses out on the opportunities available.

My hon. Friend highlighted the importance of links between the careers service and schools. I am pleased to say that the Employment Department has undertaken a number of initiatives in this area, such as careers libraries to enhance the quality of careers information available in schools; the teacher placement scheme; and education-business partnerships. These are designed to bring schools, TECs and careers services closer together, improve the links between schools and the world of work, and put young people's career choices on a much firmer basis.

In addition, as my hon. Friend will be aware, the Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Bill, currently in another place, proposes major changes for the careers service. It will be the duty of the Secretaries of State for Employment, for Wales and for Scotland to ensure that careers advice is provided to the statutory client group who are at or have recently left schools and colleges. This is a fundamental change which reflects the importance that the Government attach to good careers guidance.

I would now like to turn to my hon. Friend's constituency. Youth training in Norwich is delivered under contract with Norfolk and Waveney TEC, which also serves the Secretary of State's constituency. It contracts with 12 providers making youth training places available to young people in Norwich. These include organisations such as Norfolk county council, the training workshop and Broadland district council.

I would like to put on record some of the major achievements of Norfolk and Waveney TEC in helping young people. Since its creation in November 1990, many young people have benefited from the youth training courses that it has run. We must not forget that at a time when, nationally, number, in this age group are in marked decline, East Anglia is unusual in that the reduction there is much smaller than in other regions. The numbers of entrants into the TEC's youth training courses in 1991-92 was 3,776; in 1992-93 it was 3,636. These figures put into better context some of the numbers that critics have bandied about—of young people without suitable offers of a youth training place.

Much concern has been expressed about the YT guarantee. As I have explained, we regard this as of crucial importance, and all TECs, working with careers services, are in no doubt about the priority that the Government attach to it. That said, if there are continuing difficulties in Norwich, they need to be addressed by the processes that I have outlined.

We have said throughout that no TEC would be prevented by lack of resources from implementing the guarantee. We have agreed a budget with Norfolk and Waveney TEC, earmarked for youth training, of more than £10 million for 1993-94. These negotiations have only just been completed, and while we have been negotiating with the TEC, it has been negotiating with its many providers. Inevitably, while negotiations are in train and different positions are being argued, there will be temptations to overdramatise how harshly a new pricing framework will bear on one or other of the parties to the negotiations.

I accept that Norfolk has faced far greater difficulties this year than previously in dealing with the demand for youth training. There has been local media comment on the number of young people still seeking places and a gathering recognition that something more is needed to be done. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was able to discuss the issues with Mr. John Lineker, the TEC chairman, and his chief executive, Mr. John Wooddissee, on 25 January.

Following this, the TEC, in discussion with senior officials from my Department, was able to formulate an action plan which committed the TEC to ensuring that all eligible young people were offered a place and started training by early March. As a direct result, the number of young people awaiting the offer of a suitable YT place for more than eight weeks has plummeted. In the TEC's area, in November, 375 young people, on the careers service count, had been waiting for over eight weeks. I am happy to say that the comparative figure for the April count is only 31. Within the Norwich careers service area, the equivalent figures show a fall from 82 to just four.

I emphasise the success of youth training. Some 3·5 million young people have been trained since its predecessor, the youth training scheme, was introduced in 1983. There are currently some 250,000 in training, including youth credits, in Great Britain: 76 per cent. of those who complete their planned training go into jobs or further training or education; and 53 per cent. of those who complete their planned training gain a qualification. All young people under 18 who are not in full-time education or employment are guaranteed the offer of a suitable training place.

That is the picture for the whole of Great Britain. Youth training is just as important for Norwich as it is for the country as a whole. Youth training is a success story built on the success of YTS, but it is more flexible and with a stronger focus on qualifications. The normal minimum attainment level built into training plans is NVQ level 2. Youth training is now the accepted route into work in many occupational areas, a part of the infrastructure of working life.

Not least, youth training, alongside the national curriculum and other new education innovations introduced by the Government, is one of the key routes by which we will raise standards and meet the national education and training targets.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the particular issues that concern him about Norfolk and Waveney TEC's approach to securing the right provision in Norwich. I have explained how our contractual relationship works and the onus that my Department places on TECs to ensure delivery.

We shall continue to monitor the situation very closely to ensure that the TEC continues to address the need to provide for Norwich's young people quality training opportunities and that it discharges its responsibilities for meeting the YT guarantee. In like fashion, the Department will continue to press upon the careers service the need to work co-operatively with the TEC to diagnose the needs of the city's young people in good time to allow the right provision to be brought on stream, and after that to ensure that each young person leaving school in Norwich is helped to find the right opportunity.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising this important issue, which has given me the opportunity to place on record the great importance that the Government attach to the youth training guarantee. The debate has also enabled me to underline our message to training and enterprise councils throughout the country and not just in Norfolk and Waveney. It is vital for the youth training guarantee to be met.

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Slaughterhouses

1. Mr. Soley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received on the application of rules relating to slaughterhouses.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Nicholas Soames): My right hon. Friend and I have considered carefully the representations that we have received on the regulations. We have taken particular care to implement the EC requirements in a way that achieves the necessary improvements in hygiene standards without imposing unnecessary burdens on the industry.

Mr. Soley: The Minister will know from that answer that a number of European countries give subsidies to the veterinary services. When will we either give an equal subsidy or ensure that there is a level playing field so that we do not operate at a disadvantage?

Mr. Soames: The hon. Gentleman should understand that we are working hard to achieve a level playing field. We have always adopted this method of charging in the United Kingdom. What is a perfectly true and fair point is that the charges were too high. We have taken considerable steps and made a great effort to get those charges down, and we are happy that they are moving in the right direction.

Mr. Rathbone: What success has my hon. Friend had in making more of an equal qualification requirement among those veterinary surgeons who are duty bound to do their business in abattoirs but who are better trained and therefore much more expensive than their European counterparts?

Mr. Soames: My hon. Friend, unusually, is incorrect in his supposition. Continental European vets are trained to exactly the same standard as British vets. The difference in the system is that in continental Europe ante-mortem inspection and the use of vets for meat hygiene work has always been the norm while in the United Kingdom it is a relatively new involvement and is therefore taking some time to settle down. It should be emphasised to the House that all vets across Europe must achieve the same qualifications, and it takes exactly the same length of time to qualify.

Mr. Jim Marshall: Does the Minister recall that I wrote to him recently on behalf of W and J Parker Ltd., a slaughterhouse company in Leicester, which faced a potential investment of £9 million to £10 million to comply with the new European Community regulations? As a consequence of that investment, the company closed its slaughterhouse in Leicester with the loss of 300 jobs. It subsequently bought a minority holding in a company in Buckinghamshire, but the jobs in Leicester were still lost. Does he accept that it would be grossly unfair to that company and to the 300 people who lost their jobs in Leicester—including my son—if the regulations were weakened for smaller slaughterhouses throughout the United Kingdom?

Mr. Soames: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point and I am distressed and sorry about the news of the job losses in Leicester. He is correct that we have tried, through the regulations, to achieve a high standard of uniform meat hygiene throughout the country. While we wish to be as sympathetic as we can, we feel that the great importance of the regulations is that they will take us from a dual standard to a single standard, and we shall not resile from that.

Common Agricultural Policy (Fraud)

2. Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures are being taken to tackle fraud in the common agricultural policy.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): Under the United Kingdom presidency, the integrated administration and control system was agreed and will be applied in all member states. It is specifically designed to provide effective control of payments flowing from CAP reforms. We make that clear in the accompanying literature both here and elsewhere.

Mr. Whittingdale: While I fully support my right hon. Friend's commitment to eradicate CAP fraud and I welcome the contribution that the new integrated administration and control system will make to that, can my right hon. Friend assure me that his Ministry will adopt an understanding and flexible attitude to farmers who are not fraudsters but may have made genuine innocent mistakes in completing their forms?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. On some matters there are Communitywide rules on how we apply the forms. An example is the date on which the forms have to be returned. If the form is a couple of days late, there is a particular penalty. The rules are purposely Europewide to make sure that everyone obeys the rules. However, wherever there is flexibility, we shall use it. I appeal to farmers to tell us in advance if they find that they have made some mistake. Then we shall know that they are not trying to defraud.

Rev. Martin Smyth: What lessons have been learnt by the various EC countries with land frontiers which could be useful in dealing with the fraud that has taken place across our land frontiers with the Republic of Ireland?

Mr. Gummer: We have learnt several lessons. One of the most important is that we should not start fraud off by paying money to which people are not entitled. Therefore, both the IACS forms and the arrangements for passports and ear-tagging for animals that receive a premium are a basic necessity if we are to save taxpayers' money and ensure that the money goes to the right people.

Mrs. Browning: Has my right hon. Friend had a chance to examine the comparable forms which farmers in other EC member countries have to fill in? Will he guarantee to take a watching brief to ensure that the forms are applied universally throughout the Community?

Mr. Gummer: I have certainly looked at the forms used by our partners. In almost every case, they have been less clear and less well laid out than ours. Only the Danes have a shorter form, but that is because they have had much of the material on computer for some time. Our accompanying literature is also much clearer. That is because we bothered to spend time to make sure that farmers made the fewest possible mistakes. I will ensure that the forms are properly filled in other countries.

Dr. Strang: Does the Minister accept that fraud involving the common agricultural policy now costs billions of pounds a year? Does he acknowledge that although the IACS forms, if applied effectively throughout the EC, will help to tackle fraud in respect of payments to farmers, they will not deal with the large part of the fraud relating to export refunds? Is it true that some member Governments are concealing information on such fraudulent transactions? Is it not time that the British Government took a decisive stand on the issue and made it clear that they will not agree to any changes in the CAP until fraud is effectively tackled?

Mr. Gummer: The British Government's decisive stand has led to a much more fraud-proof operation than we had before. I am grateful for such support as I have received from the Labour party on the issue—at least we all agree that we do not want fraud. The hon. Gentleman somewhat overstates the amount of fraud, but we agree that there is too much—any amount of fraud is too much and we must stop it. We must now proceed to ensure that the reduced amount of export support which comes from the GATT round will give us the opportunity to carry the much more stringent measures into every aspect of the CAP.

British Wine

3. Mr. Amess: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to promote sales of British-produced wine to the EC.

Mr. Soames: The Government promote exports of English and Welsh wine vigorously. The export services of Food from Britain are also readily available to growers.

Mr. Amess: Has my hon. Friend had an opportunity to consider the merits of the Basildon grape, which is grown by many of my constituents? Will he care to reflect that as Basildon leads the economic recovery of our nation, so perhaps Basildon is well placed to lead the drive of British producers of wine further into EC markets?

Mr. Soames: My hon. Friend is perfectly right. Essex wines, like Essex women, are the adornment of the crown of British life—[Interruption.]—as is my hon. Friend. Just as Basildon is the economic capital and leader of Britain, I have always been told that it drinks for Britain. We will do our very best to promote the Essex grape. I can assure my hon. Friend that my right hon. Friend the Minister served Essex wine to the Council of Ministers at an informal meeting and it was much appreciated. We will do all that we can to promote British wine.

Lobsters

5. Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress he has made with amending the minimum landing size of lobster in the EC.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Curry): The Undersized Lobsters

Order 1993 was laid before Parliament today and comes into force on 20 May 1993. It establishes carapace length as the only measurement to determine minimum landing size of lobsters and sets minimum landing size at 85 mm carapace length.

Mr. Field: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is to the lasting credit of British fishermen that they were so concerned about conservation that they drew this matter to my hon. Friend's attention? Is it not enough to make a blue-blooded Englishman's blood boil and turn red with anger that this particular regulation slipped by officials unnoticed? Or is it yet again the French fishermen's rule that if it is old enough to live in the sea it is ready to be eaten?

Mr. Curry: It did not slip anybody's notice in the way that my hon. Friend suggests. When the rules were changed, nobody picked this up—and that includes all the fishermen's organisations.

Mr. Field: That is what I said.

Mr. Curry: As soon as we discovered that there was a problem, we sought to have it remedied on a Community basis and we made it clear that if that was not possible we would do it unilaterally. The industry accepted that, and we worked closely together. We have now laid the order. It is an example of how we can work together on technical conservation matters, which is very important.

Mr. Morley: I note that the Minister conceded that it was the fishermen themselves who pressed for tighter regulations on the minimum landing size of lobsters. Does the Minister agree that fishermen are responsible in relation to conservation measures, and does he recognise the frustration that fishermen feel at the Sea Fish (Conservation) Act 1992? Would he agree to sit round the table with the fishermen to discuss genuine, constructive and workable conservation measures as an alternative to the crude and simplistic days-at-sea measures?

Mr. Curry: As usual, the hon. Gentleman is behind the times. A meeting took place last Monday between my officials, my scientists and fishermen's representatives from all parts of the United Kingdom in an attempt to work out what would be practical in technical conservation terms. It will be difficult—probably impossible—to find measures of technical conservation that would be acceptable to the industry and would do all of the job that can be done by the other methods. Therefore, we have a mix of remedies to the problems of technical conservation and over-exploitation and we are pursuing that course.

We will not withdraw the proposals in the Sea Fish (Conservation) Act 1992, but we have every intention of pursuing with the industry in good faith and at a technical level—the matter is now being considered by a technical working group—measures to try to identify enforceable, workable and efficient technical conservation measures.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Does my hon. Friend agree that the fishermen, particularly in Dorset and the Isle of Wight, were very co-operative on conservation measures for lobsters? They want to ensure that decent sized lobsters are taken out, and the original conservation measures taken had improved the quality of the catch. What is my hon. Friend doing to ensure that the rest of the European Community will keep to the same standard as our inshore fishermen?

Mr. Curry: This is a case in which we sought to have a defect remedied on a Communitywide basis. We did not succeed in doing that, but we will return to the attack in that regard. The choice was between trying to put it right in our waters, at the demand of our fishermen, or doing nothing. In those circumstances, the sensible cause is to take the remedy that is at hand. We have done that and it is a good example of co-operation. Technical conservation measures are not always acceptable to all fishermen in the United Kingdom. Very often, one group of fishermen in one port is at odds with another group of fishermen in another port. That is part of the problem that we have to face.

Food and Drink (Import Substitution)

7. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he has taken to encourage import substitution in the combined food and drink sector.

Mr. Curry: We are working to encourage the British food and drink industry to win markets through its efficiency and through the quality and safety of its products.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My right hon. Friend will be aware that this country has a trade deficit of about £5·5 billion in the food and drink sector, whereas Holland has a trade surplus of about £10 billion, including sales to this country of £1·6 billion. Does he agree that the key to reversing that trend lies in better marketing of agricultural produce? Will he examine the effectiveness of Food From Britain and any other measures to find out whether the promotion of British agricultural products can be improved so that we can sell more in the home market and prevent imports from being sold in this country?

Mr. Curry: I agree with my hon. Friend. Food From Britain is being reviewed and we expect a report shortly. Marketing is the key and I hope that the improvements in farm incomes and commodity prices will not make farmers think that marketing has become less important. I am sure that my hon. Friend knows that a fortnight ago in Tewkesbury the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and Sainsbury's ran a seminar on marketing for farmers and 60 of them turned up, which demonstrates how seriously we take the matter.

Food Subsidies

8. Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will list all of the subsidies and import barriers affecting food products.

Mr. Gummer: The European Community agricultural policy, in common with similar policies in the United States and elsewhere, supports agriculture; in that sense, therefore, most of the food that we buy has had the benefit of that support.

Mr. Oppenheim: As a member of a Government who believe in open markets and freedom of choice, is my right hon. Friend not a little ashamed to preside over a regime with so many impediments to choice in trade that he cannot read them all out during Question Time? Is not one of the most pernicious aspects of that illiberal regime its effect on eastern Europe, particularly the strict import quotas and restrictions on imports of soft fruit from Poland, Bulgaria and Hungary? How can we expect the eastern European countries, to which we have for so long preached the benefits of free markets, to reform themselves successfully when we cold shoulder the very products that they can successfully sell to us?

Mr. Gummer: I am proud that the farmers of the Amber Valley and elsewhere are able to get a return on their hard work which keeps our land looked after and home-produced food supplied. I do not believe that it is possible to run a system which does not give support to those farmers. As for strawberries, I am pleased that farmers who are producing raspberries and other soft fruit, especially in Scotland, have fair competition within a sensible regime, rather than finding themselves unable to produce at all.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does the Minister accept that the cost of bringing milk across the channel acts as a non-tariff barrier for imports of raw milk into the United Kingdom? If so, does he accept that to talk about a free market in milk, after the wind-up of the milk marketing scheme, is something of a nonsense?

Mr. Gummer: We have the natural advantage that those who wish to export products such as milk and potatoes to us have to pay the cost of transport. We also have the natural disadvantage that if we wish to export to others we have to pay the cost of transport. I find it difficult to equate that with a non-tariff barrier: it is a geographical fact of life and even the Opposition have to accept such facts of life.

Mr. Bill Walker: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the raspberry growers of Tayside believe that he and his team have introduced measures which have given them the opportunity to compete in the marketplace in a way that did not exist before? In addition, they have been able to improve substantially the way they market their products, which has had a remarkable effect on the economy of north Tayside.

Mr. Gummer: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. There is a balance to be achieved. I want there to be as much opportunity as possible for eastern European countries to sell in this country and in the rest of the European Community, but that must be consonant with the retention and expansion of a healthy British agriculture, if it is to be able to look after the land and to produce the food that we need. As my hon. Friend says, one cannot do that without some protection for our raspberry growers.

Set-aside

10. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on his final recommendations to the European Commission for non-rotational set-aside.

Mr. Gummer: We are pressing the Commission to come forward with its proposals for non-rotational set-aside as soon as possible. It reported at our last meeting that it would do so.

Mr. Colvin: The House may share my hope that the Commission's proposals, when we see them, will be based on my right hon. Friend's recommendations for non-rotational set-aside. At present, 15 per cent. of our countryside, which at this time of year should be looking a picture, is a mess. The farmers are frustrated, the public are getting angry, and a much better method must be found to take this 15 per cent. of land out of arable production.

Mr. Gummer: I am not quite sure that that sweeping generalisation is true. The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds is rather enthusiastic about rotational set-aside. After all, a high proportion of land has historically always been set aside rotationally as part of the fallowing process. I think that a mixture of non-rotational and rotational set-aside, chosen by the farmer, must be the best answer. I should like that to be attended by environmental requirements so that the public good is respected. That is what we hope the Commission will propose.

Mr. Skinner: Does the Minister agree that we have reached a sorry state of affairs when, after 20 years in the Common Market, every family in Britain is paying £19 a week to prop up the common agricultural policy while farmers in Britain are being told to watch the grass grow and collect up to £80 an acre for doing so? When millions of people in the third world need food, the best answer must be to produce food in Britain so that the empty bellies in the Sudan and other parts of Africa can be filled.

Mr. Gummer: This is the first time the hon. Gentleman has produced the farmers' argument and I would like what he says to be true, but he should have discussions with Oxfam, Christian Aid and other bodies which know a little more about this than he does. They will tell him that that is not the way to help the agriculture or the feeding of the third world. Indeed, one of the reasons why we want to reduce over-production in the European Community is that it undermines agriculture in the third world. It is scandalous that oilseed rape oil produced in the EC is sold in developing countries more cheaply than the oil that they produce at home. I hope that we shall be able to stop that.

Common Agricultural Policy (Reform)

11. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he plans to meet the new French Minister of Agriculture to discuss reforming the common agricultural policy.

Mr. Gummer: I met the new French Minister of Agriculture two weeks ago in London. The visit was his first to any European Community Minister.

Mr. Marshall: Did my right hon. Friend emphasise to the new French Minister that it would be an international tragedy if, due to a combination of narrow nationalism, short-term party advantage and chauvinism, he sought to derail the GATT talks by reneging on the reform of the common agricultural policy?

Mr. Gummer: I needed to use no such language, as the new French Agriculture Minister was very much aware of the need for a GATT agreement, not only for the interests of Great Britain and France but for the Community, the world and especially developing countries. He has his own problems and his own policies—he has fought an election, and a number of promises have been made, but I hope very much that we will come to an accommodation which protects this nation.

Mr. Llwyd: On the subject of reform of the CAP, local authorities in Wales are anxious to help farmers who do not have plans to accompany the integrated administration control system forms, but they have been told by representatives of Ordnance Survey that they would not be allowed to copy them, as that would be a breach of copyright. That fact has created a worse problem. We know that there is a time limit—15 May—and time is running out. I urge the Minister to have a word with Ordnance Survey to ask it to look at the matter sensibly.

Mr. Gummer: I have met the head of Ordnance Survey, who has made arrangements throughout England and Wales that have increased the number of outlets from 39 to 300. Unfortunately, very few farmers have tried to get their maps since October, when they were first warned that they had to do so. The Agricultural Development and Advisory Service is playing a particular part in Wales and I believe that the maps are available as widely as they need be. The one thing that we have made clear is that if farmers are genuinely unable to obtain the maps by 15 May, they can send them on afterwards and will not suffer penalties as a result.

Mr. Gill: When my right hon. Friend discusses reform of the CAP will he take a hard look at the system of beef intervention, because on 31 March Britain had more beef in intervention than we have had for a comparable period in each of the four previous years? A total of 164,000 tonnes of British beef were then in intervention. My right hon. Friend has often said that it is a great shame that British catering butchers cannot provide all the steaks that are required in this country. He will know that British beef in intervention stores is not available to them and in some cases, even if it were, it would not be in a suitable form. The issue is serious and I hope that when my right hon. Friend considers the reforms he will do something about the intervention beef, as action is long overdue.

Mr. Gummer: I have discussed intervention beef with the French Minister on two occasions. Intervention is an unsuitable way of regularly supporting the beef market, and should be an emergency provision, not the sort of regular activity that it now is. Catering butchers do not have that problem. Their problem in this country is that beef is not produced in the volume or in the way that provides them with the sort of portions that they want. I hope that the industry will address the issue, as there are many opportunities for it in the catering business.

Dr. Strang: As the common agricultural policy is responsible for food prices being higher than they need be, as it costs the average EC family of four £300 a year in higher taxes, and as the EC Commission has admitted that agricultural spending is set to rise sharply in the next two or three years, did the Minister tell his French counterpart that the CAP was like a juggernaut out of control and needed to be the subject of root and branch reform?

Mr. Gummer: We have carried out root and branch reform, but the effect of that is that we now pay money directly to farmers, instead of hiding it in the cost to the consumers, which will fall significantly. As a result, we can ensure that the money goes where it is needed. The cost to the CAP is the cost of Europe having a well looked-after landscape and of ensuring that we produce our own food —a price worth paying.

Set-aside Land

12. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many acres of farm land have now been set aside; and if he will make a statement on the uses to which this land has been put.

Mr. Gummer: Information on the area set aside under the arable area payments scheme will be available when the area aid applications have been processed.

Mr. Coombs: Will my right hon. Friend measure the desirability of keeping a fair proportion of set-aside land in good agricultural condition against a time when circumstances might be different from now? How satisfied is he that other EC member countries are carrying through the regulations on set-aside as well as he is?

Mr. Gummer: We are keeping a close watch on that last issue and, as far as we are able, we can see that other member countries are clearly carrying out those rules, as we are. My hon. Friend is right to talk of the need to keep land in good agricultural heart—the seven fat years are always followed by seven lean years. Any Minister who was not prepared to protect the public from a shortage of home-produced food should not be Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Bennett: Does not the Minister agree that both the farmer and the farm worker constitute an important part of any rural community? Does he agree that the set-aside scheme compensates the farmer, but not the farm worker? Does he agree that the country stewardship scheme provides income for the farmer and the farm worker? Would it not be better if he persuaded his European counterparts to follow that scheme, which ensures that the countryside is kept in an attractive state, for people in both the countryside and the towns to enjoy? Would not that be a better policy than the set-aside scheme?

Mr. Gummer: There is a place for both—the countryside stewardship scheme has a number of advantages, but it does not reduce production. We must ensure that set aside also includes environmental aspects that look after the countryside properly. If it has to be cut, that may require the attention of farm workers, which is of great benefit. The reduction in the number of farm workers has continued in a similar way, year by year, for almost the whole of the century, so I doubt whether set aside has a close association with it.

Bacon

13. Mr. John Townend: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of the United Kingdom bacon market is taken by imports.

Mr. Curry: Fifty-eight per cent.

Mr. Townend: Is my hon. Friend aware that there are more pigs in my constituency than people? [Interruption.] Is he further aware that in east Yorkshire we produce the finest bacon pigs in the world, that the quality of British bacon over the past 10 years has improved enormously and is now equal to any bacon in the world and that our prices are competitive? Is it therefore not a tragedy that we import such a large proportion of the bacon that is consumed? Would my hon. Friend support my campaign to buy British bacon, eat British bacon and help to reduce the very serious deficit in food?

Mr. Curry: Pigs are reputedly very intelligent animals and that is clearly indicated by their choice of residence. I agree with my hon. Friend and I merely add the eggs and butter as well.

Set-aside Land

14. Mr. Bates: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on progress being made in the assessment of agricultural land for the purposes of set aside.

Mr. Gummer: I hesitate to use a crystal ball when we will soon have the exact figures as a result of the filling in of the integrated administration and control system forms.

Mr. Bates: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that answer. However, does he agree that farming is one of this country's most productive industries and, as such, requires reductions in bureaucracy and red tape to maintain its competitive edge, just like any other business? Is my right hon. Friend therefore aware of the concern in my constituency about the IACS forms, in particular in respect of set aside and other acreage payments, which require 79 pages of explanation and which required one of my constituents to answer 3,000 questions? Is not that an unnecessary and heavy burden on our farming industry?

Mr. Gummer: I do not think so. After all, farmers in this country will receive £1,000 million as a result of it. The danger of recoil from the taxpayer if farmers were not required to give the right facts to obtain that money, would be enormous. My hon. Friend referred to competition. The farmers in every other country in the Europen Community have to fill in the same forms. However, we were sensible enough to give farmers a booklet which enables them to fill in the form very simply. In the many meetings that my colleagues and I have had, farmers have told us that the booklet is extremely good and explains well how to fill in the forms. They felt much happier after reading the booklet than they did when they first saw the form.

Mr. Flynn: What will the Minister do to increase the amount of set-aside land that is used for coppicing and for growing biofuel? Does he agree that much set-aside land might look a mess to those whose interest in land relates only to profiting from the land? However, to most sensitive souls, set-aside land presents a magnificent sight with its unfettered growth of wild flowers. Is it not an example of where beauty is to be found in the wallet of the beholder?

Mr. Gummer: I think that the hon. Gentleman is a bit thick on that point. Most people find set-aside land difficult to take because they are used to neat farm land. We have far too neat a view of the countryside. I agree with the hon. Gentleman's end, but not his explanation. Set aside should be a matter of choice for the farmer between rotational and non-rotational. It should have environmental requirements. Farmers are being paid to look after the land properly and that is right.

Mr. Budgen: Why does my right hon. Friend keep talking about future changes in set aside and other arrangements in the CAP? Last Thursday, in a wide-ranging and very conciliatory speech the Prime Minister spoke of the triumphs of the EC and included in that the reform that has already taken place—apparently to his satisfaction—in the CAP.

Mr. Gummer: Because the reform in the CAP is not yet extended to a wide range of products over which it should extend. It is not yet satisfactory, particularly in relation to the beef regime. Life will change and different reforms will be necessary year after year. I am sure that my hon. Friend would not say the same thing to a Chancellor of the Exchequer who had introduced—as the current Chancellor of the Exchequer has—a very successful Budget. My hon. Friend would not therefore say that there is no need for another Budget next year.

Integrated Administration and Control System

15. Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what submissions the Minister has received about the integrated administration and control system form.

Mr. Gummer: We have received a number of representations about the integrated administration and control system documentation and I have heard a great number in the many meetings that I have conducted personally and many have been made at meetings with other Ministers around the country.

Mr. Tyler: Following that answer and previous answers, what steps is the Ministry prepared to take to introduce an independent arbitration and appeal system to ensure that any farmer who makes a genuine mistake—who is not being fraudulent in any way—is not penalised? Previous answers show that the Minister appears to be the only person in the country, apart from his candidate in Newbury, who thinks that the integrated administration and control system will make life easier for farmers.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman employs his usual party political speech, and we all know what it is worth. The hon. Gentleman is a member of a party which is absolutely uncritical of the European Community and which is federalist to the core. For him to dare to speak in such terms shows him up for what he is. He is much more interested in party politics than in farmers. Farmers know that and that is why increasing numbers of them have thrown aside the pretensions of the Liberal party to care about the countryside.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: While I appreciate that the IACS form is the foundation for future set-aside payments, does my right hon. Friend agree that many farmers, especially in my constituency, have found it difficult and unnecessarily bureaucratic, especially as it sometimes involves ordnance surveys of farms? Such a survey is costing a farmer in my constituency £1,700. Will my right hon. Friend ensure that the Ministry's response to the filling out of the forms is reasonable and that penalties are not unnecessarily imposed on farmers who make mistakes when completing the form?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend says that a farmer in his constituency had to spend £1,700 on maps. I hope that my hon. Friend will find out how much that farmer will get annually as a result of filling in the form. It will run into many thousands of pounds. The forms are not unnecessarily bureaucratic. They will not need to be repeated next year because we shall do a computer print-out on which people can insert new details. We will ensure that the flexibility that is available is used to its utmost. However, we have to meet the perfectly reasonable argument, which the Opposition spokesman again raised, that as far as possible the system must cut fraud.

Mr. Olner: Surely the Minister is aware of the grave concern of many farmers, especially in my constituency, about the complexity of these forms. How many people have asked the Minister to extend the 15 May deadline, which is proving almost impossible for many farmers in my constituency to meet? They are concerned that they are not working on the same playing field as their European counterparts.

Mr. Gummer: They cannot have that concern because almost every country in Europe has to meet the 15 May deadline and will do so. The exception is France which has set a 30 April deadline. There is absolute parity between the countries of Europe. Secondly, in the last two meetings that I conducted, one in Okehampton and the other in Wincanton, no farmer asked me for an extension of the deadline. They all recognised that it was necessary to make sure that Italian, Spanish, Greek and French farmers filled in the form, and that only by doing that did they get the money. The form is necessary not only to stop fraud, but to ensure a level playing field throughout Europe. I shall use as much flexibility as possible, consistent with stopping fraud, because I want every farmer to get every penny to which he is entitled.

Mr. Jonathan Evans: While I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his flexibility on the mapping arrangements, may I draw to his attention the fact that in Wales 70 per cent. of the forms that have so far been checked, and even those that have been completed with maps, have errors? Therefore, many farmers are interested in discovering the degree of flexibility that will be shown in considering claims. I echo the pleas of my hon. Friends by urging the Minister to deal with the applications as flexibly as possible.

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend need have no worry about that. I am absolutely committed to using the maximum flexibility that is available consistent with stopping fraud. The Welsh example underlines the fact that in most areas of England and Wales the area officers have done their best to make sure that as much help as possible is given for filling in the forms. The area officers are trying to be helpful to farmers by making sure that they miss nothing.

Common Agricultural Policy

18. Mr. Cryer: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what will be the estimated annual cost of the common agricultural policy for the United Kingdom in the current financial year.

Mr. Gummer: About £2·32 billion estimated market support expenditure in the United Kingdom for this financial year.

Mr. Cryer: Does that figure not demonstrate what a calamity the common agricultural policy was and is? In spite of successive Ministers saying that there has been root and branch reform of the policy, the fact remains that it costs families in this country at least £18 a week, that it is an obscene policy because it damages other developing nations and that even when starvation occurs, the massively increasing food mountains are never touched because the Common Market buys food from world markets and does not transfer the food surplus to the starving areas of the world. Is it not time for the British Government to recognise that the CAP is a failure and that the only way for us to avoid the CAP is to get out of the Common Market?

Mr. Gummer: The cost per family has gone down £1 since the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) put forward his view. If hon. Members ask a few more questions, we will get the figure down to nil, and that will be very convenient. There is a real cost involved in looking after the land and ensuring future food supplies in Europe. That cost is bound to be considerable. It is too high and that is why we have taken major measures to change the common agricultural policy, and that will cut prices in some areas by 30 per cent. The result will be that total resource costs will be considerably reduced. The hon. Gentleman hates the European Community. It is odd that his party still has him as a member.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Couchman: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 29 April.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Couchman: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. Will he contact President Clinton today, as he contemplates new measures against the Bosnian Serbs, and convey to him the grave reservations of many people in Europe about the possibility of air strikes against any targets, strategic or otherwise, in Bosnia? Will he remind the President of the paramount need to secure the safety of United Nations troops presently serving in Bosnia, including British soldiers, in giving vital humanitarian aid?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that it is vital to minimise the risk to the United Nations troops and, of course, to the humanitarian aid civilians who are also there and who, for so long and so bravely, have carried out the humanitarian operation. We will take whatever steps are necessary to achieve that.

Our other objectives in Bosnia are to do all we can to deter further Serbian attacks and to maximise pressure on all parties to accept the cease fire and a negotiated settlement. But at the moment we are not excluding any viable option which might help to achieve those objectives. We are consulting our allies, especially the United States and our United Nations allies in France and elsewhere, and have expressed our views very clearly to them.

Mr. John Smith: As the horrendous situation in Bosnia worsens even further and as no clear policy has yet emerged from the international community which would effectively deter continued Serb advance, is it not the case that the acknowledged risks of limited air strikes are increasingly outweighed by the very real dangers of continued inaction? Is there not a serious danger that if another policy is not adopted, moves will be made to lift the arms embargo, which would merely intensify the conflict?

The Prime Minister: I share the observations that the right hon. and learned Gentleman made about the lifting of the arms embargo. That does present special difficulties. As I have said before, and reiterate now, we cannot rule out further measures for maximising pressure on the Serbs. We are consulting closely our allies and partners. We must, of course, weigh carefully the implications of air strikes for the removal of the arms embargo or, indeed, any other proposals that may arise in our consultations or in the debate in the House this afternoon.

We must bear particularly in mind the need to sustain the United Nations humanitarian effort. It is all too easy to overlook the fact that, but for that effort over the winter, many hundreds of thousands possibly would have died. The fact that it has continued has been of immense benefit.

Mr. John Smith: As the days and weeks go by, and the Serbs continue to flout the authority of the United Nations, is it not increasingly clear that if the Serbs are to be stopped, they must be given an ultimatum that is backed by a credible threat to their lines of communication and supply in Bosnia?

The Prime Minister: I have told the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and I will reiterate it, that we have not ruled out options. We are discussing options and it is best to consult on them, consider them, examine the probability of success and the possibility of difficulties and then reach a final conclusion.

Q2. Mr. Duncan: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 29 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Duncan: While I recognise our success in bringing down the level of inflation and thereby laying the foundations for economic recovery, does the Prime Minister agree that a rapid rise in house prices is not necessarily good news? Should not we aim for a sustainable recovery, based on exports and investments and, at all costs, avoid a return to the cycle of boom and bust?

The Prime Minister: I share that objective with my hon. Friend. We have said from the outset that we want a recovery that is steady and sustainable, and that is what we have repeatedly taken action to achieve over the past two years. We have said that recovery would follow the reduction of inflation. We got inflation down from 11 per cent. to 2 per cent., and it seems that recovery is now following. As a result of that, we were able to cut interest rates, but that had to follow the reduction in inflation and not precede it. We have worked extremely hard, and it has been extremely difficult for everyone during that period, to get the fundamentals right. We now have them right and I have no intention of throwing away that advantage.

Mr. Ashdown: Will the Prime Minister pause for a moment in his campaign of self-congratulation—[Interruption.]—and recollect—[Interruption.] Will the Prime Minister pause for a minute in his campaign of self-congratulation and recollect that the price of his policies for Britain has been 3 million unemployed, borrowing at £1 billion a week, a devalued pound and a burden of debt that will not be paid off until the end of the century? Does he really think that that is cause for self-congratulation?

The Prime Minister: I am not sure whether the right hon. Gentleman carried the House with him in the introductory part of his question. I acknowledge the difficulties that there have been for many people, not just hon. Members but throughout the country, as we have dealt with the effects of the recession. As the right hon. Gentleman will observe, that recession is not unique to this country. We are emerging from it when many others are still going into it. As we come out of the recession, perhaps I might quote the words of the chairman of Grand Met, Sir Allen Shepherd, who said:

> "Today, in British Industry we have almost everything that we've been asking for: low inflation, competitive exchange rates, higher productivity and good industrial relations. On top of that, the skills 'revolution' is well under way and will add value to everything we do."

I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will welcome that and go out and encourage people across the country to take advantage of that position.

Sir Edward Heath: Does my right hon. Friend recognise that until he and the Government give an absolutely clear and categorical assurance that no British forces, of any kind, will become involved in the former Yugoslavia and Bosnia, except for humanitarian reasons, any other suggestion will be suspect and will make it extremely difficult to persuade people to support the effort that we make? It will be suspect because it will be thought that we shall be dragged, stage by stage, into a European war or that we shall be pushed there by Washington. Both would be intolerable.

The Prime Minister: As my right hon. Friend knows, we were among the first specifically to put troops into Bosnia to deal with humanitarian matters. We need to consider precisely how we can play a part both in seeking to end the terrible conflict that exists within Bosnia and in ensuring —for this is a clear-cut British strategic interest—that the conflict does not spread beyond Bosnia and lead to a realisation of the greater fear on which my right hon. Friend touched: a wider Balkan war. Those are issues of great complexity, which we need to discuss with our colleagues and friends in the United Nations and NATO.

I take to heart my right hon. Friend's remarks, as I know will every right hon. and hon. Member. This is an emerging and changing situation. We shall keep at the forefront of our minds the concern to keep British troops off the ground in Bosnia, but also the need for us to play a part, with our partners, diplomatically, in humanitarian aid, and in using political pressure to bring this dreadful conflict to a conclusion.

Mr. Hoon: Is the Prime Minister at all embarrassed by the fact that last year some £7 million, or two thirds of the cost of his general election campaign, was received by the Conservative party from foreign sources?

The Prime Minister: I have to say that that is just a touch rich coming from a member of a party whose entire shadow Cabinet is sponsored by trade unions. As Mr. Tom Sawyer of NUPE said,

"It's as crude as that . . . no say, no pay."

Q3. Mr. Bates: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 29 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Bates: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the gross domestic product figures produced on Monday clearly show that the recession is over and recovery well under way? Does he further agree that those same figures point to growth in the United Kingdom economy commencing in the middle of last year? Does that not further point to his leadership winning the essential battle against inflation and the equally essential battle against the Opposition?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is entirely right that getting inflation down was the key. We were elected in the spring and the figures that we now have for growth in the second half of last year show that recovery began in the summer.

Q4. Ms Coffey: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 29 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Ms Coffey: Is the Prime Minister aware that Ferranti International, a company in my constituency, is awaiting the outcome of a bid for a high technology contract from the Saudi Arabian Government to which I understand he gave personal support in his talks with the Saudi Government earlier this year? Can he tell me what action he is taking to ensure that the contract is awarded to a major British industry to prevent the job losses that will surely follow if we do not get the contract?

The Prime Minister: Defence Ministers are following the programme closely and doing all they can to progress it. The awarding of the contract in due course is a matter for the Saudi Government, but we are doing what we can to assist.

Q5. Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 29 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Winterton: Does my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister agree that the British taxpayer should not be expected to pay towards the administration costs of the social charter throughout the EC, when the United Kingdom, quite rightly and properly, has opted out of all its provisions?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is well aware of and shares the Government's view on the social chapter. The administrative costs of dealing with the social chapter are de minimis and in no sense a burden on the economy.

Arms Exports (Iraq)

Q6. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make it his policy to instruct Government Departments to make full disclosure of all documents requested in connection with legal proceedings relating to unlawful export of arms to Iraq; and if he will make it his policy not to issue public immunity interest certificates in connection with any such proceedings.

The Prime Minister: Government Departments will continue to disclose documents in any legal proceedings in the manner prescribed by law.

Mr. Dalyell: If that is the answer, why is it that the Crown did not exercise its discretion, when Ministers knew perfectly well of his service to MI5 and MI6, in favour of Paul Grecian in the Ordtech trial?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman knows as well as anyone in the House that it is quite inappropriate for me to comment when such cases are in the courts. He knows that it is inappropriate and I will not do so.

Engagements

Q8. Mr. Pike: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 29 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Pike: Will the Prime Minister rethink the Government's approach to low pay and the abolition of the wages councils? Will he consider the information prepared by Lancashire county council which not only highlights the scandal of low pay but shows that in areas with no wages councils there is a much higher incidence of low pay, clearly identifying the dangers of their abolition?

The Prime Minister: I am hardly likely to take any advice from Lancashire county council, given its record in recent years. The sheer scale of the increase in Lancashire's council tax—I think from memory that it is an extra £84—as a result of the council's maladministration is remarkable. Therefore, it is most unlikely that I shall take its advice upon that matter.

On the general subject of wages councils, we have made it clear on a number of occasions in the past that their principal drawback is that they cost jobs to people who would otherwise be employed, and that is something which we care about, even if the hon. Gentleman does not.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. On the sub judice rule, are the privileges of the House of Commons to be undertaken by arbitrary——

Madam Speaker: Order. I cannot take such a point of order now. I shall do so later, as always, at the end of questions.

Cervical Smear Tests

3.30 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow) (by private notice): To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the disclosure yesterday of serious errors in the cervical smear testing of more than 2,000 women at the Inverclyde Royal hospital in Greenock.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Ian Lang): The Argyll and Clyde health board—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. It is time that the House came to order so that we can hear this important exchange.

Mr. Lang: The Argyll and Clyde health board announced yesterday that there had been some inaccurate reporting of results of smear tests by the laboratory staff at Inverclyde Royal hospital, Greenock, carried out between 1987 and February 1992. This problem was confirmed last week following the analysis of 1,000 slides, and the health board has moved quickly to take appropriate action.

Some 20,000 slides are being reviewed and it is expected that 90 per cent. of these will be confirmed as normal, requiring no further action. The board considers that up to 2,000 women may require a repeat smear test and that a high proportion of these will also be found to be normal. Arrangements have been made for counselling through the provision of helplines and to follow up quickly any women whose re-test shows an abnormal result. General practitioners have been fully briefed. It is anticipated that the whole process will be completed in eight to nine weeks, but that the large majority of the women involved should receive reassurance well before that.

My noble Friend, Lord Fraser of Carmyllie, has already indicated that priority will be given to this problem and the other Scottish health boards will assist as necessary to ensure a speedy conclusion of the review and follow-up action. He has also announced that he has commissioned a full inquiry into the circumstances of the problem at Inverclyde in order to put beyond doubt that the situation was unique and will be non-recurring. Dr. Euphemia McGoogan of Edinburgh University will head the inquiry team, and my noble Friend hopes to be able to announce the names of the other members shortly, together with the full terms of reference. The findings of the inquiry will be made public.

I regard this as a serious incident that deserves the closest and most careful attention. That it will have. I would, however, also like to reassure the House that all national health service laboratories in Scotland are now working to the highest professional standards and subject to external audit. Women in Scotland should be reassured that the results of tests are as accurate and reliable as they can be, throughout Scotland as elsewhere in the United Kingdom.

Dr. Godman: I thank the Secretary of State for his statement on this critical and sensitive issue. He will surely agree that our main concern must be for the retesting of the women, and that re-testing should be carried out as accurately and as speedily as possible, with accuracy being the key word. Should he not be considering the use of laboratory resources from elsewhere in Scotland and south of the border in order to reduce this over-long period of eight to nine weeks? For my constituents, caught up in this distressing affair, I can tell the Secretary of State that eight to nine weeks is much too long to wait for peace of mind.

With regard to the inquiry to be chaired by the excellent Dr. McGoogan, may I implore the right hon. Gentleman to invite a woman of commensurate stature from outwith the medical profession to join Dr. McGoogan so that we can dispel once and for all the idea that this is a case of a doctor examining other doctors?

While the monitoring of these so-called quality control programmes is adequate, it surely now requires statutory regulation. Will the right hon. Gentleman set up a supervisory body that can examine in as accurate a way as possible the monitoring procedures adopted by these clinics throughout Scotland's health boards?

The Secretary of State will surely agree with me that we must tell women of all ages, from teenagers to grandmothers, not to allow this dreadful incident to put them off obtaining cervical smear tests, because of the importance of such tests in preventing the dreadful scourge of cervical cancer.

Mr. Lang: I absolutely agree with the hon. Gentleman in emphasising the importance both of speed and of accuracy in the handling of the re-tests, such re-tests as may be necessary.

As regards the time scale for completing the exercise, I indicated eight to nine weeks as the outside limit within which we expect all aspects of the matter to be concluded, but I confidently predict that the very large majority of cases will be dealt with quickly and well within that time scale.

We are considering the membership of the inquiry team along with Dr. McGoogan. I take note of the point that the hon. Gentleman has made about involving somebody from outside the medical profession.

The hon. Gentleman raised the question of a supervisory body to monitor auditing procedures in the future. This is certainly a topic that I expect the inquiry to want to examine.

Finally, the hon. Gentleman spoke of the importance of women not being put off having the tests, and I absolutely endorse what he said. These tests are important and of great value to the women concerned. They are now carried out on a three-year cycle, whereas before it was a five-year cycle, and I have considerable confidence in their efficiency and accuracy.

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): I agree with my right hon. Friend that this is a most regrettable situation. I sympathise with the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), but I must point out that the problem extends into Ayrshire, albeit not to such a degree. Does my right hon. Friend agree that application for trust status for hospitals demands very stringent quality processes to be built into business plans? Does that help in this situation for the future?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is right to the extent that a number of cases, particularly in north Ayrshire, will also be involved in this rescreening exercise since some of the smears taken in that part of Scotland were processed at the Inverclyde laboratory. On the latter part of his question, I agree with him on the importance of the highest possible quality both of performance and of auditing of measures of this kind.

Mrs. Ray Michie (Argyll and Bute): The Secretary of State will be aware of my concern and that of my constituents in Cowal and Bute whose tests were also sent to the Inverclyde Royal hospital. I too welcome the swift action by the Argyll and Clyde health board in making this very serious matter public and in setting up the valuable helpline. I endorse what the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) said about the membership of the inquiry team. I hope that a suitable lay person will be included in the team.

Has any thought been given to tracing women who have left the area, including the Scottish wives of Americans who have returned to the United States following the closure of the Holy Loch base?

Finally, will the Secretary of State consult his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health about the possibility of introducing the Quest cancer test? I believe that it is 95 per cent. accurate, and much less subjective than the method currently used. Only £480,000 is required to conclude the final trial.

Mr. Lang: I note what the hon. Lady has said about the membership of the inquiry team, and I shall bear her suggestion in mind.

Every effort will be made to track down all the women involved in the tests over the period in question, including, where possible, those who have gone abroad. The community health index will be helpful, and all Scotland's health boards have offered whatever help may be needed to improve both the speed and the accuracy of the exercise.

The hon. Lady also asked about new procedures for cervical smear tests. I am confident that the processes being used throughout the health service in Scotland—and elsewhere in the United Kingdom—are the most appropriate at present, but research continues, in this country and abroad, to find ways of improving them. If any improved method is established, we shall of course want to consider it.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the concern that was felt throughout Scotland when the problem was announced. Surely the important task now is to reassure everyone that the Government are acting to remedy this difficult and serious situation. We all realise that human errors will always occur when humans are involved; the important thing is to deal quickly and effectively with such errors when they are revealed.

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Since February 1992, the auditing process that has already been in use elsewhere throughout Scotland has been used in the hospital concerned. I am confident—as is the chairman of the health board—that the problems will not recur.

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): The problem clearly occurred because of procedural errors. Will the Secretary of State give an assurance that the same procedural errors could not have occurred in other health boards between 1987 and 1993?

Mr. Lang: As far as I am aware, there is no question of their having occurred in other health boards. All the general managers met yesterday to discuss matters; this matter was also discussed, and I am confident that they will all re-examine the processes that are used. I believe, however, that the situation that existed in the Argyll and Clyde board until February 1992 does not exist anywhere else.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): Does the Secretary of State accept that all hon. Members wish to ensure that women are guaranteed a service that will secure the correct results of tests that they undergo—for instance, cervical smears or mammography? That is very important.

Any woman whose test produces a slightly worrying result will experience weeks of agony in her attempt to come to terms with the situation. The Secretary of State has said that he estimates that women in the Inverclyde area will have to wait no longer than eight or nine weeks at the outside for the final result. Will he give us his estimate of the shortest time that they will have to wait, to reassure the 20,000 women involved—and, no doubt, all the other women throughout Scotland who are deeply concerned about the possibility that their tests have produced an inaccurate result? That is an important consideration for women.

Mr. Lang: I agree: it is urgent that as many people as possible are reassured as quickly as possible. Mrs. Mary Robertson, the unit general manager, has been appointed head of a task force set up to take appropriate steps as quickly and efficiently as possible, and the assistance of two external laboratories has been called in to speed up the process. In addition, further resources will be made available as necessary.

I emphasise that the eight-to-nine-week time scale is the outside limit within which I hope the entire exercise will have been completed, including the follow-up on those who have to be tested again.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Does the Secretary of State accept that it would be churlish not to agree that the Government have acted speedily on this matter but that my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) has done a great service to the House and to women in tabling the question? Although the Secretary of State apparently takes the view that this is an isolated incident, does he accept that 20,000 women are deeply worried and that the incident has implications beyond Inverclyde?

Will the Secretary of State accept that we require assurances about standards of quality elsewhere in Scotland and that it is a matter not only of human frailty but of the type of systems that we operate? Is he satisfied that the available resources are sufficient to ensure that no such incidents occur elsewhere?

Will the Secretary of State consider whether the inquiry that he has outlined should be broadened in its remit not to deal only with the specific problem in Inverclyde but to allay the worries of women throughout Scotland and Great Britain who have rightly placed so much faith in smear tests?

Will the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance on resources? Will he assure us that the local health authority will not be asked to pay the bill arising from this unfortunate incident?

Does he accept that the Opposition and the whole House wish to encourage the great majority of hospital laboratory personnel engaged in such demanding work to maintain their very high standards, and that we acknowledge that the obligations placed on them are horrendous in the extreme?

[Mr. Tom Clarke]

It is essential that this incident should not act as a deterrent to anyone anywhere in the United Kingdom, and certainly not in Scotland, who is considering whether to be screened or tested by the NHS. Apart from the re-examination of slides, which the Secretary of State has announced, and the inquiry, what further steps will he take to ensure that there is no such deterrent effect from the sad experience of Inverclyde?

Mr. Lang: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his comments about the speedy reaction of the health board and the Government to this extremely unfortunate and serious incident. I must emphasise the fact that, of the 20,000 cases involved, some 90 per cent. will not need to be recalled—that is our expectation—and, of the remainder who are recalled, a substantial proportion will be recalled simply because the quality of the original smear does not enable an adequate reading to be taken.

I anticipate that any difficulty or problem arising over the identification or diagnosis of a cancerous or pre-cancerous condition will be confined to a very small number of people within the overall numbers with which we are dealing.

As for resources, I stress that the important thing is to get the exercise completed quickly, accurately and sensitively, and I shall not allow resources to be a problem. Whether it is a matter for the health board or for the health service as a whole in Scotland, I shall ensure that resources are adequate.

The question of the possible broadening of the inquiry's remit is essentially a matter for the inquiry itself whose terms of reference have not yet been set, but I shall consider what the hon. Gentleman said.

I certainly pay tribute to the staff of the health board for the speed and commitment which they have shown in bringing all their efforts to bear on this problem and ensuring that the counselling services and other ways of helping the anxious women involved are put into operation as speedily and effectively as possible.

I underline the wish stressed by the hon. Gentleman and by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman). This incident should not deter women from undertaking these tests. Tests that identify a problem early are immensely valuable for the prospects of the woman affected. As for further steps that might be appropriate to ensure that that result is achieved, I shall watch the situation closely as it develops and take full account of the inquiry's findings.

Business of the House

3.38 pm

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): Will the Leader of the House state the business for next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): Yes, Madam. The business for next week will be as follows:

TUESDAY 4 MAY—European Communities (Amendment) Bill, Report state, first day.

WEDNESDAY 5 MAY—European Communities (Amendment) Bill, Report stage, second day.

THURSDAY 6 MAY—Debate on the Royal Navy, on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 7 MAY—Private Members' Bills.

MONDAY 10 MAY—Progress in Committee on the Finance (No. 2) Bill.

The House will also wish to know that European Standing Committees will meet on Wednesday 5 May at 10.30 am to consider European Community documents as follows:

Committee 'A'

Document No. 11235/92 on European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund anti-fraud measures.

Committee 'B'

Document 7021/92 on company taxation.

[Wednesday 5 May:
European Standing Committee A
Relevant European Community Document
11235/92 Anti-fraud measures
Relevant European Legislation Committee Document
HC 79-xviii (1992-93).
European Standing Committee B
Relevant European Community Document
7021/92 Company Taxation
Relevant European Legislation Committee Report
HC 79-vi (1992-93)]

Mrs. Beckett: I thank the Leader of the House for that statement, and especially for the debate on the Navy for which he will recall hon. Members on both sides have been pressing for some time. I remind him that we are still anxiously awaiting an announcement of the assignment of the new European constituencies in terms of where they will go and of who will deal with the issue of boundaries. Labour Members have repeatedly said that it would be outrageous if such decisions did not go to the Boundary Commission, which has expressed its willingness and ability to deal with them. We are anxious to have an early statement in the House on the matter.

May I press the Leader of the House for a statement and some information on the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Bill, which I understand may be returning from another place shortly? I hope that he can tell us that it will be possible to have the new draft immigration rules before the House before we come to that part of our proceedings so that people can assess how the Government have been able to meet assurances given in Committee which will clearly inform the debate that we have here.

I ask the Leader of the House to bear in mind that we will need at least three full days in Committee on the Finance Bill so that we can explore, for example, the recent judgment of the IMF that we are seeing the emergence of a structural budget deficit alongside a structural trade deficit in the United Kingdom. The emergence of such twin deficits will be of great concern to hon. Members on both sides of the House.

To address the issue of the victims of the Government's economic policy, I ask the right hon. Gentleman to ask the Secretary of State for Employment to come to the House and make a statement on the observation of the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans):

"of the 1 million long-term unemployed, probably half . . . can be termed layabouts".—[Official Report, 27 April 1993; Vol. 223, c. 838.]

The Secretary of State conspicuously failed to rebut that statement at the time—it has caused outrage certainly among Labour Members. I hope that she will take the opportunity to make a statement to rebut it.

Finally, I remind the Leader of the House that we are anxiously awaiting a further Opposition day.

Mr. Newton: On the last but one point, I will certainly bring the the right hon. Lady's request to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment. I must admit that I did not read into those remarks of my hon. Friend quite the import that the right hon. Lady has suggested.

As for days on the Finance Bill, the right hon. Lady will find that she will have ample opportunity to make the points that she evidently wishes to make, although I am not sure whether they truly arise in relation to the Finance Bill. It sounded more like the sort of point that she wanted to make anyway, and I acknowledge and, within limits, respect that.

On the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Bill, I cannot give immediately to the right hon. Lady the precise undertaking that she sought. I know that my hon. and right hon. Friends will seek to ensure that the House has what information it feels it properly should have in undertaking the further debates that will be required on that measure.

On the question of the boundaries of the extra European seats, I cannot add to what I have said on the past two or three occasions—that once proposals on the matter have been formulated, the Government plan to consult the Opposition parties. I am sure that the right hon. Lady will come well within that parameter.

I note the further request for another Opposition Supply day. I couple it with the right hon. Lady's kind thanks for the debate on the Navy. I repeat the point that I think I have been meeting the right hon. Lady's requests at the rate of one a week, so at least she can harbour some continuing hope.

Sir Terence Higgins (Worthing): As it appears to be the policy of the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee not to reply to letters from right hon. and hon. Members regarding the future of Old Palace yard, will my right hon. Friend allow us to have a debate next week? Is he aware that it is a serious matter? It is wrong that hon. Members and their secretaries should be evicted to accommodate the House of Lords secretarial agency. Their Lordships have said that the building is not suitable. The proposal is to apply for planning permission to make structural alterations to a building that is clearly of great historical importance.

Mr. Newton: I am, of course, aware of the concern expressed in various quarters, not least by my right hon. Friend, about the matter. As he suggested from the way in which he put his question to me, the issues are primarily for the Accommodation and Works Select Committee, the Chairman of which I note is present in the Chamber. I am sure that he will have noted and will seek to respond in an appropriate way to my right hon. Friend's remarks.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): The Leader of the House may not be aware that in the past two weeks confusion seems to have developed between Ministers at the Department of the Environment about whether they have any responsibility for water charges in those parts of the country which face large increases in water charges. In view of the differences of opinion within the Department and with the Prime Minister, perhaps it would be appropriate to allow some time for a debate in the Chamber so that the matter can be urgently resolved. It seems extraordinary that Ministers have not decided among themselves.

Mr. Newton: I am sure that my right hon. and hon. Friends in all Departments are united in their view about such matters, but I will certainly bring the hon. Gentleman's perception of disagreement to their attention.

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): Last week my right hon. Friend agreed to consider my request that statutory instruments Nos. 526 and 542 should be referred to a Standing Committee for debate. In those statutory instruments the Government seek to treat timeshare dwellings as commercial properties subject to business rates. Now that the weakness of the Government's position has been exposed and the cost to individual timeshare owners has become clear, will my right hon. Friend grant my request?

Mr. Newton: I am afraid that I have not yet had an opportunity to complete my examination of the matter in the light of my hon. Friend's request last week. However, I note his further request, and I shall seek to complete my consideration as soon as possible.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): May I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to early-day motions 1858 and 1859 and the recent murder of the black schoolboy Stephen Lawrence?

[That this House shares the sense of outrage in the community in South East London following the brutal racist killing of Stephen Lawrence on 22nd April 1993; sends condolences to his parents, Neville and Doreen Lawrence; recognises the state of shock in the area in view of the previous murders of Rolan Adams and Rohit Duggal; believes that the presence and activity of the British National Party in the area incites racial hatred and contributes to the level of racial violence; calls on the Attorney General to bring proceedings against the British National Party for incitement to racial hatred; and calls on Bexley London Borough to use its enforcement powers to close the British National Party headquarters which are operating in breach of planning regulations.]

Stephen Lawrence, a church-going schoolboy, was standing by a bus stop when he was set upon by a gang of white youths carrying knives. It is the third murder of a young black person in recent months in that area. All those murders have taken place within a four-mile radius of the headquarters of the British National party.

I visited the family last weekend. In the light of the family's grief and the fear of the black community that the murders represent the start of a wave of racist attacks, I ask the Leader of the House to make time for a debate on racial attacks. We want to tell the House that the black community wants to see such murders receive the front-page attention that other attacks receive. They are fearful that the type of racial violence that we have seen in Europe is coming to the British Isles.

Mr. Newton: I cannot promise the hon. Lady a debate, but I can say—and I am sure that I say it on behalf of not only members of the Government but of all Members of Parliament—that I unreservedly condemn all attacks on members of ethnic minority communities. We all extend our sympathy to the family of Stephen Lawrence and express our hope that the culprits will be caught and brought to book.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): My right hon. Friend will have seen early-day motion 1670 on the selected list proposals for family planning.

[That this House notes the Government's proposal to include the contraceptive pill in the Selected List of drugs for prescription under the National Health Service; notes that the United Kingdom uses the cheapest oral contraceptives of any country in the EC and that the contraceptive pill gives the lowest failure rate of any form of contraception; recognises that following medical advances, the newer and more expensive pills containing safer progestagens are most vulnerable to the Selected List proposals because they are more expensive but are the first choice when prescribing; is concerned about the possible side effects, such as weight gain, headaches, bleeding and even unplanned pregnancies in women forced to transfer to a cheaper contraceptive pill; notes that the saving per woman is of the order of £16·90 per annum and contrasts this with £200 as the average cost of a termination of pregnancy and £1,217 for a delivery; therefore concludes that there will be no net saving if between two and four unplanned pregnancies occur in 100 women per year; understands the concerns expressed by health care professionals and organisations including the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists and the Family Planning Association; and therefore calls on the Secretary of State for Health to delete the contraceptive pill from the Selected List.]

The matter is causing increasing anxiety among both doctors and the pharmaceutical industry. I draw the attention of the House to my declared interest in the matter. Will my right hon. Friend give time for a full debate in the House in Government time on the proposals, which will affect many patients throughout the country? I am aware that my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) recently had an Adjournment debate on the matter, but I feel that it should have Government time for full debate.

Mr. Newton: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health will be present to answer questions on the first day of the business programme that I have announced. Meanwhile, I understand that the independent advisory committee on NHS drugs will ensure that oral contraceptives to meet real clinical need remain available on NHS prescription.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): As to the question by the right hon. Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) about the Accommodation and Works Committee, I can assure the Leader of the House that any letters he or any hon. Member sends to it are replied to. Indeed, if anyone has a complaint, most of them—like the right hon. Member for Worthing—are invited to raise it with the Committee.

I was not going to ask that particular question. My main question was to ask whether the Leader of the House had read early-day motion 1892.

[That this House shares the concern reported in the House Magazine of 19th April over the way the televising of Select and Standing Committees can be something of a lottery because of a haphazard pricing structure which can result in broadcasting organisations being asked to pay up to £2,000 for the television feed of a two-and-a-half-hour Committee hearings; believes that Committee hearing which are of interest on editorial grounds should not go unrecorded soley because of cost; and calls on the Lord President of the Council and the Broadcasting Select Committee to have discussions with the independent contractor, CCT Productions Ltd., so as to agree a pricing structure which meets the needs of the smaller regional companies and programmes as well as those of the national news networks.]

I pay tribute to the Table Office for ensuring that it appeared on the Order Paper because it was tabled only at 2.30 this morning. I do not expect the Leader of the House to have read it, but it is of direct relevance to him. It has a direct effect on the House of Commons Committees and, in particular, on those dealing with private Member's Bills. The televising of my Committee was stopped because it could not be funded on the particular day that I wanted it to be televised.

Mr. Newton: If I might advert briefly to the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question—which he conceded was not really his intended question at all—I realise that I am standing here as a sort of postbox in an exchange between my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) and the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell).

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The right hon. Gentleman is in the firing line.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Member for Bolsover is right, but I am glad to have facilitated this exchange between then.

As to the latter part of the question, I have not had a chance to look at the early-day motion, but I understand the position to be that the House decided that the broadcasting of Standing Committees should be, as it is called in the jargon, "demand-led"—that is to say, a Committee is covered only if one or more of the broadcasting organisations is willing to pay for it. I do not think that it is a matter over which I can have any direct or overriding control.

Mr. Roy Thomason (Bromsgrove): Will my right hon. Friend arrange for time to be given soon for a debate on management buy-outs, with particular reference to Leyland-DAF, so that the preservation of jobs in the west midlands created by that management buy-out and its knock-on effect of retaining jobs in my own constituency can be fully discussed and the Government's contribution of £5 million to help Leyland-DAF can be properly noted?

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his very sensible question. I am glad to confirm the welcome news that the Leyland-DAF receivers have now transferred ownership to the management buy-out team. I understand that that was completed over the weekend, and officially launched yesterday. It will secure about 1,000 jobs, and it is good news.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): May we have a debate soon on the financing of political parties in view of the recent revelations of the former director of fund raising for the Tory party that two thirds of the £11 million which the Tory party admits to spending in last year's general election came from rich overseas backers, many of whom did not have a vote in this country at that general election? Is it not a serious threat to democracy for the party of government to be filling its coffers in such a way?

Mr. Newton: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman was here during Prime Minister's questions. If he was, I cannot better—nor will I attempt to—what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said then: that it takes a pretty fair nerve for questions of that kind to be asked by a party, well over half of whose members, as I understand it, are sponsored by trade unions and where trade union leaders are on record as saying something as simple and straightforward as that which my right hon. Friend quoted a few moments ago.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I again ask my right hon. Friend for a debate next week on the serious and ever more widespread mutilation of horses in this country and to take account of the recent report of the National Equine Welfare Committee, of which I am president, which is seeking to co-ordinate a nationwide effort to stop those vicious practices?

Mr. Newton: Once again, with respect, I note my hon. Friend's persistence in quite rightly raising this matter on the Floor of the House. I hope that he will understand that I am not able to promise a debate, but I will ensure that my hon. Friends with responsibilities in this area are made aware of his continued concern.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Thank you for calling me, Madam Speaker, and I wish you well as you enter your second year in the Chair.

May I support my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) in asking the Leader of the House for a debate next week on the funding of political parties so that we can compare the contributions from British trade unions, which are openly and honestly declared, with the secret contributions of millions of pounds from foreign business men and tax evaders and find out exactly what the kickbacks are and what they get in return for their secret, undeclared contributions to the party in government?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman seeks to make amends to you, Madam Speaker, for what amounted to lese-majesté yesterday or the day before. He can ask me the question but he will not get a different reply. I would like him to explain what was said to the union leader who said that he will have a say in the party while he continues to fund it and that it will be a question of "No say, no pay". What about that?

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Will the Leader of the House make time to enable the House to redebate some elements of the Criminal Justice Act 1991, which is clearly not working? I concede that I voted for this Act and that I was wrong. I hope that the Government will also concede that they were wrong.

One element is that magistrates do not know the history of the persons appearing before them and therefore, when the case has been proved, they do not know whether the sentence is for a persistent or a first-time offender. Clearly, that is wrong. The fines formula is also not working well. People with a disposable income of more than £100——

Madam Speaker: Order. There is no need to argue the case. The hon. Gentleman must ask a business question.

Mr. Dickens: I wanted to be clear about the two elements. The disposable income formula is not working well and, as Madam Speaker has so kindly suggested, a debate would give us a wonderful opportunity to explore the subject in depth.

Mr. Newton: Even without a debate, it sounded to me as if my hon. Friend managed to explore it in some depth and I note his concern. He will be aware that we are all —including my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary—aware of the comments and criticisms made in that respect. Equally, he will understand that I cannot promise a debate or the Bill that he appears to want, but I shall consider the matter carefully.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Could the Leader of the House arrange for an early statement from the Minister responsible for fisheries on the implementation of policies towards the industry, particularly the Sea Fish (Conservation) Bill? Because of the preponderance of agricultural questions during Agriculture, Fisheries and Food questions, he will have noted that there was no opportunity for Members of Parliament representing fishing communities to express their views. He will also recognise that the Government's policies are extremely controversial and wholly hated in the fishing communities. May we have an early statement so that those matters can be examined once again?

Mr. Newton: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman evidently did not manage to get in during Agriculture questions. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister was as sorry as I am and I am sure that he will seek to respond appropriately to the hon. Gentleman's question.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will my right hon. Friend arrange for a debate on British relations with Denmark before 18 May? May I remind him that at the Edinburgh summit the Foreign Secretary said that it would not be a political reality to suppose that we should sit down at a new place and renegotiate a treaty with 11 member states without Denmark. As he has since made some ambiguous remarks in Denmark which, given their worst interpretation, may amount to a betrayal of the promises made to obtain the paving debate——

Madam Speaker: Order. I do not need hon. Members to argue their case at business questions. A couple of lines merely to give an indication of the subject to the Leader of the House would be sufficient. Will the hon. Gentleman please make his point?

Mr. Budgen: Those ambiguous words might have been a gross——

Madam Speaker: Order. I am now calling the hon. Gentleman to order. He must either ask a direct question or resume his seat. Which is it to be?

Mr. Budgen: I shall ask a direct question. In the light of those observations, will my right hon. Friend arrange for a debate as quickly as possible?

Mr. Newton: I have nominated two days of debate on European matters—the first two days after the weekend. I am not absolutely sure whether my hon. Friend was present during Prime Minister's questions on Tuesday, but even if he was not he has only to read the record of what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) to see that the implications of the question that he has just asked were completely disposed of by the answer of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on Tuesday.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): When will the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry make a statement on the new map of assisted area status for Britain? Cardiff, Newport, Rhyl, Wrexham, and Alyn and Deeside are apprehensive about losing that prized status. Wales must not miss out. There are 3,100 people out of work in my constituency; they need the status to find work.

Mr. Newton: I note the hon. Gentleman's concern about the assisted area status map. I take it that he is giving a sign of what he wants to see in the outcome of the current review. I am not in a position to give the outcome today, or to say precisely when it will be possible to give it. However, I am sure that, once again, my right hon. Friends will have noted the hon. Gentleman's question.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): My right hon. Friend will be aware that in a moment or two the House will undertake a debate on the problems of Bosnia and the ethnic difficulties of that embattled republic. Does he accept that a similar, although lower profile, problem presently exists on the wonderful and beautiful island of Cyprus, about which discussions are taking place? Will my right hon. Friend arrange for my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary or an appropriate Minister to come to the House and make a statement on the United Kingdom Government's exact stance on the problem? That would allow the Foreign Office to adopt an even-handed attitude to both the Greek Cypriots and the Turkish Cypriots—which is not the case at present.

Mr. Newton: I cannot promise the sort of statement that my hon. Friend wants, but at least I am saved from the task of having to act as a postbox as the man at whom the missive was aimed, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, is by my side.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Will the Leader of the House provide time next week for a debate on the long overdue reports of the Select Committee on Members' Interests on a register of lobbying interests and new registration rules which are roughly two years and 14 months overdue? Does he not realise that people will think it hypocritical of the Tories to vote for a 1·5 per cent. pay freeze for the public sector while many of them are busy lining their pockets with outside directorships and parliamentary adviserships? Such moves have been backed by a Government who consistently refuse to give time for a debate on reports as requested by the House.

Mr. Newton: Leaving aside all the political stuff at the end of the hon. Gentleman's question, as I have said to the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) on a number of occasions, I am hoping to make progress on the matter. Clearly, the House has had to deal with much business of various sorts in recent weeks.

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): Given the tragedy of Warrington, the mayhem of Bishopsgate, regular disasters throughout the United Kingdom, particularly Northern Ireland, and the fact that the IRA has boasted that no security levels are immune to them, will my right hon. Friend consider a debate on a means of resolving those problems?

Mr. Newton: I certainly cannot promise a debate next week, but I note the concern that my hon. Friend has expressed—I am sure that it is echoed in many parts of the House. I shall bring it to the attention of the Home Secretary, who is the person principally concerned.

Mr. Malcolm Chisholm (Edinburgh, Leith): May we have a statement from the Secretary of State for Scotland next week to clear up the confusion that has arisen in Scotland about what has happened to its share of the money announced by the Secretary of State for Employment for after-school child care? When I asked her about this in January, she said that 9 per cent. of the £45 million should go to Scotland and that the money was earmarked for that purpose. Can the Secretary of State explain, then, why the money is ring-fenced in England and well publicised in England, yet the Scottish Office has refused to ring-fence it or give any publicity to it?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman should be able to find an opportunity to put that point directly to the Secretary of State on Wednesday 5 May, when he will be here to answer questions.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid-Staffordshire): Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that, regardless of what may or may not happen on 14 May to the private Member's Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell), the Government will, in the next Session, introduce a Bill of their own on Sunday trading, offering at least three choices on which the House will be able to vote without a Whip?

Mr. Newton: In a technical sense, my hon. Friend is asking me to pre-empt the Queen's Speech, but he will be well aware of what has been said about the Government's intention to introduce legislation covering this matter.

Mr. Mike Hall (Warrington, South): May I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to the fact that the doctors' surgery at Windmill Hill in my constituency has closed today, and that the 703 patients of the surgery were advised of the closure by Cheshire health authority only last weekend? They were not consulted about the decision, and they now have to go elsewhere in Runcorn to find doctors' practices. Can the right hon. Gentleman arrange for the Secretary of State for Health to come to the House next week and make a statement on how the patients charter is protecting the interests of my constituents?

Mr. Newton: As it happens—I have already said this once or twice—the Secretary of State for Health is due to be here on Tuesday 4 May. Perhaps I can be even more helpful by saying that I understand that the hon. Gentleman has already spoken to the Minister, who has agreed to write to him about the matter. I am sure that she and her officials are looking into it at this very moment.

Points of Order

4.17 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I wonder whether, arising out of Question 6 to the Prime Minister, you would reflect on the following issue over the weekend, because these matters are complex. I refer to the question of the sub judice rule.

I draw your attention to column 755 in the Official Report of 10 November 1992, when my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) said:

"On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I would like your advice on how the House is left following today's statement. Is it the case that no further questions can be put or answered on the many issues that have come up in the questioning, on the grounds that it is sub judice? I hope that you will not answer today, because it is an important question.

If a Minister can set up a judicial inquiry and no questions can be put on the matter for the next 18 months, on the grounds of the sub judice rule, parliamentary accountability will disappear overnight."

My right hon. Friend then asked you, Madam Speaker, to reflect on the matter. At column 756, I said:

"Further to the point of order raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), Madam Speaker. This morning the Table Office accepted two identical questions from me—one for the Prime Minister and one for the Secretary of State for Defence—asking on what date they were first alerted to the Matrix Churchill situation. In the light of the answer to my right hon. Friend, are we saying that there is no need for Ministers to answer such questions, even if they remain on the Order Paper, on the grounds that the matter is sub judice"?

You, Madam Speaker, replied:

"Order. It is quite the opposite. As I have already said, the inquiry is not sub judice."—[Official Report, 10 November 1992; Vol. 213, c. 755-56.]

The argument is that the Ordtech trial, which is a very grey area, is parallel to the Matrix Churchill trial. However, after various inquiries, I do not know whether this is covered by Lord Justice Scott although I am told that it is. In those circumstances, may I ask you to reflect on those complex issues over the weekend and perhaps make a judgment on Tuesday?

Madam Speaker: If the hon. Gentleman would read his Question 6 to the Prime Minister today, he will see that it deals not with an inquiry, but with legal proceedings. In fact, his question today did not breach the sub judice rule. The hon. Gentleman did, I have to say, stray in his supplementary a little far into matters of that nature, and the Prime Minister was quite correct in declining to comment further. The hon. Gentleman's question was not related to an inquiry; it related to legal proceedings.

Mr. Dalyell: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. The Prime Minister's answer did relate to the inquiry as I understood it. Would you reflect when you see the full report?

Madam Speaker: I think that I have gone far enough on this matter. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will read his question and will look at my answer. The question is concerned with legal proceedings; it is not concerned with inquiries.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Can you do something to protect the business of the House? We had questions today to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. My right hon. and hon. Friends will be aware that we made much progress through to Question 18 because, of the first six Labour Members with questions on the Order Paper, only one turned up for Question Time. Of the first six, only one turned up, although the seventh was present.

Can you advise the House whether you were paid the courtesy of being informed that notice of those absences had been given? Is there some way in which hon. Members can raise important subjects such as the Agricultural Wages Board, the Potato Marketing Board and the distribution of surplus food to poorer people when hon. Members do not turn up for their questions?

Madam Speaker: As the House is aware, I am quite anxious to get speedily through the Order Paper, but not as a result of absenteeism. Of course there are occasions when I am given notice of absence from the Chamber and that was the case today in relation to one question where notice was given well in advance, and in relation to a couple of others when it was given rather late in the day. It is a discourtesy to the House for hon. Members to table questions and then not to be present without giving notice to the Chair and to the Minister who is to answer them.

BALLOT FOR NOTICES OF MOTIONS FOR MONDAY 17 MAY

Members successful in the ballot were:

Mr. Simon Coombs
Mr. Archy Kirkwood
Mr. John Austin-Walker.

Bosnia

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. MacKay.]

[Relevant document: the unnumbered Explanatory Memorandum submitted by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on 23rd April 1993, relating to sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro.]

Madam Speaker: Today's debate is on Bosnia. I remind the House that, because of the great interest in this subject, I will have to limit hon. Members to 10-minute speeches between 7 pm and 9 pm. I hope that hon. Members who speak outside that period will help the House and limit the length of their speeches.

May I make a point about the digital clocks which cannot be restarted without an engineer entering the Chamber? However, I think that we can manage without them, and I draw the attention of hon. Members to the clocks that are operating in the Chamber.

4.23 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Douglas Hurd): It is right that the House should return again to the tragedy of Bosnia. I am sorry that, because of the state visit, I cannot stay until the end of the debate. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence will reply to the debate and of course the views of the House must weigh heavily with us as we continue to consult our allies.

Before I come to the policy issues, I should like to give the House a short update on developments on the ground since I made my statement in the House last week. At that time, 19 April, our concern was focused on the outrageous Serb attacks on the Muslim enclave of Srebrenica. Thanks to the courage and determination of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees staff and the United Nations protection forces, particularly the 200 Canadians now in the town, the situation there has become somewhat better. A ceasefire is holding, although it is fragile. More than 700 wounded have been evacuated by air and food convoys are getting through.

The House may know that on Tuesday an Overseas Development Administration British aid civilian driver, Jerry Swallow, leading an aid convoy in northern Bosnia, suffered serious shrapnel wounds when the convoy was attacked by mortar bombs. He has been treated in a Canadian field hospital in central Bosnia, where his condition, after an operation, is much improved. He has our sympathy. He was wounded in a good cause.

Since last week's statement we have seen further attacks launched by Serb forces near the UN headquarters at Kiseljak and around Bihac in the north-west. The swirl of violence is sometimes hard for us to piece together. The Serbs clearly bear the greatest share of the blame for starting the war and for the atrocities that it has produced, but they are not uniquely guilty. The recent carnage in central Bosnia committed by the Croats and occasional evidence of Muslim atrocities against both Serbs and Croats vividly illustrate that no side has the monopoly on evil.

This is not a war with saints or heroes. We all share the revulsion forcibly expressed about Croat atrocities by Colonel Stewart of the Cheshires. He was right to be angry and the dedication and commitment of Colonel Stewart and his men deserve our highest praise.

Our armed forces and British civilians, of whom I have just given an example, continue to play a leading part both in bringing relief from the suffering in Bosnia and in enforcing the arms embargo and the sanctions. Since November, our troops have escorted more than 500 convoys carrying nearly 35,000 tonnes of aid. In 460 flights to Sarajevo the RAF has carried more than 6,000 tonnes. We have contributed over £92 million to the international relief agencies directly and through the European Community. This British effort has helped to keep alive hundreds of thousands who might otherwise have perished this winter from cold and hunger. We must sustain the effort for as long as the need is so great and for as long as the situation on the ground allows.

We are all conscious of the moral and public pressures on the international community to do more, to intervene more actively to stop the carnage. Those pressures are sincere and must be taken seriously. However, we also have to remember the nature of this problem. We are witnessing a civil war in Bosnia which is encouraged and overwhelmingly fuelled by Belgrade. We should not pretend that, from outside, we can ensure a solution. Even a prolonged military commitment by the interational community could not guarantee that. It would convert Bosnia into a protectorate for an indefinite period without a certain outcome. In practice, no Government—I am not speaking about columnists—are seriously suggesting that.

As the House knows, our troops are in Bosnia for a humanitarian purpose and we do not intent to convert them into an army of occupation or an army fighting to impose a particular solution on the problem by force.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Does my right hon. Friend agree, as he has in the past in the House, that if a peace settlement is agreed it will have to be internationally guaranteed, with all the consequences of that guarantee?

Mr. Hurd: That is quite a different proposition. Work is going on in NATO and elsewhere on how, if there were a credible and durable agreement, the Atlantic alliance under the authority of the United Nations might help to keep it that way. I am sorry to say that, as my hon. Friend knows, that prospect has receded quite substantially in the past few weeks. It may return, and I shall come to that matter later in my speech, because in the end the only durable answer is a negotiated political solution. That solution will have to provide ways in which the three communities in Bosnia can live and work together, if not in friendship, at least not in war.

If we accept, as I have argued, that military intervention on the ground is not an option, we are faced with a choice of lesser options to achieve that objective. None of them can be guaranteed to be wholly effective. All have drawbacks, some more serious than others. We must keep in mind our overall objectives—to provide a framework for a political solution, to press the Serbs, in Bosnia and in Serbia, to abandon the pursuit of their aims by the use of force, to relieve humanitarian suffering and to prevent the fighting from spreading—for example, to Croatia, Kosovo, Macedonia or, indeed, beyond.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Hurd: I hope that hon. Members will allow me to make progress with my speech.

To be sustainable, peace must be based on a settlement agreed by all parties. The fighting cannot by itself resolve the fundamental problems in Bosnia, any more than fighting solved, or could solve, the dispute between Israel and the Arabs. A peace process is essential in Bosnia, as it is in the middle east, and of course a successful peace process involves difficult compromises.

Gains, to be permanent and worth while, must be accepted by others. Military conquest in Bosnia cannot achieve gains which are accepted. It is not enough to fly flags over ruined towns and villages. Worthwhile gains are not to be secured by making a desert and calling it peace. There is no future for Bosnian Serbs down that path, if they look beyond the coming days and weeks. The only alternative to a real negotiated settlement is indefinite fighting and suffering.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): In regard to United Nations resolution 828, what progress has been made in setting up an international war crimes tribunal? Does the right hon. Gentleman believe that a genuine threat of being arraigned in front of such a court might act as a deterrent to those who sanction acts of barbarity against the poor people of Bosnia and elsewhere?

Mr. Hurd: It might. I do not deceive myself that it is a certain remedy. The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is that the Security Council passed a resolution asking the Secretary-General of the United Nations to draw up a scheme for precisely such a tribunal. Everybody knows that it is not easy. It has consumed years of work by lawyers in the United Nations, and the outcome is not yet clear, but the Secretary-General has been asked to do that and we shall help to forward that work as best we can.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South) rose——

Mr. Hurd: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, but then I must make progress with my remarks.

Mr. Mullin: The right hon. Gentleman said that it must be made clear to the Serbs that aggression does not pay. It is clear, is it not, that aggression for the Serbs unhappily has paid? The only time that it will not pay is when they realise that the UN is serious and is prepared to back up threats with credible force. Is it not an unhappy fact of life that only a credible military force—on the ground, not bombing—will make any difference? Are we not deluding ourselves if we talk of any other alternative?

Mr. Hurd: I shall be coming to that issue. The hon. Gentleman's premise is wrong, as he will see if he considers the matter in detail. One does not secure anything seriously—for our children or ourselves—by raising flags over ruined towns and villages. There is nothing secure about that. It is a temporary gain, but it must be accepted if it is to result in any real benefit. That is the point I am making and why we have given our full support to the efforts of Lord Owen and Mr. Vance.

Two sides in the conflict—the Muslims and the Croats—have accepted the peace proposals. Lord Owen has been tireless in his efforts to bring the Bosnian Serbs around, exploring every possibility for compromise. So far, they remain intransigent. The plan remains on the table. It incorporates a number of guarantees to take account of Bosnian Serb concern to ensure that key decisions in Bosnia cannot be taken without the consent of the Bosnian Serbs and that they have unimpeded access, monitored by an international authority, between their provinces.

The political process is not dead and sooner or later, for the reasons I have put before the House, the parties must, and will, come back to it. The Vance-Owen peace plan is not a sacred text. Adjustment to it is perfectly possible. The political process is essential because it is the only realistic way forward for Bosnia, and the choice facing not just the Serbs but others is how long it takes to realise that and for how long the fighting and suffering must go on.

I come to the means of pressure, because persuasion has to be backed by pressure. The main, agreed, instrument of pressure on the Serbs has been, and remains, sanctions. I do not claim, and the House would not accept it if I tried to, that sanctions alone can guarantee success. I do not wish to follow the example of those who, in the past, have given a time scale for the effectiveness of sanctions. However, if carried out in a rigorous and determined manner, they can make an important difference. Combined with economic mismanagement, they are already having a harsh effect on the economy of Serbia and Montenegro. Monthly inflation in March was 225 per cent. Industrial production is half the level of 1990, more than 70 per cent. of the work force is idle and shortages are becoming the norm.

There are signs—I put it no more strongly than that—that under the pressure the leaders in Belgrade are becoming increasingly impatient with the Bosnian Serbs, whose territorial ambitions threaten to involve the whole Serbian nation in virtual isolation from the rest of the world. Those signs are insufficient. The Government in Belgrade can do more. We believe that they can exercise decisive influence on the Bosnian Serbs by cutting off economic and military support.

On Monday this week, a letter from Mr. Milosevic and three Serbian presidents to the Bosnian Serb assembly urged full acceptance of the Vance-Owen plan. It came days after the television station that carried the letter urging acceptance had been demonising Lord Owen. Public opinion is split and confused in Belgrade. We have to increase the pressure on the Bosnian Serbs and on Belgrade. That is why on midnight last Monday, a tighter and more powerful regime of sanctions was applied to Serbia and Montenegro. I am referring to Security Council resolution 820, through which we aim effectively to close Serbia's border. We are pressing forward with efforts to ensure that the provisions are translated into a blockade.

Sir David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): Is the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary able to confirm the reports that some of the shelling of Srebrenica took place from Serbia? If that is so, does it not make nonsense of written appeals to the Bosnian assembly and cast doubt on the use of the phrase "civil war"?

Mr. Hurd: It is a civil war in the sense that the huge majority—more than 90 per cent.—of those fighting are Bosnian. They are Bosnian Serbs, Bosnian Croats and Bosnian Muslims. What the right hon. Gentleman says may be true. Certainly, there are supplies and encouragement from Serbia. That is why the pressures which I am describing are directed overwhelmingly against the Serbs as well as the Bosnians.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Iain Duncan-Smith (Chingford): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hurd: I do not want to take up the whole afternoon. I will give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith) and then I must get on.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: In line with what my right hon. Friend has said, so that there is no confusion, will he confirm that, in the past 15 months, Croatia has taken shipments of some $320 million-worth of imported arms of all kinds, from aircraft through to powerful tanks, so the whole area is awash with arms? It is not just the Serbians who are involved in the matter.

Mr. Hurd: I cannot confirm my hon. Friend's figures. I shall come to the arms embargo and I hope that my hon. Friend will agree with me from his analysis.

I wish to deal briefly with the four main areas of sanctions. It is important that the House should understand what we are trying to do. On the Adriatic sea, since Tuesday we have new powers to prohibit all commercial and maritime traffic from entering Montenegran territorial waters unless specifically authorised. HMS Cardiff has been in the Adriatic with other ships for some time. The North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and Western European Union forces in the area should be able to stop illegal passage by sea.

In the Danube, it is much more difficult. There are plans to deploy a WEU monitoring flotilla. We support that and are considering what we can do to help. The British are already providing a communications system between the states on the river, which is crucial for this purpose. We are anxious that the operation should begin as soon as possible.

The land borders are almost equally difficult. All freight and rail border crossing points should now be closed, with limited and specific exceptions. People are able to move from one country to another, but goods cannot, except for food and medicines.

We have to find the best ways of monitoring the new sanctions. We have sanctions assistance missions in all the countries concerned and they are being reinforced. We are considering with the United States and our EC partners how those numbers can be doubled, and we are tripling our own contribution of customs officers.

Finally, on financial sanctions, Lord Owen believes—and I think that there is evidence for this—that these are the most crucial of all. The financing of trade is just as important as its physical passage.

Since Tuesday, the obligations on Governments worldwide to enforce financial sanctions against Belgrade have been tightened even further. Funds outside the former Yugoslavia cannot be used for the benefit of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia or of any commercial, industrial or public bodies in Serbia and Montenegro. We now have the power to freeze the flow of any Serb assets of even indirect benefit to Serbia.

There have been some real and publicised problems in Nicosia, Cyprus over the enforcement of financial sanctions. The Government of Cyprus have now announced certain measures to help bring them into the mainstream of enforcement. Those measures are welcome, but there is still some way to go.

I have proposed that, because of all the institutions involved in the effort under Security Council resolution 820, the Secretary-General should appoint a sanctions co-ordinator—a senior figure who would identify loopholes, have the authority to knock on the doors concerned to ensure that the loopholes are quickly blocked and, where necessary, knock heads together.

I have gone through the measures because on paper, and now in international law, they are formidable. They will not halt the conflict overnight, but they pin down the Serbs and they limit their options. I hope that the message is clear that the Serb leadership has to exercise decisive influence on the Bosnian Serbs by political means, but principally by cutting off military and economic support to them.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): Presumably the sanctions will also apply to Kosovo. In those circumstances, what is the point of the sanctions? Might they not be counter-productive all over Serbia and Montenegro?

Mr. Hurd: The sanctions have to apply to Kosovo because, under international law, Kosovo is part of Serbia. The point of sanctions is to intensify the pressure on the Serb leadership to induce it to exercise pressures which could be decisive on the Bosnian Serbs who, although they do not bear the entire responsibility, bear the main responsibility for prolonging the conflict.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth) Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hurd: No, I must get on.

I now turn to other options. None of us can refuse to look at other ideas for a way forward. The suffering is great, the prospects for further atrocities are bleak and the glimmers of hope are too dim for us not to examine and re-examine all choices.

Solidarity among like-minded nations is essential. The European Community has worked together, with difficulty, but knowing that one policy is better than 12 and carries more weight than 12. NATO is now involved in different respects, on the Adriatic, as I have mentioned, providing elements of control and command for UNPROFOR. The NATO 16 are working closely and well. The WEU and the CSCE are involved and the Security Council has stuck together.

Work on other options is going on in all the major capitals. Wide discussions continue on three particular policy options in addition to the sanctions choice which has been made. It is now a matter of putting it into effect. Our common aim is to stop the fighting and bring the parties back to the conference table.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): I do not know whether the Foreign Secretary is coming to this point, but if so, perhaps he will allow me to anticipate it. Has he made it crystal clear to the American Administration that if arms are supplied and poured into the civil war, or if bombing is carried out by the United States, that will put at risk more lives and the humanitarian effort and will lead us into a far worse crisis? Has he made that clear to the Americans?

Mr. Hurd: The right hon. Gentleman has mentioned two of the three options with which I am about to deal, and I shall come to his point soon.

The first option, which the right hon. Gentleman did not specifically mention, is safe areas. We have already welcomed the UNHCR proposal for safe areas in Zepa and Gorazde to allow the United Nations humanitarian agencies and the Red Cross to operate there. We supported similar United Nations ideas on those lines last July.

An international presence can have a calming effect, as we have seen in central Bosnia, and is invaluable to ensure access by relief convoys. However, there is a limit on what can be negotiated. We are discussing the option of safe havens by negotiation and the number of forces available and we do not believe that United Nations forces could or should fight their way into designated areas, or become combatants on behalf of the Muslim or any other community.

The House will know that in Srebrenica the Canadians have been living through some difficult moments. At one stage last week they felt that they were in acute danger. We have made it clear that it would be inconceivable for us to fail to support them from the air if the need arose.

We have always emphasised the right and determination to use force in self-defence if necessary. Thankfully, the situation in Srebenica is quieter than it was, but that may not last for ever.

Ms Kate Hoey (Vauxhall): Will the Foreign Secretary give way?

Mr. Hurd: No, I shall not give way again, as I have some ground yet to cover and many hon. Members wish to speak.

The second option was mentioned by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn)—lifting the arms embargo. The House knows our deep reservations about that. We believe that we should be in the business of trying to stop the war and not equipping the parties to fight it out. The idea is understandably presented as giving the Muslims a chance to defend themselves against the more heavily armed and better equipped Serbs. It is possible that in that way Muslims would get better access to weapons, but the impact on the military situation would be neither quick nor decisive. The Serbs, and possibly the Croats, might decide to attack before the Muslims became too strong.

Far from tilting the balance towards the Bosnian Muslims, lifting the embargo could lead to an increase in the supply of weapons to the Serbs and the Croats. Violence could escalate and the humanitarian relief operations would become increasingly difficult and dangerous. If that were to happen, far from ending the suffering, that course would aggravate it. It could, more than any option seriously being considered, threaten an extension of the conflict into other parts of the former Yugoslavia or beyond. As arms flow into the area, the fighting could overflow out of it.

The third option is that of limited air strikes as a further means of pressure on the Serbs to accept the Vance-Owen plan and as a response to military attacks. That might work as a threat to deter the Bosnian Serbs from further attacks, atrocities and offensive strategies. If it were defied, actual strikes could prevent them from following those strategies. However, there are risks and uncertainties attached to any such action and they need to be thought through with the greatest of care, not just here but in consultation with our allies, before decisions can be reached. In particular, as the right hon. Member for Chesterfield pointed out, the implications for the forces of the United Nations, for our own forces, for humanitarian agencies and for the drivers and civilians carrying supplies through day after day have to be weighed carefully.

We could not agree to action which would put British forces at serious risk. That was put succinctly, as the House will have read, by the chairman of NATO's military committee, Sir Richard Vincent:

"Decide what you're trying to achieve before you go out".

That is very true. In testimony before the Senate this week, my colleague Warren Christopher, the American Secretary of State, made it clear that air power should be used in Bosnia only after strict criteria had been met.

Those criteria included the assurance that the goal of strikes was clear and understandable to the American people, and that there was what he called an "exit strategy" to avoid becoming involved in a Balkan war. In Washington, on the same day, the vice-chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff said:

"you cannot allow somebody to go forward and assume you are going to get in and out with a quickie operation."

Those are all wise comments.

The situation essentially is similar to that when I reported to the House last week. Those options and others are being considered. We must seek to stick together as we consider those options. We must not allow the Atlantic alliance to fracture on this issue. We are not excluding options simply because they were considered earlier and not adopted. But we in Government, we in the House, owe our constituents, as we said in another context last week, our considered judgment. The worst of all worlds would be half-measures in Bosnia which salved consciences without saving lives.

There is a risk of overlooking the broader picture in that concentration on Bosnia. The break-up of the former Yugoslavia has left a rash of conflicts, not just one. I sometimes think of Bosnia as a fire which is blazing, but there are heaps of combustible material around which we must try to prevent from catching fire. That is why we must support what Lord Owen and Cyrus Vance, soon to be replaced by Mr. Stoltenberg, are doing to prevent the trouble spilling over into neighbouring regions, particularly Croatia, Kosovo and Macedonia.

In Croatia, there is particular concern that moves to announce the unification of the Krajina Serbs with the Bosnian Serbs could lead to a flare-up of the fighting there. Pressure is being brought to bear on both the Croatian Government and the Serbs to hold back from any new offensives and to enable the renewal of the mandate for the 15,000 UNPROFOR troops in Croatia. That is the first force, not the one in which the Cheshires are involved. The continued presence of the United Nations in Croatia is vital if the kind of cruel, bitter fighting which occurred at the end of 1991 in Croatia is to be avoided.

In Macedonia, the greatest risk comes from instability as a result of that country's relations with its neighbours, including Greece. We worked hard, and in the end successfully, to secure Macedonia's admission to the United Nations on terms acceptable also to Greece. Lord Owen and Mr. Vance are now charged with seeking to resolve the difference between those two countries which continue.

At the same time, 700 UNPROFOR troops from Scandinavia, together with monitors from the conference on security and co-operation in Europe and the EC monitoring mission, are active in Macedonia helping to build confidence. There is a case for strengthening that United Nations contingent.

In Kosovo, there remains a high risk that a particularly brutal incident of repression against the ethnic Albanian majority could spark an uprising which could in turn destabilise the region. Under international law, it is part of Serbia. No one questions that. A CSCE monitoring team is active in the province under the direction of the Swedish Prime Minister, the chairman of the CSCE. That mission, he told me this week, is being urgently reinforced; but, undoubtedly, the situation in Kosovo remains dangerous.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): Are not the points that the right hon. Gentleman has just made reasons for making it clear to the Serbs that they should stop their aggression now and that they will not get away with ethnic cleansing? If they are allowed to get away with it in Bosnia, will not the temptation be for the Serbs to try it again in Kosovo and Macedonia?

Mr. Hurd: I follow that thread of argument. I am all in favour of finding effective ways in which we can achieve a turnaround in Serb strategies. I have been running through the options and we shall listen to the right hon. Gentleman with great care. I have listed the disadvantages of options, as well as the way in which we are carrying through the option that has been agreed—sanctions. I repeat that we are not excluding further examination and the consultation will continue next week, but it would not be right to refrain, either in private consultations or in dealings with the House, from setting out the difficulties that we see.

Bosnia was once a peaceful, prosperous country, in which all ethnic groups mixed freely. I had a letter last week from a medical student who now lives and works in Birmingham but who escaped from Sarajevo last year and whose family is still there. She wrote:

"Until the war began, Sarajevo existed as a multicultural, pluralist and peace-loving society. No one cared about the ethnic origin of their neighbours, nor their own for that matter. And people there still live together, Muslims, Croats and Serbs (because Mr. Karadzic is not a leader of all Bosnian Serbs)."

From my slight knowledge of the former Yugoslavia, I do not believe that hatred and killing are inevitable, somehow irredeemably logged in the history books as something that has to happen. That is not the history of the former Yugoslavia. The killing and hatred will come to an end—perhaps not soon, but never too soon.

We are deeply moved and angered by what has been happening in Bosnia. Why? Because it is carried day by day and night by night in our newspapers and on our television. But Bosnia is not unique, and I end on this general thought. If one visits Japan, as I did recently, one finds that the people there are much more concerned about what is happening in Cambodia. In Moscow, people are at least equally concerned about the killings in Georgia and the conflict between Armenia and Azerbaijan. Africans are more conscious of the atrocious killings, on a much larger scale, which continue in Angola, Liberia, Rwanda and the Sudan.

All those, and others—I have given only a selection—are wars inside countries in which thousands are being killed and standards of decent behaviour are wholly disregarded. That is why I have always disliked as pretentious the phrase "a new world order". We are wrestling, in fact, continent by continent with ancient disorders fanned into a new blaze by factions and extreme nationalism. It has been so through the centuries. What is new is our awareness of it.

We should not resent the fact that the media bring some, but of course only some, of those horrors into our homes. It is difficult for the television or even the press to convey the complexity of conflict, the spread of guilt, or the difficulty of arriving at the truth which characterises, in particular, a civil war. Nevertheless, they are right to anger and horrify us.

Anger and horror are not enough as a basis for decisions. It is a British interest to make a reasoned contribution towards a more orderly and decent world. But it is not a British interest, and it would only be a pretence, to suppose that we can intervene and sort out every tragedy which captures people's attention and sympathy. I have never found the phrase "something must be done" to be a phrase which carries any conviction in places such as the House or the Government where people have to take decisions. Governments and Parliaments have to weigh and judge. Bosnia is not the same as Kuwait or the Falklands, in history or terrain or calculation of risk.

Decisions cannot be based either on false analogies or on a desire to achieve better headlines tomorrow than today. That is particularly true when those decisions affect human life, and more especially still when the lives are those of British service men or civilians. The instinct to do better, to work harder, to look again at options, even those previously rejected, is a sound one, which we are following. But the decisions that follow must be based on judgment as well as instinct if they are to match the need. We shall continue, with our friends and allies, to apply that judgment.

4.58 pm

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): It was right for the Government to provide time for a debate on Bosnia today and we welcome the decision of the Leader of the House to respond to the request made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition for such a debate.

There are deeply held and genuine differences of opinion on both sides of the House on this nexus of complex problems in the former Yugoslavia.

I make no criticism of those hon. Members who take a different view from the one that I take; nor are there certainties in any of the options that we are considering. I believe, however, that there have been some disasterous miscalculations in the past with diplomatic efforts, particularly in the European Community, over the former Yugoslavia, and that the credibility of the Community has been damaged as a result. We now face circumstances where the credibility of the United Nations itself is being questioned, not just by hon. Members and not just by people in the West as a whole but by many people in Muslim countries, and people in Muslim Governments too.

I want to begin, therefore, by making it clear to everyone that any action that Opposition Members would support, any new departure that we would endorse, would have to be firmly authorised under the provisions of chapter 7 of the United Nations charter, specifically article 39, which says:

"The Security Council shall determine the existence of any threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression and shall make recommendations, or decide what measures shall be taken in accordance with Articles 41 and 42, to maintain or restore international peace and security."

I do not believe that we should depart from those provisions.

It is to the decisions of the United Nations that I first want to turn. There is an arms embargo under resolution 713 of September 1991. The United Nations protection force was established by resolution 743 in February 1992. Mandatory sanctions were established under a resolution of the Security Council in May 1992, and the UNPROFOR mandate in Bosnia is under those provisions of chapter 7 of the United Nations charter. I begin with those facts to answer those who say that nothing has been done and to point out that a great deal has already been done to try to deal with the appalling situation in Bosnia.

Who does not share the anger and the anguish of people in Britain and elsewhere about the agonies of the Bosnian people? We all share the anger and anguish, but we should not allow anger to dictate the difficult political decisions that we must make in trying to deal with the circumstances.

I want to echo the point made by the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs about British personnel currently in the former Yugoslavia, all of whom, military and civilian, are playing an effective and brave role in appallingly difficult circumstances. They have earned our lasting admiration and they enjoy our complete support in the tasks that they are trying to carry out.

We gave our support to the London peace conference which eventually produced the Owen-Vance plan. I want to compliment Lord Owen—not always my favourite person—on his outstanding attempts to secure a peace settlement in Bosnia. The peace plan unveiled in Geneva in January 1993 has now been signed by the Croatians and the Bosnian Government but not by the Serbs. Surely the principal political objective of any action we seek to take must be to secure Serbian signatures to that peace plan? We must spell out political aims and objectives before we can begin to contemplate whether any kind of military intervention is appropriate or likely to be effective.

I do not, however, understand why there is such a drawn-out, continuing delay in reaching conclusions. The tragedy is that, in spite of the mandatory resolutions on sanctions of, in some cases, a year ago, no serious effort has been made by the international community to implement them effectively. That is the truth. It is clear that members of the European Community as well as members of the United Nations, including in some respects members of the Security Council itself, have allowed their own economies and their own people to turn a completely blind eye to the mandatory resolutions of the Security Council.

So while we warmly welcome something that we have called for since the summer of last year, namely a complete economic blockade of Serbia—I first called for it on 4 August last year, and I remember the date well because it was my birthday—we regret that it has taken the international community until now to accept that the existing resolutions were being flouted and that they were in no way preventing the Bosnian Serbs from continuing their military aggression in Bosnia. The decision, therefore, is welcome, if somewhat belated.

I recognise too that questions remain about the peace plan that the sanctions are intended to buttress, but Lord Owen has made it perfectly clear that it is open to amendment if only agreement to it can be reached.

Other decisions by the United Nations have been taken in support of securing peace in Bosnia: on human rights, particularly with reference to crimes of violence against women, under resolution 808 of February this year, and on the establishment of an international war crimes tribunal. As, in an incremental way, the international community has sought to bring about a resolution of the problem, we have gone along with those decisions, hoping that eventually they would become effective in a cumulative way, but we must face the reality that they have not done so. Economic sanctions, the arms embargo, the humanitarian aid programme which has been so worth while, the no-fly zone, the resolutions on crimes of violence and on the war crimes tribunal have not stopped the Serbs. They have not stopped Serbian aggression which, regrettably, continues even today.

The Serbs are the principal aggressors although it does not help the case or the credibility of other political leaders in Bosnia—Croatian or Muslim—when the Croatians launch attacks on the Muslims or the Muslims launch attacks on the Croatians. The reality is that among the political leaders as well as among the military leaders in Bosnia there are no innocents. They all bear a grave responsibility for continuing the slaughter in the way they do.

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Dr. Cunningham: In a moment.

The innocents are women and children, elderly people, civilians and non-combatants, the hapless victims of the civil strife that their political and military leaders continue to inflict on them. Surely it is they who should be uppermost in our thoughts. The best way to help them must surely be, in turn, to secure as quickly as possible a peace; an end to fighting; an end to the conflict in Bosnia.

Mr. Marshall: May I first of all apologise to my right hon. Friend for failing to note his recent promotion?

While I do not disagree with a good deal of what he has said, when he uses the term "Muslim" he uses it in the sense of the Bosnian Government, the legitimate Bosnian Government. Although it is true that atrocities may have been committed by that Government, does he not accept the basic fact that, when the Bosnian Government attack the Croatian nationalists in Bosnia or the Bosnian Serbs in Bosnia, they are carrying out the legitimate right and programme of any legitimate Government?

Dr. Cunningham: I accept that civil war is going on in Bosnia, and I also accept that Serbian aggression is taking place.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Cunningham: I am in the middle of replying to one intervention; I can hardly deal with another at the same time.

[Dr. Cunningham]

The point that I was making is that political leaders on all sides of the conflict are willing to continue to wage war. I do not believe that, in those circumstances, there are any innocents.

Lady Olga Maitland: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cormack: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Cunningham: I will not give way yet. I am dealing with the point put to me by my hon. Friend the Minister for Leicester South (Mr. Marshall).

Let me refer my hon. Friend to a passage that I came across by accident. It is very relevant to the aggressive nationalism that is now so rampant. In one of his essays, George Orwell wrote:

"Actions are held to be good or bad, not on their own merits but according to who does them, and there is almost no kind of outrage—torture, the use of hostages, forced labour, mass deportations, imprisonment . . . forgery, assassination, the bombing of civilians—which does not change its moral colour when it is committed by 'our' side."

I am afraid that too many such views prevail now among political leaders in Bosnia.

Mr. Cormack: This morning, the right hon. Gentleman was kind enough to receive the Foreign Minister of Bosnia. We recognise the Bosnian Government—a multi-ethnic Government including Serbs, Croats and Muslims; but they have been virtually disarmed while seeking to repel people who are guilty of the most appalling atrocities. Can the right hon. Gentlemen deny for a moment that the overwhelming majority of those atrocities have indeed been committed by the Serbs?

Dr. Cunningham: I have already dealt with that point at least twice. I shall say more about my meeting with Dr. Silajdzic in a moment.

There are arguments for further action in the circumstances that I have described: action to secure peace, to end ethnic cleansing, to stop the killing and brutality, to prevent the destabilisation of the region—to which the Foreign Secretary rightly referred—and to avoid a spread of Serbian aggression into Kosovo or perhaps Macedonia, destabiilising Greece and, possibly, Turkey, Albania, Romania and Bulgaria. The need to uphold the authority of the international community and the decisions of the United Nations is another reason for contemplating further action, different from any that has been taken hitherto.

There is a good deal of evidence to suggest that, if we are to secure compliance with the decisions of the United Nations, we need to do more to deal with Serbian aggression than we have done so far. I am not sure that the necessary international political will exists to support the economic blockade that the United Nations is imposing. It is a sad irony that Cyprus—itself the subject of ethnic cleansing nearly 20 years ago—is now a base for money laundering to support that atrocious act in the former Yugoslavia. There is plenty of evidence that some countries are not ensuring that, for instance, money laundering and the trade in arms and important supplies are stopped.

I do not believe that we can simply stand by and let the present position regarding the peace plan drag on indefinitely. When I met Dr. Silajdzic this morning—I had already had a discussion with him some weeks ago—he made it clear that he did not want military intervention by ground troops in Bosnia; what he did want were air strikes and an end to the arms embargo.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): That may well be true from the point of view of the Bosnian Government, but my right hon. Friend should bear in mind the fact that air strikes without the withdrawal of British troops on the ground would simply put at risk many of my constituents, and those of other Cheshire Members.

Dr. Cunningham: I am coming to that. I am now explaining what Dr. Silajdzic asked me to support on behalf of the Labour party.

I recognise that none of these proposals is without risk: anyone who did not recognise that would be deluding himself. I cannot accept, however, that ending the arms embargo, abrogating the mandatory resolution of the UN Security Council—either by taking unilateral action, or by seeking to change it—and allowing additional arms to pour into Bosnia would do anything to bring about an early peace settlement. I do not believe that it would do other than extend and exacerbate war and conflict. Certainly, it would almost completely end any hope of maintaining an aid programme. The idea that it is the moral imperative of the west to arm the combatants and stand by while they go on slaughtering each other in ever greater numbers does not appeal to me at all.

Nor do I accept the argument put to me by Dr. Silajdzic and others that we have a moral duty to intervene in Bosnia. No one talks about our moral duty to intervene in Angola, where nearly three times as many people have been killed in a bloody civil war. No one says that we have a moral imperative to intervene in Nagorno-Karabakh.

Lady Olga Maitland: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Cunningham: Not for the moment.

If the fragile circumstances brokered by the United Nations in Cambodia collapse and we see a return of the atrocities perpetrated by the Khmer Rouge, will we be obliged to intervene?

Ms Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): I do not think that anyone wants more arms to go to the region. Does not my right hon. Friend agree, however, that if there is no willingness to create safe havens and no willingness to stop the Serbs, the Bosnians are entitled to have arms to defend themselves? If we do not accept that, we are saying that we want the war to be ended by the defeat and slaughter of the Bosnian people. Arms are not the best option, but if we do nothing else, the Bosnians are entitled to defend themselves.

Dr. Cunningham: My hon. Friend is a little precipitate in suggesting that I am about to rule out all the other options, but I do not agree that ending the arms embargo would be sensible; nor do I think it likely that the UN Security Council will be persuaded to agree to such a course.

Lady Olga Maitland: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Cunningham: I am sorry; not for the moment.

There are other options. If, through agreement and negotiation, safe havens can be approved, of course they should be created. I do not believe, however, that we can establish such havens quickly or simply by taking military action and putting in combat troops. That is a fundamental difference between my view and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short).

Indeed, the whole argument that somehow—quickly and militarily—we could impose a peace in Bosnia is not borne out by any sensible, rational examination of the circumstances. It would take weeks, if not months, to assemble a force, set up the logistical support and create the necessary airfields, safe harbours and supply lines. In the meantime, surely the predictable response of the Serbians would be simply to turn up their own aggression to grab as much land as they possibly could.

My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) mentioned air strikes. I know that they, too, are not risk-free. My right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition spelt out our view, clearly and concisely, nearly two weeks ago. He rightly pointed out:

"In recent days the tragic civil war in the former Yugoslavia has produced ever more appalling examples of barbarity as innocent civilians are made the victims of indiscriminate and brutal attack.

The slaughter in . . . Srebrenica and the horrific and ruthless pursuit of the inhuman concept of . . . ethnic cleansing requires urgent re-examination of the policies adopted by the international community.

Last year the United Nations imposed mandatory sanctions against Serbia in an attempt to halt the persistent aggression on which it was engaged. Over the months . . . we"— meaning the Labour party—have consistently protested at the failure to make the economic and military sanctions effective. Long before now they should have been widened and intensified—and above all, enforced. The sad truth is that so far they have not been a sufficient or effective impediment to Serbian aggression."

My right hon. and learned Friend concluded—and I believe that he was right—that the "time is now overdue for the United Nations to insist that its mandatory sanctions must be imposed urgently and completely so that the pressure upon Serbia becomes intense. Had this been done earlier, as we have consistently advocated, perhaps we would have avoided reaching the edge of the present abyss.

However we are now in a situation which requires a more urgent response . . . it is now necessary for the United Nations to issue an ultimatum to Serbia—that unless a ceasefire is made effective, the United Nations will authorise air strikes against Serbian lines of communication in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Such action is of course punitive, but I believe we are now at a stage where it is necessary to stop the flow of material to the war zones and to make the Serbs realise that the international community is capable of effective action in the course of implementing a resolve to bring the slaughter to an early end."

Mrs. Dunwoody rose——

Dr. Cunningham: I shall come to the point of the intervention made by my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) in a moment.

My right hon. and learned Friend continued:

"Thereafter there must be continuous pressure to reach a political settlement which is the only way in which some sense of peace and order can be restored."

The whole purpose of an ultimatum is not only to give time for compliance but to give time for our own troops on the ground and the troops of other countries involved in the United Nations protection force effort there to regroup and, if necessary, withdraw. That is the reality of the situation. It will take some time, which is why it would be foolish in the extreme to say that we should simply launch air strikes immediately.

Air strikes have some advantages as well as some disadvantages. They can be far more readily controlled, politically as well as militarily, than involvement by ground forces in a combat role. They could be brought to an end and the situation reassessed after air strikes had taken place if the Serbians did not accept the ultimatum. However, none of my colleagues has ever suggested that there are any risk-free options in any of the propositions that we are discussing in connection with this war.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Does not the ultimatum proposed by the Leader of the Opposition have a fatal deficiency—that the sanction that would ultimately have to be invoked would be air operations? By giving notice of them, would not the likely targets be dispersed and the effectiveness of the air operations minimised? In the meantime, the aid work, which has been so effectively pursued by the United Nations humanitarian agencies and our own forces, would be fatally compromised.

Dr. Cunningham: If the purport of the hon. Gentleman's intervention is that risks would flow from taking the type of military action that I am describing, that is undeniable. He has to set beside that the risks and results of doing nothing further at all, of inaction. I have been making clear—as I believe the Foreign Secretary also made clear because it is a point of agreement between us—that those risks go way beyond the borders of Bosnia. They may not only be translated into action by the Serbs in Kosovo or Macedonia, but other people threatening ethnic or religious minorities in other eastern countries and other parts of Asia may conclude from the Serbian aggression that they, too, will be able to treat their minorities in the way that the Serbs are treating minorities or, in this case, the majority, in Bosnia.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): I have been listening carefully to what the right hon. Gentleman said about the risks of doing nothing. Has he noticed that the loudest voices from Labour Back Benchers urging military action are the same voices that were urging that we should do nothing in the Gulf? Does he believe that the hon. Members who have taken that line have now been converted to military action, or is it just that they oppose Government policy, whatever it is?

Dr. Cunningham: Fortunately, the hon. Lady is not eligible but, if she had been able to attend the parliamentary Labour party's debate last week or the discussion of its foreign affairs group, she would have discovered that there are some very unusual alliances in the Labour party on both sides of the argument. As I said at the outset, there are deeply held and genuine differences of opinion about what constitutes the proper course of action in these matters. I do not criticise my hon. Friends for taking a different view from mine but I am expressing the view of my right hon. and learned Friend, endorsed at the meetings that I have described.

Mr. Hardy: Many of us would not shrink from military action in the cause of peace, but my right hon. Friend will know that a number of us have been seeking to make modest contributions of a political nature. Is he aware that, in December last year, at the latest assembly of the Western European Union, which is heavily involved in the monitoring of sanctions, the then chairman of the Council of Ministers, an Italian, enthusiastically embraced the call that any European member state of the Council of Europe, WEU or any other European forum, or any aspiring member state—which may be more relevant—which was involved by negligence or design in the breach of sanctions should forfeit its right of membership of those forums?

The Italian Minister enthusiastically supported that call, then confirmed that WEU Governments had plenty of information about the breach of sanctions but said that he would release that information so that political decisions could be taken. The sad part is that the right hon. Gentleman has gone along with the Italian Minister and left us with an inadequacy in that political approach.

Dr. Cunningham: My hon. Friend said "the right hon. Gentleman", but I am not sure whether he means me or the Foreign Secretary. I hope that he was not aiming that accusation at the Labour Front Bench, because it is from this position that the persistent calls for the effective implementation of sanctions and United Nations resolutions have been coming for almost a year. I understand from my hon. Friend's indication that he was referring to the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Dr. Cunningham: No, I must move on, if my hon. Friend will allow me.

Sooner or later—again, I believe that there is agreement between the Foreign Secretary and myself—there will have to be a political solution to the situation in Bosnia. Sooner or later people will have to accept that they cannot go on slaughtering each other but will have to come to terms with living together as neighbours, peacefully and in harmony or at least without resorting to the violence of the past few months.

We are clear that the political objectives—the peace plan, the ceasefire and the need to bring the combatants to their senses—can be supported only by military action which is endorsed by and has the support of the Security Council of the United Nations. We would not contemplate supporting unilateral action from whichever quarter it was suggested, but we believe that the Security Council should be meeting now to consider the proposal in the terms put forward by my right hon. and learned Friend.

5.29 pm

Sir Edward Heath (Old Bexley and Sidcup): All hon. Members in the House and everyone outside will agree with the Foreign Secretary's admirable words about the feelings of horror we all have about what is happening in the former Yugoslavia. Of course I share those feelings.

This afternoon at Question Time I asked the Prime Minister to give a clear undertaking that in no circumstances would British sea, land or air forces be used in the former Yugoslavia except for humanitarian purposes. I said that it was absolutely essential that such an undertaking be given because, until it is, every action taken by the Government is suspect and slowly dragging us into the civil war—[Interruption.] It is a civil war. Until we get such an undertaking, the Government's action will be suspect. An example of that is the presence of the Navy in the Adriatic. It has been said that the Navy is there to evacuate British forces. However, everyone suspects that it is there to join in military action if we agree to it.

All the time, we hear sources say that our presence in the Adriatic gives the impression that the Government are evasive or indecisive. Neither of those things is desirable. We must have a clear policy. If it comes to the question of air strikes, surely a decision can be made now—that is, that the humanitarian forces would immediately be endangered. We know full well that that is the case. Therefore, we should say decidely that we will not take part in or agree to any action in the air.

The right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham)—as I understood him, because so many of his arguments were contradictory—said, "Of course, we will not agree to the use of armed military force of any sort unless it is sanctioned by the United Nations." In other words, he accepts the use of armed force, provided the United Nations agrees to it. Is he urging the Government, sitting on the Security Council, to agree to proposals for armed force from other countries? If so, he completely denies all his arguments that the British forces will be damaged if air force is used.

Dr. Cunningham: I am sorry if I was as unclear as the right hon. Gentleman is suggesting, but I read carefully what my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) said. We believe that the Government should support in the Security Council the issuing of an ultimatum to the Serbians. If the ultimatum is not complied with, selected air strikes should follow. I have said that clearly, and it is what we are suggesting should be discussed in the Security Council. We are asking the Government to put that question forward for discussion.

Sir Edward Heath: The right hon. Gentleman is saying that he accepts the invasion of the former Yugoslavia to deal with the situation. I cannot accept that for one moment. If that is proposed in the United Nations, the British Government should veto it completely. We must not send forces to the former Yugoslavia for military purposes. What balance of advantage can there be if we must immediately withdraw some 2,630 personnel who have done such magnificent work in helping all those wretched people? They are the people who matter. I cannot understand how the right hon. Gentleman can stand up in the House and say, "Take action, even though it will mean that all the humanitarian action will stop." Nor is it in any way justified.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich): The right hon. Gentleman had a proud record in the past in opposing fascist agression at a time when other people were perhaps prepared to appease it. Does he recognise that this proposed course would essentially give the green light to continued Serbian aggression and remove any possibility of our having a sanction to stop the aggression which is causing the most terrible suffering in Bosnia?

Sir Edward Heath: I do not agree with that entirely. As the right hon. Member for Copeland said, we must weigh up the possibilities. It is no use saying that there are risks in whichever course we follow: we must weigh up the risks against the possibility of obtaining an advantage. In this case, the risks are much greater than any advantage that we could obtain. The countries around Yugoslavia have agreed that they will not become involved in this civil war. If they want further protection, it is up to us to arrange to help them with it. That is different from taking part in a civil war.

Let us consider history. Anthony Eden rightly kept us out of the Spanish civil war, which was in my time. I was against Franco: I was on the other side. I went to Spain during the civil war. It was absolutely right to keep British forces out of that civil war. If we had gone into it, it would have precipitated the second world war before we were prepared for it. That is a fact.

Harold Macmillan kept us out of Vietnam, despite all the pressure from American Presidents, and from the Australians and New Zealanders. He was absolutely right. Recently, Henry Kissinger said that it was easy to get into Vietnam but damned difficult to get out. That applies just as much to the situation in Bosnia.

Mr. Wilkinson: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, week after week and month after month, the United States air force and navy pounded away at the Ho Chi Minh trail, dropping tonnes of ordnance but in no way stopping the supply of armaments to the Vietcong and in no way preventing the Americans from being defeated in the war?

Sir Edward Heath: My hon. Friend is absolutely right —I had not quite got to that point.

Another example is what happened in the Lebanon. When the American forces were blown up, President Reagan immediately withdrew everything and nothing else has ever been done about the Lebanon.

What I find slightly unrealistic about much of the discussion relates to the United Nations. What is the United Nations? It is the five members of the Security Council. The right hon. Member for Copeland is surprised that other countries do not carry out actions to support the resolutions. Those countries do not take action because they take no part in the Security Council and are not interested, or they find that their own interests are affected to their disadvantage. There is no need to be surprised at that. The right hon. Gentleman said that the resolutions must be enforced, but how do we enforce them? How do we force other countries not to do deals under the counter? It is a practical matter which must be dealt with by the United Nations.

The United Nations always acts after the event. It has no means of pre-empting the dangers that the world faces today. It has no intelligence service of any sort and it does not know what is going to happen. It has no information service, no means of assessing risks in actions that can be taken and no military staff to advise the Secretary General. It has absolutely nothing. If it is to perform any worthwhile service in this new world, it must have all those things and be properly organised; otherwise, it is just a matter of a discussion in the Security Council and the pressure exerted by its individual members.

Mr. Cormack: I am sad to disagree with some of the things that my right hon. Friend is saying. He was rather against the United Nations having any involvement in the Gulf. As he tried to be influential against it, does he regret his position in speaking against that? Does he now see that an independently recognised sovereign state has been invaded and dismembered and its people butchered before our eyes?

Sir Edward Heath: I said that we should have pre-empted the Gulf war and recognised what was going on, which we did not. We still have not had an honest admission from Washington of what the American ambassador said to Saddam Hussein about the lack of any interest in Kuwait—and he should get on with it. It is a complicated situation, which I will not go into now. Once we got to the point of the war, I did not oppose it. However, if it had been handled effectively by Secretary of State Baker, as my remarks on television have recorded, the whole situation could have been entirely different. To come to the final point, Saddam Hussein and his regime are still there.

This has a lesson for us. We hear about war crimes. If people taking part in ghastly orgies are told that there will be a war crimes tribunal, they will say, "If I have had it, I might just as well go ahead." So that is what they do. That is the psychological impact of saying that war criminals will be tried. We are unrealistic in suggesting that war crimes trials are part of the answer. They are not.

It is all very well to talk about sanctions. It grieved me when my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said the other day that sanctions were a long-term business and that they would continue until the previous situation was restored. That is also entirely unrealistic. We shall never return to the previous situation in the former Yugoslavia. Therefore, we are committing ourselves to something which is impossible and from which later we shall have to withdraw. That is another aspect of the unrealism that is prevalent.

We have just heard again from the right hon. Member for Copeland about the peace plan. It is hopelessly irrelevant. It is out of date. It bears no relationship to the present circumstances in the former Yugoslavia. It is useless to continue saying that we have a peace plan and that we must put it into action. That gets us nowhere. There may still be negotiators for the peace plan.

Lady Olga Maitland: Surely the peace plan has validity in that it is a means of bringing people to a peace agreement. No one has ever said and no one says now —not even Lord Owen or Cyrus Vance—that the peace plan proposals would be the final version. The great thing is to get people to agree in principle. Surely it is worth it.

Sir Edward Heath: The peace plan is now so irrelevant that it is not fulfilling the purpose that my hon. Friend wants. If we tell the Serbs in Bosnia that they must give up what they have now, which is more than 70 per cent. of the territory, and return to 43 per cent., they will not say, "Thank you very much. We will now sit round and have a happy party about it." The peace plan is entirely irrelevant.

It is also important that Lord Owen should retire and that there should be a fresh negotiator.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: I hope that that is not an invitation.

Sir Edward Heath: He goes to the other place. I am sorry if that disturbs my hon. Friend. Before Lord Owen was appointed, he made it clear that he believed that military force was the only way of settling the crisis in Yugoslavia. When he took over he said that he wanted a peaceful agreement. On television last week he said that the only answer was force. It is not possible to conduct peace negotiations if one publicly announces that the answer must be force. One cannot be surprised if those whom one wants to take part in the peace negotiations say, "Thank you very much, but there is nothing doing."

We must have peace negotiators who are prepared to recognise the reality of life and negotiate. We must have negotiators whom all the parties who take part in the negotiations, however controversial and nasty, are prepared to accept as people who are trying to do a proper job of settling the problem. Lord Owen is no longer capable of doing it. The best thing that the Community can do is ask him politely to retire.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I agree with much of what my right hon. Friend is saying. However, he says that one must recognise the reality on the ground. Does that not encourage the Serbs and their allies to conquer more territory?

Sir Edward Heath: No one is going to stop them. That is where people are so unrealistic. The conflict is a civil war stemming from Yugoslav history going back centuries. It is seeking to wipe out all the changes and hatreds of all those years. Unless we recognise that as the basis of the conflict, we shall not reach any peaceful solution. One must realise that.

Ms Hoey: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North-West): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Edward Heath: No, I am sorry.

We then come to the European Community. The problem about the Community is that, again, it has no machinery to find out what will happen. I am sorry that my right hon. Friends who are now in power are opposed to the Community having the machinery to deal with foreign policy and defence. It is absolutely essential. Otherwise, there can be no Community action. We hear criticism not from sceptics, who approve of the European Community's stance, but from other people. They ask why the Community has not stepped in to deal with the conflict. It did not foresee it and it has no means of evaluating a policy on it or achieving any results.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: It is divided.

Sir Edward Heath: One has no means of knowing that it is divided, because it has not got together on the issue.

The Community requires the proper machinery to deal with problems such as the crisis in Yugoslavia. People ask what can be done. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary when he stands against the "something must be done" syndrome. That syndrome is affecting much of the behaviour in the House.

We see ghastly scenes on television and of course we are horrified. So are people outside. But the people of Britain do not want us to go to war. They do not want to see planes bringing back dead bodies as they see dead bodies on television in Yugoslavia. Of course people are opposed to that. I believe that the great majority in the House are also opposed to it.

Mr. Frank Field: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Ms Hoey: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Edward Heath: No, I will not give way.

We are told that we have the closest contact with our allies in Washington. The new President has no experience of international affairs. He has no military knowledge. His Cabinet is hopelessly divided on all these problems and incapable of reaching a decision about Yugoslavia or any other international matter. So why should we risk being pushed into military action by the President of the United States? In his younger years, before he became so important, he criticised what the Americans were doing in Vietnam.

Mr. Mullin: There is no comparison with Vietnam.

Sir Edward Heath: Yes, there is. There is a comparison between policies of putting forces into a country in which they cannot achieve their end. That applies just as much to Yugoslavia as it did to Vietnam.

Mr. Mullin: Half a million American troops were sent 10,000 miles to prop up a rotten regime which had no moral base whatever. There is no comparison between Vietnam and Bosnia.

Sir Edward Heath: With great respect, I will not argue about the nature of the regime.

How many troops would be required in Yugoslavia —150,000? And where would the troops come from if we decided to use force? We could not provide them. We are already over-extended. So which other countries will provide the forces to deal with the conflict?

We must not allow ourselves to be pressured by Washington. One of the American chiefs of staff said that air attacks ran no risk. That statement shows profound and overwhelming ignorance. There would be enormous risks to our people there, who are carrying out their task magnificently.

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, if bomb attacks were agreed, the logical conclusion would be to put in combat troops to safeguard the lives of humanitarian aid workers? The deployment of ground forces would follow from that. So one cannot divorce one argument from the other.

Sir Edward Heath: Of course that is true. A substantial number of ground forces would be required. The minimum estimate is 150,000. One must be realistic about that.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): For how long would they be needed?

Sir Edward Heath: For year after year. I wish to say a few words about what we can do. We have given a great deal of humanitarian aid. The amount of food and medicine available now will last only a short time. To supply people with food to the end of the year will cost £590 million. Only £16 million of that has been committed internationally so far. If the "something must be done" brigade want to get something done, let them start working on that. Let them acquire the supplies of food and medicine. We can provide the people because they are there already. We can provide the air transport. That is a practical measure which would help the wretched people in Yugoslavia.

I ask the House to be clear. There is no future in our putting in military forces to join in the civil war in Yugoslavia. On the other hand, there is an immense amount that we can do to help them if we put our minds to it.

5.49 pm

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): The House will have listened to the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) with interest. I am bound to say that he is, at least, consistent. The House will note that many of his comments and predictions are exactly the same as those that he made about the Gulf war. He was wrong then, and I fear that he is wrong now.

This is not an easy matter; it is a very difficult matter which requires careful judgment. None of us can be certain that any judgment that we make today will carry through in the heat of the events of a fast-changing situation. It is right that the House should debate it—many will find it remarkable that the House has not debated it before now except on a Supply day provided by my party.

The best that can be said about the tragedy in Bosnia is that it is a tragedy which arrived before Europe was ready to cope with it. The worst that can be said is that the consistent, year-long failure of judgment, leadership and action has led, as many of us predicted it would, inexorably to tragedy heaped on tragedy, to the humiliation of the United Nations and the weakening of its international standing, and to the humiliation of our own troops on the ground. It has led to the return of practices that we thought had been banished from the continent of Europe 50 years ago when the Nazis were defeated—except that the use of rape has now been added as an instrument of war—and to the ever-present and growing threat of a widening conflict with the incalculable consequences for the peace of the region and, in due course, the peace of Europe.

There was a failure of judgment from the start—that is without question—in the too-early recognition of Croatia, without ensuring that there were proper bulwarks in place for minority rights. There has also been a failure of judgment on our part because we began to see things in blacks and whites too early.

The Foreign Secretary and the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), who spoke for the Labour party, are absolutely right to say that nobody comes out of this with clean hands; there has been aggression on all sides—a powerful case can be made that the aggression in Bosnia-Herzegovina was started by the Muslims as much as by the Serbs—but there is no doubt whatsoever that the burden of aggression and the revolting overturning of the basic practices of human rights lies against the Serbs. And, whatever the history, it is with the current Serbian aggression that we must deal.

The failure to take action after the conflict started a year ago is greater than the failure of judgment which may have contributed to its beginning. We have acted throughout this crisis always too little and too late—always reacting to events, never shaping them; always allowing ourselves to be dragged in backwards, tiptoeing a step at a time into the mire of intervention in circumstances that we have never sought to control. Those are the circumstances we have currently arrived at, and the consequences of this failure are enormous.

A terrible price has been paid by the innocents on the ground for that failure. Every attempt at peace—from London through the Vance-Owen plan—has failed, because the Serbs, and now the Croats, have always understood that they had more to gain from aggression on the ground than from the negotiating table. The Prime Minister's own success at the London conference has, I regret to say, turned to dust, just as we warned him it would. Unless we were prepared to stop the aggression on the ground, there was no possibility that the Serbs—[HON. MEMBERS: "How?"] I shall come to that.

There was no possibility that the Serbs would seriously negotiate; they would not stick to anything they signed up to. No prediction is necessary because that is exactly what happened in Krajina of Croatia. Even if the Vance-Owen plan was to be put into practice—I share the view of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup on this and doubt that it will—the reality is that there is no prospect that the Serbs would then relinquish the territory that they had captured by blood around Srebenica, which is dedicated to the Muslims under the Vance-Owen plan, unless we are prepared to force them to do so.

We have but two options now open to us, because the other consequence of that failure is that all the best options have been lost to us. There is no risk-free option, there never has been. The risks of taking the actions that were open to us in August, September, October and November were less than the risks of the actions now open to us. There is no doubt whatsoever that further delay will mean greater risk of action, and that is the ineluctable conclusion to be reached as a result of what has happened.

It seems to me that there are only two options left; to act or to see the United Nations humiliated and forced to leave the area with its tail between its legs. David Owen has rightly said that this is a crucial moment because the Croats, having observed the Serbs indulging in aggression with impunity upon the territories held by the Muslim forces, now intend to join the feast and have started to do so.

If there is now a second front, as we see, opened up on this tragedy, the possibility of a situation which becomes totally unmanageable is much the greater. Unless we can stop it and stabilise the conflict now, we will have a situation where all the remaining power and authority of the United Nations will be incapable of making any major contribution.

In addition to that, the position of our own troops in Vitez will become increasingly precarious. We have to remember that every round of ammunition and ration pack for our troops must come across Croat territory. Their position will become increasingly hazardous if the Croatian/Muslim conflict is allowed to continue. The remaining Muslim state—a state recognised by the United Nations—will be annihilated, wiped out by aggression, and we will see a miserable and desperate end to this tragedy, which will undoubtedly result in the spread of this conflict to other areas.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ashdown: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman, but I must make it clear that I have quite a lot to say and because I do not wish to detain the House too long and allow time for other hon. Members to speak, I shall take three interventions only. [Interruption.] If hon. Members want me to take more interventions I will, but they are cutting into their own time. [Interruption.] I sense the mood of the House and if hon. Members want me to take more interventions, I shall do so happily.

I want to knock on the head the idea that has been perpetrated by the Foreign Secretary—and behind which he has taken cover to excuse matters, as have the Government, the right hon. Member for Copeland, and the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup the former Prime Minister—that this is a civil war. This is not a civil war. If it is, what on earth are we doing raising sanctions against Serbia and Belgrade? If it is a civil war, why is it that the Foreign Secretary admitted that gun sites in Serbia proper were used in the bombardment of Srebrenica, a clear act of aggression across a recognised United Nations border? If it is a civil war, what on earth are units of the Croatian standing army doing in Bosnia-Herzegovina involved in the attacks on the Muslims? It is as logical to claim that this is a civil war as to claim that the events in Sudentenland in the 1930s was a civil war.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: The right hon. Gentleman is good at outlining the problems and like all of us he wishes the authority of the United Nations to be maintained, but its authority has been desperately challenged in Nagorny Karabakh, where it has actually done nothing, it has been desperately challenged in Burma, where 5,000 people have been killed, and it has been desperately challenged in Liberia, where some of the atrocities are worse than the ones we are talking about. What is so unique about this one conflict, one of about 25 in our modern world?

Mr. Ashdown: The hon. Gentleman asks a perfectly fair question. Unless we are prepared to take a stand—and this happens to be Europe's problem and we have the capacity to take a stand on this—unless we are prepared to lay down standards here which might be applied later—the problems he talks about will not be controlled but will be multiplied out of number on Europe's own borders. Europe had better understand that this is not just the Muslims' problem but ours. Unless we are prepared to cope with it ourselves, more problems will arrive to threaten our peace.

There is no question but that the problem is Europe's failure. I am bound to say to the Prime Minister, who is not in his seat at present, that I think that it is a particular failure of Britain. We had the duty of leadership through our presidency, in the key months of the campaign. It was the Prime Minister's inability to realise that one must be able to reinforce on the ground what one seeks to achieve at the negotiating table that led to the failure of the London plan and, regrettably, the probable failure of the Vance-Owen plan. Once again, Europe is failing to tackle its own problem on its own doorstep, which leaves us today once again in the humiliating position of having to wait to see what the Americans will do so that we can, once again, hang on to their coat tails.

I noted Baroness Thatcher's criticisms of Europe. I found them strange coming from her, as no one has done more than she has to prevent Europe from creating the institutions necessary to tackle the problem on a European level. Opponents of even the modest advances contained in the Maastricht Bill are not in a position to criticise Europe on this problem.

Mr. Frank Field: The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the impact of the crisis as it explodes elsewhere in Europe. We have a self-interest in the matter. We are witnessing the collapse of the nation state and the rise of tribalism—and those tribes are armed. If the conflict extends in the way that I think the right hon. Gentleman is suggesting, millions of people will be driven from their homes and will try to gain entrance to this country and other European countries. We have already seen how Germany has been almost destabilised by the numbers of refugees that it is taking in.

If we cannot act from what some Conservative Members dismiss as higher motives, we can do so because of our legitimate self interest. Some people say that we act because we are horrified by what we see on our television screens—I do not think that that is a bad reason for wanting to take action—but we can also properly act in our self-interest. If we do not act, we may be engulfed, not directly by the fighting, but by the consequences of it as millions of people are pushed and moved around Europe.

Mr. Ashdown: The hon. Gentleman advances the argument more powerfully than I could, and I am grateful for his intervention. We do have a self-interest in the matter.

Those of us who propose stronger military action need to answer the question posed by many, including Mr. Alan Clark: why should action be in our interests? Why should we be involved? There are four reasons. The first reason is a moral one. We have a moral duty to help those who are suffering if it is in our practical power to do so, and I believe it is. Perhaps other hon. Members do not take that view, and some may believe that the moral argument is the weakest of all, but I do not think so. I believe that it is a powerful reason. I think that we can, and therefore should, help.

The second reason is an historical one. The continent of Europe should have learnt 60 years ago that appeasement does not satisfy the appetite of aggressors; it increases it. We Europeans, of all people, should have learnt that lesson.

The third reason is a regional one. If the situation gets out of control—as I greatly fear that it will if we do not act—there will be a regional conflict of incalculable proportions. It will destabilise, not just the regions of Europe, but Europe itself. Ultimately, members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation will become involved—Greece, Macedonia and Turkey. As the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) said, it is a personal problem for Britain. Over the past 40 years, we should have learnt from the experience of NATO that Europe's security problem is Britain's security problem—the two are indistinguishable and inseparable.

The fourth reason is an international one. If we do not stand up for the United Nations, its authority, and the basic standards of human rights and international law, then the UN will not be available to us when we need to rely on it in months and years to come.

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind) rose——

Mr. Ashdown: If the Secretary of State for Defence wants to intervene, perhaps he will answer the following question: if, after careful thought, it was considered right to risk lives in defence of the United Nations and international law in the Gulf, why is it wrong to do the same in Bosnia? Are we so cynical that our answer to that question is that the only difference between the two regions is oil? I hope not.

Mr. Rifkind: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way as the question that he asks me is very much in line with the question that I want to ask him. He is trying to persuade the House of the crucial importance for moral reasons, the peace of the world and the future of Europe of bringing the war in Bosnia to an end. Why is he prepared to call for what is by any definition only partial measures to bring that about? If he believes in the arguments that he is advancing, why is he not using his authority to call, if necessary, for the total deployment of massive ground forces, including British forces, in Bosnia? If he believes in his own rhetoric, why does he seek to draw back from that position?

Mr. Ashdown: The right hon. and learned Gentleman asks a perfectly fair question, which I intend to answer later in my speech. If he wishes to intervene again because he believes that I have not answered it fully, I shall happily give way again.

What can be done? That question relates directly to the Defence Secretary's question. Some people—including, I think, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath)—believe that nothing can be done. I do not agree. I believe that the longer one delays action, the greater the risk. For the past eight months, our plans have been bedevilled by the fact that we have been prepared to calculate to the last iota the cost of action, but we have never calculated the cost of inaction. But doing nothing carries the greatest risk of all, and could spread the conflict.

Whatever we do, our action must have a clear aim and deal with the facts—here, I agree with the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."] I have given the Defence Secretary the chance to come back. I will answer the question. [HON. MEMBERS: "The right hon. Gentleman should answer the question."] I shall answer the question in my own way, in my own time, in my own speech.

I agree with the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup that one of the realities is—I wish it were not so—that the Vance-Owen peace plan is, for all practical purposes, dead. That has serious consequences, and if the plan could be resuscitated, I would be the first to cheer. However, that would be an act of resurrection equivalent to Lazarus being brought back to life.

What we do on the ground must always be co-ordinated with what we seek to achieve at the negotiating table. Until now, the deployment of our forces has not been in concert with what we have sought to achieve in the peace negotiations—there has been a dislocation between the two. [HON. MEMBERS: "What do we do?"] Hon. Members should allow me to make my speech in my own way.

I believe that the Government are right. The Defence Secretary is also right to say that there is no purely military solution. That is how I answer the Defence Secretary's question. I have never claimed that there was a purely military solution. The right hon. and learned Gentleman asked me why I did not recommend using vast numbers of groups to achieve a purely military solution. My answer is that such a thing is impossible, and for the past seven or eight months I have made it clear that I have never believed it to be possible. The job of the military is to create the conditions in which peace has a chance.

My criticism of the Government and of those Conservative Members who are now heckling me is that we have never created that position. On every occasion our lack of capacity to take action on the ground has murdered any chance of peace because the Serbs and Croats could gain more from aggression.

Mrs. Currie rose——

Mr. Ashdown: If the hon. Lady will allow me to make a little progress, I will happily give way to her later.

There can be no military solution, but there can be no political solution either for as long as the Serbs and Croats believe that they will gain more by aggression than they will at the negotiating table. That must be properly understood.

What are the options? The Government tell us that the sanctions are the option. They tell us that sanctions are part of a package which includes the enforcement of the no-fly zone, for which I called seven months ago. Then, I was told that it was impossible; now it is being done. In any event, we are told that sanctions will solve the problem. Yet this is the same Government who told us before the Gulf war that sanctions would not solve the problem. I should like to know why they thought that sanctions would not stop Saddam Hussein but will work to stop Serb aggression. Today the Foreign Secretary almost admitted that sanctions would not work, yet they are as far as the Government are prepared to go.

Mrs. Currie: I am most grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. He will know that, as with the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), constituents of mine are in the military in Bosnia. Given the figures that the Secretary of State gave us earlier, not only for deployment in Bosnia but for deployment in neighbouring areas, would the right hon. Gentleman agree that there are now the best part of 10,000 United Nations troops deployed there on various missions? If they cannot do what he thinks they ought to be doing, just how many does he think there ought to be?

Mr. Ashdown: The hon. Lady is wrong: there are 16,000 in all. She will have to wait until I offer my solution to what can be done. I will then tell her about the calculation given to me by soldiers on the ground.

There are two kinds of intervention. We might call the first offensive intervention and the second preventive intervention. The first is based on the idea that we can somehow deploy 250,000 troops to roll back the Serbs and recapture the territory. I do not believe that possible, for the reasons that I have already given. There would not be enough of them, even in those numbers, to do the job.

The second form of offensive intervention is that we should lift the arms embargo as recommended by the Bosnian Foreign Secretary. I agree with the Government and the Labour Opposition about this. This is the single action best calculated to ensure the widening of the war. It is also an impractical option, because if we lifted the arms embargo, to get the arms to the Bosnian Muslims, they would have to pass across Serb territory—self-evidently the Serbs would not allow that—or Croat territory, and as the latter are also engaged in the conflict, they would not allow it either.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside) rose——

Mr. Ashdown: I have taken enough interventions.

Secondly, the arms could not be delivered to the Muslims until a considerable period had elapsed, and that would provoke increased aggression on the part of the Serbs and, perhaps, the Croats too.

Thirdly and crucially, if we are to lift the arms embargo on the Muslims, we will inevitably have to tolerate its being lifted from the Serbs too—and the Russians are only too ready to supply the Serbs with all that surplus, highly sophisticated equipment, including possibly nuclear weapons. God forbid that those weapons should get on to the battlefield.

Then there is the Labour party's suggestion that we should bomb the supply lines. If the Opposition seriously believe that that will stop the aggression, I must tell them that they are wrong. I have travelled in the area, for a week last September. I can tell Labour Members that the Serb part of Bosnia is stuffed with weapons. It was Tito's arms manufacturing area, separated both from the eastern and the western borders and thus best able to resist invasion.

The Serbs are past masters at throwing up new roads through forests. I saw them do it overnight when a road was cut by a Muslim ambush.

The bridges that would have to be blown are situated in the middle of densely populated towns. Even using smart bombs with a 40 per cent. accuracy rate, this would end up with the United Nations killing innocent Serb civilians. Nothing could be better calculated to strengthen support for the Serb leaders or to widen the conflict.

I can see a case for air intervention attacks against purely military targets, with the aim of showing clearly that we are earnest in our intent; but I do not believe that we will hit many of them. They will have been long since dispersed into the forests. But if we want to do this as an earnest of our intent, so be it. We should not expect it to have any effect on the ground.

The truth is—it is a hard truth—that if we want to do anything effective, we cannot do it without troops on the ground. If we are not prepared to countenance that—and it seems that the Labour party is not—we should not be in Bosnia at all. I can see no other way of achieving what we need to achieve except by putting troops on the ground ready to play their role.

When I spoke to the troops north of Vitez in December, they all said that they knew that the job they were doing was important and that they are prepared to take risks to do it, but they want to do it properly, and hitherto they have not been able to do so.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) rose——

Mr. Ashdown: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I must make some progress—and the Secretary of State is already waiting to intervene if I do not answer his question effectively.

But I believe that we can go in for protective intervention. I believe that we can establish the safe havens for which many of us have been calling for so long. I believe that it is possible for the United Nations to take under its protection the remaining Muslim enclaves in Bosnia-Herzegovina. That is possible, and it is already being done, de facto.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): How long?

Mr. Ashdown: If the hon. Gentleman will be patient, I will come to that.

Furthermore, it can be done without any change in the current mandate on terms of engagement. Indeed, this is precisely what the senior UN commander recommended three weeks before Srebrenica fell. He was prevented from taking that action by the politicians. It is also what the Canadians—only 150 of them; not vast numbers—in Srebrenica are doing today under the current mandate. It is precisely what the UN commander in Bihac recommended be done the day before yesterday. Indeed, he promised that it would be done under the present mandate.

The fact is that the soldiers on the ground are rewriting and reinterpreting the mandate, because they are fed up with waiting for the politicians to give them the backing they need. The Secretary of State says that military commanders have advised against what I propose. I tell him that there are times when politicians, who have to take account of wider considerations, have to disagree with military commanders. We had to do that in the Falklands; if we had not done it, we would not have undertaken that operation. But if, as the right hon. Gentleman claims, military commanders here disagree, why are the military commanders on the ground putting this into practice right now? Why was General Morillon prepared to recommend it? Why are the Canadians putting it into effect, supported, we understand, by the Government?

There are those who argue that this will mean the end of humanitarian aid, but it has already ended. Tuzla has had no effective aid for a month. If this is such a catastrophic course of action in terms of the delivery of humantarian aid, why has the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees recommended just such action in a letter last week to the Secretary-General of the United Nations?

I will now answer the question asked by the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), because it needs an answer. How many would be involved? I can only tell her the answer that I was given by the commanders on the ground in December. I said, "If I asked you to protect the remaining Muslim enclaves in Bosnia-Herzegovina, how many troops would you require?" Their rough calculation was about double the number that are there now—30,000-plus. [Interruption.] The hon. Lady can sit there comfortably on her Bench, but that is the view of the commanders on the ground.

Mr. Rifkind: The right hon. Gentleman is seeking to present to the House a dramatic initiative to reverse the whole course of aggression in Bosnia in his proposals to protect the remaining Muslim enclaves. Why does he restrict his proposals to enclaves? In practice, is he suggesting that we should deploy whatever ground forces are required, without a ceasefire, to guarantee all remaining Muslim-held territory? Is he prepared to do that without a ceasefire and if the troops in Bosnia do not have the weapons to defend themselves if they face a combat situation?

The right hon. Gentleman is aware that there are more than 80,000 heavily armed Bosnian Serb troops in Bosnia. He is trying to suggest that we should expose British and other UN forces on the ground, and without a ceasefire, to a possible onslaught from those 80,000 men. How long should those troops stay there, and when would he draw a line in respect of that kind of operation?

Mr. Ashdown: The Secretary of State clearly, and presumably selectively, has not been listening to my speech —[Interruption.] I will answer the Secretary of State, if I may, without being shouted down by Conservative Members. What I have described is precisely what is happening now. Has the Secretary of State not yet fastened on to the fact that the senior UN commander on the spot, three weeks before Srebrenica fell, said that he was prepared to protect Srebrenica but he was prevented from doing so? He believed that it was possible to do so with his present forces.

Mr. Marlow: What happens if they are attacked?

Mr. Ashdown: The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) wants to know what will happen if they are attacked. The answer is precisely what the Government have agreed to do to protect the Canadian forces in Srebrenica. We are not there, in these circumstances, to assault or kill the Serbs or to conduct an offensive operation. We are there to set up United Nations-protected enclaves. However, if they attack us, they will feel the full force of the response available to us, and that includes a response from the air. If that is the case, how can 150 Canadian troops, presumably with the commander's agreement, be placed in precisely the position I am recommending in Srebrenica today, with the support which the Government are now providing, of air power?

Mr. Rifkind: The right hon. Gentleman has been very kind in giving way. However, he must appreciate that the 150 Canadian troops, brave though they are in Srebrenica, are not in a position to defend Srebrenica from a determined Serbian onslaught comprising thousands of Serbian troops. At the moment, they are doing a very important job, but we must acknowledge the reality that that is because the Serbs have so far chosen not to use their weapons against them. What does the right hon. Gentleman suggest they should do if that position were to change?

Mr. Ashdown: The Secretary of State's arguments are becoming weaker and weaker. The troops are there, there has been no attack and presumably the Government agreed to that disposition, because they have said that they will support it from the air.

If, as the Secretary of State claims, the action that I have described is impossible, why did the senior United Nations commander on the spot—General Morillon—recommend such action? Why did the UNPROFOR commander in the Bihac area, the day before yesterday, say that that is what he is now doing? Why are the 150 troops in Srebrenica following that policy at this very moment when we are prepared to support that action by the use of air power?

What the Secretary of State has said in the past is absolutley right. It is true that if we are to use air power alone in offensive operations, we will have to have massive numbers of troops to back up that action. However, that is not true in defensive operations. That is the crucial difference between what we recommend in this case and what has been happening in the Gulf.

Mr. Shore: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way now?

Mr. Ashdown: I promised to give way to the right hon. Gentleman, and so I will. However, it will be the last time that I give way.

Mr. Shore: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman; I am very interested in his argument. One should not approach this debate in a negative spirit. We want to find a solution. However, there is a difficult point. The 150 Canadian troops are where they are now by agreement and permission of the Serb commanders. They would not have been able to get to that enclave or to the other enclaves without, as Morillon discovered to his intense fury, negotiating an agreement first. Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that his plan depends on negotiating agreements to allow UN forces into the different enclaves?

Mr. Ashdown: As the right hon. Gentleman will be aware, there are only two enclaves left. We already have ready access to all other areas. Unhappily, there are only two enclaves left—we could say that there were three if we included Sarajevo—but the two major enclaves are Zepa and Gorazde.

The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) may be aware that the UN has agreed to establish protective zones in those two areas without agreement from the Serbs. The UN simply declared them protected zones. It is fair to ask how we would get the protective forces through to those areas. It would be up to the UN commander on the ground to decide whether he could force passage. Let me make it clear that I believe that it would be extremely unlikely that that would ever be possible except in the most stable of circumstances.

I remind the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney—[Interruption]—and those Conservative Members still baying from the Government Benches, that the Muslim forces already in those towns are almost capable of holding the Serbs at bay. If we were to declare them defendable protected areas, it would be perfectly open to the UN to declare a land no-go zone around them and to use air power to assist the Muslim defenders to ensure that they did not face the kind of attack from heavy artillery and tanks that they currently face.

Mr. Robathan: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ashdown: The hon. Gentleman must forgive me; I will not give way, and I apologise to him.

It is perfectly possible for the UN to make that kind of declaration and to use air power to support the Muslim defenders to put it into practice.

I have criticised the Secretary of State for Defence for not having a clear aim. Let me tell him what I believe the clear aim of such a military operation would be. It would be to make it clear to the Serbs and Croats that they could not gain more from aggression on the ground and therefore the conditions in which a meaningful peace could be created.

I will now respond to a sedentary intervention, about the long-term solution, from the Conservative Benches. The Americans are right. If we go into something, we must have an idea about how to get out. Let me tell the House what I believe could happen. If we were to protect the remaining Muslim enclaves, and if we were therefore to create the conditions in which a genuine peace could be operated, it would be open to the UN to declare the remaining Muslim enclaves a UN protectorate. In that respect, I assume that the Vance-Owen plan has failed.

[Mr. Ashdown]

If the Vance-Owen plan fails, we cannot commit any British troops, or troops of any other nation, to preserve the illusion that Bosnia-Herzegovina can be recreated. In those circumstances, Muslim enclaves could be declared a UN protectorate and the UN, on behalf of the Muslims, could negotiate with all the authority of the international community behind it, with the Serbs and Croats to establish safe, just and secure borders. After that, it would be for the UN to support that state until, in due course, it would achieve self-determination and the capacity for self defence.

This is a very important debate. When the Secretary of State for Defence sums up, will he tell us why, if he believes that this course of action is so impossible, it is the course of action currently being carried out by UN commanders on the ground? If it is the view of the commanders on the ground that it is possible, why are they not now receiving the backing of politicians here?

I finish by returning to a point raised earlier. Europe is most at threat when empires collapse: so it was at the end of the Austro-Hungarian empire, and so it is at the end of the Soviet empire. We do not have to look very far to see that the Yugoslav crisis is not so much a revisiting in Europe of Europe's dreadful past as a precursor for Europe of what might happen in Europe's increasingly chaotic future.

We do not have to look very far—not even as far as Hungary—to see the conditions for ethnic cleansing which are already in place. We need look only so far as Czechoslovakia to see nations being divided up and borders being rewritten. We need look only so far as the old Soviet Union to see rising warlordism with warlords armed to the teeth with the most modern and sophisticated weapons.

If western Europe, as the only bloc and foundation of stability on our continent, is not prepared to project its power to secure peace around its borders, this decade will be a very painful, very troublesome and extremely difficult one. I believe that this crisis is now in the eleventh hour. It is not too late to act, but it soon will be.

Mr. Tom King (Bridgwater): I agree with the last point in the speech by the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown). The debate takes place at a difficult time. Paradoxically, we may be close to success but we are also closer to failure. The debate is of high quality and hon. Members have expressed strong feelings. The House is united in its concern about the appalling and distressing situation facing people in the former Yugoslavia, but it is divided honestly and sincerely on the best way to tackle that problem.

The right hon. Member for Yeovil said that perhaps the problem came too soon for Europe. Hon. Members who take an interest in defence know that the most feared scenario of NATO was that precisely the situation that we now face would arise during the cold war, and that a conflict and a collapse of authority, ethnic tension and civil war would lead to the involvement of the great powers and a third world war. If there is a tiny crumb of comfort to be taken from this appalling situation it is that that has not happened. Only a courageous hon. Member would deny that the spreading of that conflagration throughout Kosovo, Macedonia and the Balkans could give rise to the risk that we thought we had put behind us.

We should all have a proper sense of humility, because we face an appallingly difficult situation. All hon. Members are equal in the House, but the Government have to take responsibility for agonisingly difficult choices. It is easy to be courageous on the Back Benches and to advance radical and bold thoughts, but it is not so easy to commit our friends and the sons of our constituents to a conflict which we will not face ourselves but which will place them at considerable risk. I had some brief experience of such choices.

Our first objective must be to stop the fighting, to get a genuine ceasefire and then to see some prospect of diplomacy and negotiations leading to finding a political solution. I shall try to outline how we can ensure that pressure grows to the extent that those who will suffer from it will be able to judge in their coldest and most calculating nationalist interest that resisting it will not be worth the diminishing benefits that will flow from continuing aggression.

The past week has revealed some evidence that the balance between growing pressure and diminishing returns is starting to be considered. Unfortunately, it coincides with a period when we are closer to failure. Today, the French decided to move some of their forces because of their current exposure to risk. Such risks can arise suddenly. At any time, a message could reach the House about a serious accident involving our troops. If that happened, the Government would have to decide whether the risk to our troops could be justified. If it could not, the vital humanitarian bridgehead that we have established could be lost.

As I have said, we must achieve our first objective of a genuine ceasefire so that we may sustain and develop the humanitarian effort on which it is asserted that 2 million people in the former Yugoslavia now depend. We have a massive responsibility to ensure that that effort is not impeded in any way. As all hon. Members who have spoken have said, that effort is a tribute to the amazing achievement of our forces and those of other countries. They have made possible not the feeding of 5,000 but the feeding and support of 2 million who might otherwise not have survived an appalling winter.

As we debate the wider issues, our forces are flying into Sarajevo with supplies, and ensuring the safe passage of the convoys at some risk to themselves. Today, a Spanish major put his life on the line, apparently to save 171 people who faced the risk of massacre. That is an example of what Colonel Stewart and his forces have to face. Anyone who listens to broadcasts will appreciate the undoubted strain and pressure that are being placed on our forces. We are asking a great deal of them.

There is an urgent need to re-establish the credibility of the United Nations. The right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said that the United Nations lacked credibility in other territories, but the key area in which it currently lacks credibility is with the Serbs. It is perceived that the United Nations does not seriously intend to obstruct the activities of the Serbs. The United Nations lacks credibility because it is not enforcing a resolution stating that the conduct of the Serbs should not continue.

We had hoped that one of the most fruitful outcomes of the Gulf war was the establishment of the credibility of the United Nations as a force that would resist aggression and could be enlisted to support free, sovereign nations. Such credibility could have been of enormous benefit but, tragically, it is being seriously undermined. We must get through to those who need to hear it the message that the world is no longer prepared to accept the flouting of the United Nations and its resolutions and that action will be taken against those who do so.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. King: I should like to be brief so I shall not give way.

We must make it clear that continued aggression will result in total disaster for them. Perhaps that message is now getting through to Mr. Milosevic. The Foreign Secretary spoke about Mr. Milosevic's letter and apparent pressure on the Bosnian Serbs. However, we do not have to take that on trust, although if it is right it is to be welcomed. The pressure must be maintained and reinforced so that next time it will be clearly understood where it matters.

Mr. Winnick rose——

Mr. King: As I have said, I am trying to be brief, so I shall not give way.

We must examine what is realistic and possible, and in that context I welcome the action by the Government in the United Nations to turn the sanctions regime into an effective blockade. The Gulf war illustrated the importance of sanctions as a key element in the early stages of a conflict. Sadly, it became clear that they would not be successful. But a substantial organisation was established and meticulous effort was put into the sanctions. Sanctions take much work and close attention and cannot be implemented merely by pious United Nations resolutions. They must be reinforced by organisations on the ground. I welcome what the Foreign Secretary said about that.

Much more effective measures must be taken on the Danube to support what is being done on the Adriatic and on the land frontiers. Although I appreciate the difficulties, we must insist that it is a total approach by all members of the United Nations. Those who are looking for the support of the UN in other areas—for example, the Russians, Bulgarians and Romanians, desperate for economic support from other countries—must give wholehearted support to UN resolutions on the sanctions side.

We must back it up with a military threat, and in that respect I depart from the view of practically every right hon. and hon. Member. There has been exhaustive examination of every option. Each has been thoroughly examined, criticised, ridiculed and finally discarded. We have announced to Belgrade that this or that will not work, so we will not do it. That has been profoundly unwise, so I welcome the Foreign Secretary's statement today that no option has been ruled out.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) said in his speech and in an intervention to the Prime Minister that troops on the ground should be ruled out. I can presume to appreciate as much as anyone in the House the difficulties involved in putting troops on the ground in an offensive position. But why rule that out? Why tell Belgrade or the Bosnian Serbs in advance all the steps we will not take?

There are a number of options, and I can think of a few that have not so far been canvassed, some of which could be extremely unpleasant. We have the capacity to do some very nasty things to people who seek to obstruct the will of the UN. The key element is not to examine and then disclose such issues—for example, matters in connection with air strikes. Let us not flag up the options in advance.

I said in an earlier speech that I thought that the situation in Bosnia and Yugoslavia was an absolutely classic example of where one should not get involved. I give no secrets away when I say that I know exactly the military advice that the Secretary of State is getting. I strongly recommended Field Marshall Sir Richard Vincent for the post of Chief of the Defence Staff. I am proud that he is the first Briton for many years to be chairman of the military committee of NATO. We could not have a better man, regardless of nationality, in that post at this critical time.

I remind those who have suggested that there is great division among the different countries—in case some believe that soldiers may hold different views—that the press conference given by Sir Richard Vincent was not a personal or private conference. It was given in his capacity as chairman of the military committee, one of the key members of which is General Colin Powell, chairman of the American Joint Chiefs of Staff. I have no doubt that the military advice coming through is setting out the real difficulties that are faced. It is right that such advice should be given because any senior serving officer in uniform must have a sense of responsibility, a feeling for his men, and be concerned about the situations in which he may commit them. I appreciate why those officers have been issuing the warnings that have been coming through.

But as the right hon. Member for Yeovil pointed out, although military considerations must be taken into account, decisions still have to be taken. My simple and clear message is that we must make it clear that military options exist and that we are not in the business of discussing and disclosing what they might be. I would issue the clear warning to those in positions of authority in Belgrade or elsewhere—to the leadership of the Bosnian Serbs and to anyone who might seek to continue aggression—that the anguish, horror and awfulness that is felt by us, here and throughout the world, has brought forward the prospect of some military contribution.

I say that recognising the disadvantages that might attach to such a prospect, but it would be a very foolish person indeed who, sitting in Belgrade or elsewhere, thought that the discussions we have had on the difficulties and problems meant that people did not face any risk of such a consequence. I want them to understand that they face a real military threat, coupled with the certainty of a massive threat of the blockade which would totally destroy their economy and cause huge disaster and unhappiness to their people. Let them know that they had better understand that quickly.

Such an approach must be adopted in a united way. I noted the conditions that Mr. Warren Christopher set out to a Senate sub-committee. One was that any step must be acceptable to United States public opinion. That is not good enough because it would be catastrophic if the United States acted on its own. Any actions must also be acceptable to UN public opinion.

There is no simple, obvious solution. We recognise that every option is extremely difficult. Even so, we must not dismiss any of them out of hand. We must maintain the most effective threat possible because I believe that there is now a chance to get messages through. The balance of advantage—of the continuing struggle and violence—is changing. If that threat can be developed at this time, it may prove to be the crucial contributor that might lead, helpfully and hopefully, to the ending of the present awful situation.

6.46 pm

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): I agreed with two points made by the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King). The first was that we must approach the subject with humility. There is disagreement on both sides of the House and in our respective parties on how the issue should be approached, and none of us should be arrogant enough to imagine that we have a magic solution to what everyone accepts is a complex problem.

If people listening to my contribution disagree with me, I hope that they will be generous enough to accept that it is offered in a spirit of sincerity and is made by someone with some experience of having been out and about in the world, but who does not suffer from the illusion that he is always right.

I also agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that it is foolish to rule out military action and to send the message to Belgrade that we have ruled it out. So I regret that any Serb listening to the contributions from the Government Front Bench today will have got the message that just about every form of effective action has been ruled out. That is a regrettable but unhappy truth, so we must face the problem more robustly than we might otherwise have done, had there been more spirit coming from the Foreign Office and the Department of Defence in recent months and today.

I make it clear at the outset that I am in favour of ground forces, under the United Nations banner, in such numbers as are necessary, for as long as is necessary. I agree with Field Marshal Sir Richard Vincent that a clear objective must be set, and it is only right that the military should receive clear instructions from the nation's political leaders.

In my view, the objective is not complicated. It is to create a safe haven based as far as practicable on the recent borders of Bosnia. I do not prentend to know the precise details. There are sufficient people, many of them in the military, more experienced than I in such matters. If I were the Secretary of State, I would listen carefully to what the military people are saying. As I say, they expect to receive positive political leadership. I regret that up to now they have not received it.

When I outlined my position succinctly to a gentleman from the BBC a few hours ago, he said, "You are an ultra." I replied "Hang on a minute. Actually, I am a moderate. Ultras feel able to sit by while innocent women and children are slaughtered on a huge scale, and I do not have the stomach for that. I am not tough enough to sit through that indefinitely." That is the ultra position. I respect the view of those who disagree with me, but the ultra position is to sit by and do little or nothing, and a worse position is to pretend to be doing something.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Mullin: No, I will not.

People ask for how long, and I say, "For as long as is necessary." I shall accept the judgment of those who are qualified. It will probably not be for as long as we have kept—I see a smirk on the face of the Secretary of State for Defence. I hope that he will wipe it off. The Government's policies have not been so glorious that they can rule out all advice from whatever quarter. This has not been a very glorious episode, whatever course we should take. It will probably not be for as long a period as we have kept hundreds of thousands of troops in Germany—for the past 45 years—or for as long a period as a large number of troops, mainly American, were kept in Korea to protect that not very perfect regime. It will probably not be on that scale, but it will have to be for as long as necessary.

It has been said that there will be casualties, and there are always casualties of war. In my previous incarnation I was a journalist, and in that capacity I attended a number of wars, including those in Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos. I am not under any illusion about the nature of war. However, those casualties will be small compared with the tidal wave of human misery with which we are faced, and which will get a great deal worse. There has been some discussion of alternatives. [AN HON. MEMBER: "What about the Gulf war?"] We are debating the situation in Bosnia. If the hon. Gentleman wants a debate on the Gulf, we can have one. Angola has been mentioned. If we want a debate on that, we can have one. Somebody else mentioned Cambodia, and we can have a debate on that. I happen to know something about Cambodia. However, we are debating the situation in Bosnia and that is what I propose to stick to.

What are the alternatives? The one most practised so far has been hand wringing. By God, we have been faced with a great deal of that. It does not get us anywhere. A second course of action is hand wringing plus food and medicines. The food and medicines are running out, but the hand wringing is not. Tragically, that is not getting us anywhere either, because we are not being taken seriously. Whatever message the Serbs are getting, it is not the right one. Another course of action, which was arrived at very reluctantly, was the air exclusion zone. That is the most pathetic alternative that we have come up with. It is designed solely to placate western public opinion. By and large, the threat is not coming from the air.

Another suggestion was bombing. The Americans have always been very keen on bombing, mainly because they have never been bombed themselves, but bombing on its own, as other hon. Members have already said, will not do anything. It is another way, a tougher way, to add to the air exclusion zone and placate domestic public opinion. However, it will not achieve anything. It will not cut the supply lines. As the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) has said, the millions of tonnes of bombs dropped on the Ho Chi Minh trail did not interdict any supplies. I confidently predict that it will not make any difference to Yugoslavia if it is designed to cut supplies.

Bombing will threaten our troops over there in a way that they have not been threatened hitherto, and it will kill a lot of innocent civilians. I am not in favour of bombing. I can see that one has to give air cover for any ground troops that one might have to put in, but that is a different argument. Bombing by itself will get us nowhere; I hope that everyone involved in this tragic situation understands that and that every possible restraint is put on the President of the United States to persuade him to rule out unilateral bombing raids.

What is at stake is not just the fate and the misery of hundreds of thousands of people that we have witnessed so far. It is, as others have said, the credibility of the United Nations. The Serbs are laughing at the United Nations. Nothing that they have heard from those on the Government Front Bench or from other western capitals on the subject will stop them laughing. They will carry on until they are stopped. If they are allowed to carry on, that will give the green light to every little tinpot nationalist from here to Cambodia, and they will stop only when they realise that we are being serious, as the right hon. Member for Bridgewater said.

Unfortunately, so far we have not been particularly serious, so it will take some effort—only the introduction of ground troops will do—to convince the Serbs that we are serious. Only when we have done that will they stop.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): My right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) knows, from his experience in government, all about enduring pressure to use military force. He spoke very much for me. I agree with, and strongly endorse, everything that he said. With the statutory 10-minutes rule coming up, I shall make my speech an addition to his.

I sympathise strongly with my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, who made a brave speech. It is not at all fair to allege, as the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) did, that my right hon. Friend is taking cover. My right hon. Friend advanced the dilemma with his usual integrity and honesty. I realise the enormous difficulties that he faces, especially as—there is nothing to be ashamed of in this—there are comings and goings in Washington. Washington has not yet made up its mind, and we do not know which way President Clinton will go.

It is a question not of waiting and then following the lead from Washington but of trying to get the allies—ideally, all members of the Security Council, including not just the five permanent members but the rotating members—on the same side, acting together, sounding decisive and presenting a credible threat to the war makers and those who have shown that they do not care tuppence for the remarks of the allies in the west, and believe that no one will stand in the way of their wish to pursue an agenda of endless slaughter of civilians.

This is not one of these wars where civilians get accidentally caught up. Killing of civilians, particularly the women and children, and the murdering of every village inhabitant is a deliberate aim of policy. Let us not confuse that with the accidental killing of civilians which, tragically, happens in every conflict.

I confess that I used to think that this was just another Balkan mess, that they have been at it for hundreds of years—we can all remember Balkan wars—and if we could somehow put a ring fence around all that, we could stand aside and walk away from it. The truth, which has gradually dawned on the policy makers and perhaps on all of us as well, is that we cannot possibly walk away. We have already been dragged in. We fell into a major diplomatic ambush and allowed premature recognition of Croatia and then of the independent state of Bosnia—probably the biggest diplomatic blunders since the second world war. Once we had done that, we had created new states, with all the resulting paraphernalia and obligations on the international community.

We could not walk away for that reason and we cannot walk away because genocide is not something over which we can wring our hands and tell our schoolchildren that it is not our matter, we are against killing people, but, in this case, it is all very difficult, and nothing can be done. Furthermore, we cannot walk away because we have already interevened, as a result of the decisive action through resolution 820, which ruled that heavy arms should be denied to one of the combatants. That is a direct intervention.

The Serbians, the Croatians and the Serbian Bosnians—the Serbians are supplying the latter—have unlimited access to arms. The idea that if we put more arms into the area, they will fall into the wrong hands, is absurd. They have already fallen into the wrong hands in vast quantities. Access is complete for any range of weapons falling short only, by some miracle, of tactical nuclear weapons, which I hope are under the tight control of the CIS forces. We must work to ensure that that hope is soundly based.

There are plenty of arms. As one of my hon. Friends said this afternoon, the place is awash with arms. Everyone has access to the killing weapons which they are using freely, although the Bosnian Muslims very much less so that the others. It is all the more remarkable that they are putting up such a staggeringly successful fight against Serbian-Bosnian forces who do not seem to be keen on engaging in hand-to-hand fighting and prefer to sit outside towns mortaring children's playgrounds.

Hon. Members say with great sincerity that we must not become more involved, but of course we are involved. We are already caught in a process which is dragging us forward into more difficulties and narrower choices. The idea that if we could stand aside everything would settle down and there would be some equilibrium, a stalemate of terror or a halt to the killings through exhaustion, is completely false, extremely dangerous and one which will encourage us not to take further action now and find that later we are far more committed.

There are many more British than other troops involved. Those who are now saying that we must not have our boys in there will find that, through circumstances not of our dictation, many more troops will have to get involved and we will pay a heavier price later than if, between ourselves and our allies, we can produce the will and the clarity of objective necessary to act.

The choice is not between involvement and non-involvement, but between action now and far more involvement later. I know that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary understands that if we delay now and do not manage to get a grip on the deteriorating and sliding situation, everything will get much worse.

Hon. Members rightly ask about our existing commitment. It is not true that we are doing nothing at all. We have made a major humanitarian commitment and our troops are protecting the heroic humanitarian workers, some of whom are being killed, and that has undoubtedly helped to save lives. The same applies to other countries. Of course, our French neighbours have already paid a penalty in the loss of military life, as 12 French soldiers have already been slaughtered.

It has been said that all that will be at risk if we move in a new direction and develop a new policy to halt the bloodshed. I have to tell those who do not know it already —that sounds arrogant, as most hon. Members know that the humanitarian effort is increasingly under strain. All those who have been to the area know from talking to the operators of the humanitarian effort that it is becoming more difficult and supplies are not getting through. Supplies have been blocked through Gorazde, one of the target towns, and other places. The intensity of effort required to get supplies through, even on quite a modest scale, let alone on the full scale required to feed everybody, is getting harder to sustain.

[Mr. David Howell]

The humanitarian effort has worked very well; the troops and the UNHCR drivers have done wonderfully through the winter months and many lives have been saved, but it is an illusion to imagine that, just because it has gone well, it is still going swimmingly and we must not do anything to upset it.

The humanitarian effort is now in great danger. Our troops and, as we have seen from the French experience, those of other countries are in increasing danger because the policies and the patience have run out. The combatants, particularly the aggressors, and the Serbians who are supplying the equipment and the personnel to Serbian Bosnia have reckoned that they no longer need to be quite so careful or sensitive about who they shoot at and whether they should tolerate the humanitarian effort. They said yes to the Canadian troops in Srebrenica this week and I hope that they will continue to say yes, but it is a precarious situation and we may well be compelled or forced to go to the aid of the people there if the yes becomes more conditional and the bombs and shells start falling into the town again.

I sense from what my right hon. Friend said—perhaps some of us have realised this rather late, in my case only a few weeks ago—that the whole mood has changed. The policy phase of the past is over. In that phase, we were trying to establish the Vance-Owen plan—I do not think that maps were ever going to work, as they were far too complicated—in which it was believed that Mr. Milosevic and the Serbians meant what they said, were not supplying the Serbian Bosnians, genuinely wanted them to stop and were going to hold off from the systematic phases of bloodshed and knocking off the Muslim enclaves. We have to move to new ground. Of course, we are already doing so.

In my view, although we have canvassed every option this afternoon, there is no single solution. It will have to be a mixture of measures applied with great sensitivity. It will need as much support as we can get from the United Nations. I am glad that Mr. Yeltsin now feels that the Russians can come on side in a more effective way. Frankly, I think that they would have done so anyway two or three weeks ago, but they are now playing a much more positive role. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has rightly put his weight behind the proposal, which comes into force on Monday, not merely for the sanctions but for a serious blockade.

I hope and understand that it will be a real blockade. A blockade has to be imposed by force because people will break blockades. Ships will try to run it and will have to be stopped; lorries and trucks will try to break it and will have to be physically stopped; operations on the Danube will have to be interfered with to make a blockade work, quite apart from the financial aspect which, as my right hon. Friend said, is extremely important. Those measures, combined with the no-fly zone, which will probably also have to be intensified to the point at which there could be interdiction, represents a move into the area where real force is threatened and I strongly welcome it.

Now we come to the next steps to stop the process sliding away from us and dragging us into far greater commitment than we want. We have had authoritative views on whether we can cut supply lines. I do not know whether the right hon. Member for Yeovil is right in believing that all the bridges are in the middle of towns and nothing can be done. Cutting supply lines from the air is difficult, but every litre of benzene that fuels the Bosnian-Serbian armoured troop carriers comes out of Serbia.

I cannot believe that some interdiction, whether by bombs, rockets or more subtle lateral thinking—the military are very good at that—could not make serious inroads into the entire fuel supply of the Serbian-Bosnian operation. I regard that as second best to the idea which is now being advanced on all sides—which I suspect is the one that President Clinton will propose next week—that we enlarge the safe areas into safe havens. In a sense, that is the limited objective which makes sense.

We cannot solve the war from outside; it is partly civil and partly invasion from next door and we can all argue endlessly where the solution point lies. However, we can deal with the immediate objective, which is stopping further bloodshed on a massive and hideous scale by the systematic elimination of towns and communities in the way we saw when the mortar bombs scattered the limbs of children in the schools at Srebrenica. We can move on those fronts.

We should take seriously the recommendations of the latest United Nations surveillance force to Bosnia and the recommendations of the President's own study group which went to Bosnia, all of whom said that it would be possible if one moved carefully, without putting in thousands of troops and getting the Serbians into a state of total aggression, to establish wider areas that were genuinely safe and protected where it was known that, if people started lobbing artillery shells, there would be retaliation.

Mr. Peter Temple-Morris (Leominster): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Howell: I should love to give way, but I am right up against the 10-minute rule and I have only a minute left.

We must not merely keep that option open but sound as though we are addressing the matter seriously, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater rightly said. The threat must be credible otherwise there will be no movement and no halt to the bloodshed. If not, we will be forced back to the idea of the Bosnian Foreign Minister and everyone else that if we are not prepared to help people, we should not deny them the arms to help themselves. That is a very bad option, but if we are not

I realise that combining foreign policy with democracy is good but difficult because one has to explain to people what may happen in the future—not immediate interests, but what may happen if we do not take action now. In this case, it is clear to me that if we do not take action now, the actions that we shall take later, the bloodshed, the cost in our own troops and their lives, let alone to the moral authority of the post-cold war world, will be far greater than our worst fears at the moment.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. Madam Speaker has imposed a 10-minute restriction on speeches from now on. Hon. Members will be aware that the digital clocks are not working. Therefore, I ask them to look at the clocks at either end of the Chamber. I shall move in my seat 15 seconds before the 10 minutes is up.

7.10 pm

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): I welcome the apparent conversion of the Chairman of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs to a more realistic appraisal of the problems of Bosnia. I hope that more of his colleagues follow his conversion.

There is a near-exact analogy for the inaction of the Front Bench of timorous Tories with the conduct of a not dissimilar bunch who sat there in the 1930s as the civil war in Spain erupted. They dithered and prevaricated, except of course those who supported the fascists in Spain. They refused even to supply arms to the Government of the day while Nazi Germany and fascist Italy armed Franco, and the second world war ensued because of such apppeasement.

As Yugoslavia broke up, it was clear what the proponents of greater Serbia were after, and it is still clear. It has no intention of abandoning its military campaign to create that greater Serbia. Its leaders, fanatics to a man—we have seen them in action on the screen—take no regard of United Nations instructions. But the resolution of the countries of the United Nations has been less than effective and the United Nations has found excuse for delay and further discussion—the phrase of leaders who do not know what to do.

Time has been wasted with the plodding pursuit of the Vance-Owen plan. What a farce that has been; an arrogant attempt to redraw the lands of Yugoslavia along ethnic frontiers, and that in a community that has been mixed for centuries. The map that was drawn up by that failed politician, now a distinguished world figure, David Owen, our old colleague, actually recognised the ethnic cleansing achieved by the Serb attacks. Just last week, the Croats and Muslims fought each other to ensure that they got their bits of the map as drawn up by those two stumbling savants.

The Vance-Owen plan is as dead as a dodo. As I warned many months ago, there was never any hope that the Bosnian Serbs would ever sign up to the delimitation of their own territory, or what they thought was their own territory, because they have not completed the operation yet.

There will be another bite at Gorazde and Zepa, and if the international community does nothing, as appears to be the case, and that is endorsed by this timorous Front Bench, it will all start again in Kosovo. Then we shall be into a Balkans war. It is extraordinary the limitation of understanding of the men who are professionaly advised on the issues. Do they listen to the professional advice, I often wonder?

Only effective military action will stop the advance and enlargement of the Bosnian Serbs. The palsied leaders of western Europe have to summon up their shrivelled political will to mount military action, as must the new President, poor inexperienced clot, whom British Ministers have tried to emasculate, apparently with some success.

What should that action entail? I do not believe that any of the leaders in western Europe will agree to the early involvement of ground troops made up of their forces. They are too frightened of the effect that the body bags will have on their electoral chances in future years. But if the military were instructed to mount specific actions against certain objectives, of course it could be done. It is outrageous to suggest that that could not be achieved. Remember the skills and precision displayed in the Gulf war, a somewhat less justified intervention than would be intervention in Bosnia.

The aims of those operations would be destruction from the air of the bridges between Serbian and Muslim territories—they are all in towns, so both communities would suffer—of Serbian routes of supply and communication, which can certainly be interdicted, of their air force, which has cheated the United Nations resolution, and the taking out of their artillery emplacements. They might move them, but modern warfare has ways of finding to where they have been moved. Finally, and absolutely essential, is the destruction of the armament factories within old Yugoslavia. Unless we do that, we do not mean business.

Serbian aggression has to be stopped, and to achieve that we must go in and mean to win. Of course there will be civilian as well as military casualties, but civilian casualties are continuing all the time, compounded by cold-blooded murder, torture and rape as a policy objective.

The humanitarian operations will have to be withdrawn while the attacks on Serbian objectives continue. It would be foolish in the extreme to keep our and other forces in Bosnia as sitting targets for revenge operations, and the Serbians are not very nice fighters. The protection that those forces provide and the provisions they distribute would have to cease, hopefully only temporarily, while Serbia's military machine is crippled. On the achievement of that goal—it can certainly be done if the west means to do it—humanitarian operations must be resumed.

At that stage, with Serbian ambitions halted and their military effectiveness destroyed, the United Nations should introduce a protectorate, imposed by United Nations forces on the ground. They would run the communications, the utilities and the immediate provision of food and medical supplies.

Those forces would have to remain for some years. It would be a financially expensive operation to rebuild and initially administer a multi-ethnic democratic state. But only such resolute action would shorten the sufferings in Bosnia and prevent a protracted Balkan war. Perhaps, historically most significantly of all, only such action will avoid the alienation of millions of Muslims throughout the world which would give and will give enormous impetus to Islamic fundamentalism.

7.17 pm

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South): All of us approach this debate from the same starting point. All of us are angered and appalled by the terrible scenes of violence that we witness on our television screens every night. All of us are haunted by past horrors which come vividly to mind as a result of the suffering of the Bosnian people. I am no exception to that.

The leader of the Liberal party was right to refer to the events of the second world war. They have a powerful influence upon us. All of us in Europe thought that those events would never be repeated. Perhaps we were naive. We were wrong. Europe 1939 to 1945; Bosnia 1993—ethnic cleansing is back.

But the problem with history is that it sends out conflicting messages. Yes, it is true, my generation has always found it difficult to understand that the generation of the 1930s failed to recognise the threat that Hitler posed, certainly failed to do anything about it and certainly failed to protect some of those who went to their slaughter.

But equally, a later generation finds it difficult to understand how the greatest power on earth at the time and today—the United States—got sucked into the Vietnam war, which it could never win. First, it gave aid with arms, then sent instructors to demonstrate those arms, then used air power to support those arms and, finally and ultimately, it sent its own men and women to fight with those arms.

So when emotive words are used—I understand why they are, and perhaps it is right that they should be—by those who advocate further military action in Bosnia, words like "appeasement", words such as were used to me this morning by the Foreign Minister of Bosnia, "Munich" and "Chamberlain", I must remind the House—and perhaps the House as a whole should remind the United States of America—that words like "bombing Hanoi" and "My Lai" show that history is littered not only with examples of failure to act and the dire consequences that resulted but equally with examples of decisive action taken with disastrous results.

My point is simple: however haunted we are and however much we remember the past, we must not allow past failures of intervention or non-intervention or too little or too much intervention to dictate what we do today. The policy that this Government and the West must pursue must be pragmatic. It must be based on what we can realistically achieve.

In 1958, the United States invaded the Lebanon. It did nothing in 1956 about Hungary. We debate today whether we should do something about Bosnia. We have no intention, I imagine, of ever debating whether we should do something about Georgia, Armenia or Azerbaijan. So while it is true that foreign policy, rightly, has a moral dimension, it must be tempered with what is achievable and practicable.

I will be frank with the House: I have changed my mind on this issue, and I dare say that other right hon. and hon. Members may have taken a similar course, including perhaps even my right hon. Friends on the Front Bench. We may have been able to do something months ago. Six months ago, perhaps we should have bombed the Serbian artillery. We had no British troops there, no major humanitarian effort at risk, and there was still a realistic state to defend. Six months ago, air power might have been effective, and I said so at the time. But the scene has changed and events have moved on. It is not enough now to say simply, though understandably, "Something must be done," unless that something has a realistic chance of achieving the objectives that we set ourselves.

Will the air strikes be enough to end the killing? I do not think they will. Will they necessitate the end of the humanitarian effort? Yes, I think they may. The humanitarian effort, for all the comments that have been made, is daily saving lives and we see it too on our television screens. Would all this lead to massive ground intervention—one or two Opposition Members have been frank enough to admit that it would lead to that—and is that feasible in political and military terms? No, I do not think it is, and, more important, neither do those who are advising this and other Western Governments. We must listen to that advice because they are responsible for the lives of our soldiers and of other soldiers who will go into the conflict.

Would arming the Muslims save Bosnia? Yes, it might, but what would be the consequence and where would those arms eventually end up? Those who a year ago were saying that we should arm the Croatians may well have seen those very arms used in the massacres which we saw only a day or two ago and which British troops are now clearing up. Are sanctions enough? I do not know because —here I agree with the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham)—we have not applied those sanctions vigorously enough so far. Month after month, the killing has been going on and we have still not imposed, or perhaps we are just starting to impose, the sort of blockade to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) referred. It is essential that we have an effective blockade.

I am torn on this issue and I think that many other hon. Members are too. There are powerful emotions. There are no easy choices, but the difference between me and my right hon. Friends in government is that, if the decision they make is wrong, and if they respond to the "something must be done" argument for the best of motives and they get it wrong, with all the resultant disasters, it is they and not I or the leader of the Liberal party who must come to the Dispatch Box and answer for what they have done, not just to the House but to the people of the country, including people who may have paid the price for that error.

So I say, not with an easy heart, because it is not an easy decision—we all approach the matter with great sadness —that it is a balanced judgment as to what should be done now. Circumstances may change. Nothing should be fixed, but I believe that, on that balanced judgment, the Government have for the moment got it right.

Mr. John Spellar (Warley, West): Other contributions tonight have dealt with the appalling situation in Bosnia, the awesome scale of the human tragedy there and the way in which we see it every night on our television screens, but I hope that the House will forgive me if I do not use the short time that I have to go over that again.

We should recognise that there are dreadful events happening in many other areas of the world. Some, like the situation in Armenia, have been very well reported in the past. Some, like the appalling events in the Sudan, have never been properly covered. We cannot, then, just base our decision on moral outrage, although that will be one of the factors in our decisions. Nor can we base it on where the television companies choose to send their cameras.

Ms Hoey: On that point, does my hon. Friend agree that we should all pay tribute to those very brave camera men and women, photographers and reporters, for without the work that they have done in very difficult circumstances none of us would be seeing the pictures or reading about what is going on?

Mr. Spellar: I absolutely agree with my hon. Friend. She reinforces my point about the acts of great courage of those who are not combatants in the events. Without them we would not know what was going on. In many other areas of the world we do not know what is going on, and there is not so much public concern because the events in other areas are not being reported. It is right that they should be reported and that we feel outraged about them, but that cannot be the only guide to action. We must take into account the international situation and Britain's capabilities. We must also consider Britain's interests in this.

I therefore wish to confine myself tonight to the very basic questions that we ought to address: what is to be done and, in particular, what is to be done by Britain? Our debate has focused on what is to be done about military intervention and, in particular, on what should be done about troops on the ground. That point was highlighted by the right hon. Member for Yeovil. I also ask what this country should be doing as a party to military intervention on the ground because, so far as I am aware, no one is suggesting that Britain should act unilaterally or in an isolated fashion.

What does that international agreement amount to? Mention has been made of the United Nations, particularly by my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), although up to now in many cases they have not been particularly united, especially Russia. It might therefore seem unlikely that we would get agreement from Russia in the Security Council, where we would require unanimity in order to take such military action.

We have had a welcome indication of a shift in the attitude of a post-referendum Boris Yeltsin. There was some criticism of the western Governments as to whether they should have required greater conditions from Yeltsin in return for the granting of aid, but that criticism was perhaps a little unfair as we are seeing some change. Equally, we must ask why Yeltsin was so sensitive on the issue in the first place. What did he detect inside Russia regarding a strong, pro-Yugoslav, possibly pan-Slav attitude among the Russian people which made it a consideration, so that these decisions were delayed in deference to his desire to get past the referendum?

That attitude will still be there. It could still influence Russian foreign policy, and it could well influence Russia's decisions on the Security Council. We would not be able to rely on unanimity to secure a decision from the United Nations, and even if we secured such a decision, we should have to question whether the Russian army would be willing or able to participate.

If this were not a United Nations operation, would a UN-sanctioned NATO force be involved? Is it proposed, even, that if United Nations agreement could not be secured, a NATO force should act on its own account? The right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) did not answer the real question: what decisions would have to be made, and how would they be implemented?

NATO would be taking a dramatic step if it moved from being part of a defence pact to being a world policeman, able to intervene throughout the globe. It would have to take a far greater step than any taken in the Gulf war, which involved a clear military objective, a clear international principle and a simple and straightforward issue. Favouring intervention in a civil war in Yugoslavia would represent a dramatic change in NATO's terms of reference, which would require serious consideration and a major debate before any action was taken.

Let us assume, however, that the objections were overcome. What if the Government decided tonight that we would intervene militarily? Would the invasion be over by May day or the Whitsun holiday? Not a bit of it: it would not even have begun.

At the time of the Gulf war, we all saw how long it took to build up military troops and to prepare an invasion force. We must remember the sheer logistics involved in preparing sea and air forces for action. Even if we were able to use Europe's road transport system, it would still take a good deal of time. What would happen in the meantime? Would there be a reduction in hostilities, or —as was suggested by my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham)—an escalation, while everyone in Yugoslavia tried to secure their section of territory before the potential invasion? I believe that the violence would increase, rather than diminish.

If we invaded, what would be our objective? It would not be so simple as the objective involved in the Korean war—to move beyond a certain parallel—or that involved in the Gulf war, which was to drive the Iraqi forces back from the Kuwait border. Presumably, our aim would be to bring about a ceasefire; but no meaningful line exists in Yugoslavia. In fact, we should need to establish not merely an invasion, but a permanent military presence. We should have to achieve not just a military victory, but a takeover of civil power. That would mean army patrols on every street corner, and would create an almost unending situation from which we would have enormous difficulty in emerging. It could drag on for many years.

There would then be no way out, unless we were prepared to commit massive forces and, possibly, to use methods on the ground that the House—indeed, all civilised opinion—would deem unacceptable for the maintenance of the basics of law and order. The situation in Bosnia has justified General Sherman's dictum that "war is hell". If we intervened, we would be deeply immersed in that hell.

How could we guarantee the continuation of peace after we had left? Moreover, how could we answer the all-important question, "Will the British public give us the support we need?"? Are the public now loudly demanding action? I have to say that the awful situation in Bosnia is not the subject of unending talk in the pubs and clubs of the black country, and I suspect that not many other members are under pressure from their constituents to suggest intervention in the region. Without such support, how could we bring matters to a successful conclusion?

We must say, bluntly and honestly, that we cannot be the world's policeman—or, in the words of John Bright during the Crimean war, "the knight errant of the human race". We should not bring injury and death into the homes of our soldiers. Ultimately, we must say that we cannot go out and get involved in such an appalling situation—that this is not our war.

7.34 pm

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): I listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar) with respect, but also with profound sadness. I trust that the House and members of my Front Bench will forgive me if, like the Irishman, I say that I would not have started from here.

In the small hours of 12 December 1991—the first occasion on which Yugoslavia had been debated in the House since the beginning of the current troubles—I urged the Government to take some action. Dubrovnik and Vukovar were being shelled. I still believe that, if we had put aircraft and a naval patrol in the area then, there might have been no necessity for today's debate. Since then, I have tried hard to argue effectively that not only a moral dimension but a political responsibility is involved.

Just over half an hour ago, I left the Chamber briefly to sit in the Foreign Secretary's room with Haris Silajdzik, the Bosnian Foreign Minister. I shall not, of course, reveal what was said, but over the past few months I have had many conversations with Mr. Silajdzik: he is deeply impressive, and anyone who has met him—as have a number of hon. Members on both sides of the House—will know that he is a man of great quality and dignity.

Since I first met Mr. Silajdzik for the first time in December last year, another 50,000 of his countrymen have been killed: the figure now stands at around 200,000. Some 75,000 have been maimed—most are without legs, and many are children; at least 30,000 women have been raped. That is the catalogue of enormity and horror that we must contemplate today.

That, however, is not the only issue. In 1914, Europe was destabilised for 50 years or more following events in the Balkans. If what is now happening spreads, as it may do, to Kosovo and Macedonia, inevitably drawing in Bulgaria, Albania, Greece and Turkey—with two NATO countries fighting each other—and possibly spreading to Romania, it is not inconceivable that a conflagaration would result that would destabilise Europe for another 50 years. That is what we should consider when debating what should now be done.

I make no accusation about the good faith of the Government; I have never done so. Surely, however, no one can deny two facts. First, it cannot be denied that the largest share of blame for the horrors that we have witnessed lies with Serbia; secondly, it cannot be denied that our collective policy—it is not just a British policy—has been manifestly ineffective.

I consider the present situation the gravest that Europe has faced since the end of the second world war. Hon. Members sometimes point out that problems exist in Angola and Cambodia; of course problems exist all over the world, but the fact that we cannot act everywhere does not mean that we should act nowhere. If we know that there is a bad house fire in Manchester and that we cannot get there, we have no excuse for not helping our next-door neighbour if his house starts to burn down.

The Yugoslavian conflict is at the heart of Europe. Whatever happens there will affect our lives and those of our children. If the world order and the European powers are proved to be ineffective, the signal that will be sent out will be dire. In this post cold war era, which is in itself so unstable, it will lead to more situations such as that which we are debating now.

What do we do? It would have been easier to act earlier, but that does not mean that we can do nothing now. Last week I was talking to the Foreign Secretary with officers of the all-party parliamentary Bosnian group. The Foreign Secretary was kind enough to admit that there was some merit in the idea that I put to him: why cannot the Prime Minister and Presidents Mitterrand and Clinton, as leaders of the three permanent members of the Security Council, communicate to Milosevic the notion "Thus far and no further", that the international order will never accept what has been brutally gained and that aggrandisement as the result of invasion and destruction is not acceptable?

Those of us who met Mr. Salidjic today heard that of every four prisoners captured by the Muslims—they do take prisoners occasionally—at least two are Serbian and one is from Montenegro. The tanks are still moving in and the Bosnians have no tanks.

The Bosnians are not all Muslims—let us nail that lie now. Bosnia was a multi-ethnic country which lived in peace until relatively recently. It still has an internationally recognised multi-ethnic Government and a Parliament whose Speaker is a Serb. Several Ministers are Serbs and others are Croats. Rightly or wrongly, we recognised Bothnia as an independent sovereign state. We are talking about a state that has been invaded and continues to be invaded, weekly if not daily. Tanks roll in from Serbia, and the Bosnians have no tanks.

Personally, I am not greatly enamoured of the idea of breaking the arms embargo, although it was an embargo against Yugoslavia, which does not now exist. But what can one say to a Foreign Minister who says that he does not want our people to die? He says that we can take them away if we must although he welcomes their marvellous humanitarian aid but, for God's sake, if we cannot stop the war, can we let the Bosnians stop it themselves and die for their own country? That is an exceptionally difficult argument to refute morally, although I would prefer us to make a final attempt at bringing the conflict to an end.

I should like us to communicate to Milosevic the notion that Sarajevo is a United Nations protected city and that any further attack on it will be regarded as an attack on the United Nations. I should like us to deliver an ultimatum to Serbia to the effect that we shall take appropriate action. Why agonise over that in particular? That has been the problem all along.

We invalidated the doctrine of the deterrent from the start by saying that we would take no action. As armchair generals, we sit around and say, "Do this, that or the other." It is possible to say that we shall take the appropriate action, which can take a variety of forms. Sometimes, a specific air strike can have a dramatic effect, and I need only say the word "Libya" to prove that.

Something that Haris Salidjic said to me today convinced me that we must get the message to Serbia. As he said, in the second world war there were leaflet drops, so why not warn the Serbian population, which is the subject of constant black propaganda, of what the world thinks? That would help to reinforce much of the opposition there but, day after day, the people are fed the siege mentality black propaganda. There are things that can be done.

Hon. Members of all parties have said that the Vance-Owen plan is far from perfect. That is so, but the Muslims have signed it, or rather the multi-ethnic Bosnian Government have signed it, the Croats have signed it, and pressure can and should be put on the Serbs to sign it. It has been put to the Foreign Secretary many times—I put it to him again this afternoon—that, if a peace is brokered under international auspices, it will be internationally guaranteed. Just as he said yes on 13 January, he said yes again today. We must try to take action to bring the conflict to a close.

I see by your movements, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I must bring my speech to a close. I appeal to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, who will reply for the Government, not to throw away all the aces but to keep Milosevic guessing and make him and Karadzic realise that we mean business. We should make it clear that we are not prepared to see a sovereign state extinguished from the map of Europe.

7.45 pm

Mr. Ken Livingstone (Brent, East): I am struck by the fact that we are constantly told by the apologists for inaction that we are witnessing a civil war. We should examine that proposition a little more closely. Bosnia is not a nation of long standing with a fair history and which is now disintegrating. It is a wholly artificial construct.

There was no Yugoslavia before the end of the first world war. There was no demand from the peoples of the area that it should be created. It was created by great imperial powers at the end of the first world war and imposed on the people without a plebiscite. The people of Slovenia and Croatia were not consulted about whether they would be part of the new Yugoslavia. Broadly speaking, where Bosnia now stands has been a major international dividing line for almost 2,000 years. When the Roman empire split, it was the border between the eastern and western empires. It became the border between Christianity and Islam. One could not hope to bridge the area and not expect problems.

I am also struck by the fact that the apologists for inaction say that the problem with the Croats is that they are all fascists and are on Hitler's side. It is interesting that we are told that history seems to have started in 1940, because in the 1920s and 1930s people—including Members of Parliament at the time—signed international letters condemning the Serbian oppression of the Croats in Yugoslavia. There were protests when the Serbian royal family, a member of whom was to become the king of Yugoslavia, began assassinating and eliminating the political leadership of the Croats. I condemn the Croats who lined up with Hitler as I condemn the resulting butchery. However, let us not forget: they have been subjected to two decades of oppression as a minority in Yugoslavia. We must remember that when we hear these sweeping condemnations.

I cannot find any political party in any part of former Yugoslavia that I would be happy to join—the parties would probably not be happy to have me. It is not easy for those of us who are used to having to look for someone with whom we can agree ideologically—the goodies, of whichever party. There is no obvious group with which we could line up, and virtually all sides have bloodstained hands from events of the past few decades and centuries.

I believe that one principle should guide us in this horrendous mess. There is an equally horrendous mess around the borders of the old Soviet Union and, indeed, in parts of Russia today and also in the completely artificial nations created in much of the third world, especially in Africa. That principle is self-determination. It is on this point that the Government and the Opposition have failed most abysmally.

When Yugoslavia started to disintegrate, Slovenia and Croatia held free and fair ballots for the people to decide whether they wished to remain part of Yugoslavia or become independent. They voted overwhelmingly and I am not surprised, because the people of Slovenia and Croatia saw what was happening. I suppose that the only tribute one can pay to Tito is that he kept a lid on the mess for the best part of two generations. However, at his death, the Serbian ruling class, the leadership and the elite, began to debate a Greater Serbia.

In 1987, the Serbian Academy of Sciences voted for a Greater Serbia. There were no protests internationally or in the House when Milosevic suppressed the Kosovo Parliament. Kosovo is 90 per cent. Albanian, and the Serbs went in. In Kosovo, there are virtually no Albanian doctors practising, no Albanian teachers teaching and no Albanian children in schools. Virtually all Albanians are out of work. There is massive and sustained pressure because of the long historic demand that the Serbs have for that area.

Where was the protest? Nothing was done. That lack of action drove the Croat people into the arms of the thoroughly unpleasant leadership that emerged. Virtually no hon. Members in the House could find anything good to say about that leadership. What happened? I remember the first debate in the House in which a junior Minister in the Foreign Office was sent here, after the votes of the Slovene and Croat peoples. He stood at the Dispatch Box and said that the British Government's view was for the status quo and that they did not want Yugoslavia to unwind. That is what happened, instead of the people in the area being asked what they wanted and the matter being looked at objectively.

The people had just voted for independence in a free ballot. We decided that it was inconvenient and the Government jumped up and said that they completely agreed. How inconvenient that people should vote for the same right to national self-determinations that we have taken for granted for 1,000 years. What right do we have to deny people that?

The main principle that will get us through a difficult decade as such problems unwind across the face of the planet is self-determination—what people demand at the ballot box. We would have the same problem if 51 per cent. of the people of Scotland voted for independence. Would we fight to keep them? It would be a mess. The principle of self-determination applies close to home in Europe as much as it applies in other parts of the world.

We must accept that Serbia has a clear idea of what it wants. That idea has been argued by its intellectuals, its academics and the political leaders of Greater Serbia. They have pursued it logically and clearly, in the same way as Hitler pursued his strategy to unite all the German people in one nation. The rest of the world, and especially Britain, has been totally reactive. We did not once anticipate what was coming.

I do not think that any one has any doubt that, unless Milosevic is stopped in his ambition to carve up more of Bosnia, and we let him get away with it, we will see a much greater conflagration in Kosovo and Macedonia. I do not say that it is a repeat of Hitler in the 1930s. Hitler led one of the most massive industrial powers and a vast nation. The conflagration in Kosovo and Macedonia will not be conflagration on that scale, but it is the same principle.

I have sat in the House sometimes and thought that it must have been the same mood—this is what it must have sounded like as, year after year, weasel-worded people got up at the Dispatch Box and said, "Czechoslovakia is a long way away. It is a small country of no significance to us. Hitler has legitimate aspirations but we do not understand him." Some hon. Members said that the policies of the Nazi regime towards the Jews were an internal matter and no concern of theirs. That must have been the same as hearing people now say that the rape of women as an active policy is an internal matter and cannot be a matter for the international community.

That was the reality when the world was divided on ideological lines—when people were in one camp or the other. Some order and discipline was maintained in the communist and capitalist camps. That world has gone and we face a more dangerous situation. In a sense, all the problems can unravel and unwind and we must decide how we will be guided through them. The principle of self-determination will help, but people in the world who have little power—those who are in a minority, trapped in other nations or supporters of a religious minority—have the right to expect that world opinion and pressure will be brought to bear when abhorrent regimes practise policies that include genocide. That is why I condemned China's actions in Tibet and Iraq's bombing of the Kurds. It is why I support minorities that are oppressed by the regime that they may be trapped inside.

Having moved out of the cold war world, we must create an international mechanism that moves to stop the abuse of human rights. That is why I agree with everything that my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) said. I am prepared to see as many ground troops as it takes for as long as it takes. If we do not stop Milosevic in Bosnia, we will have to fight a much worse conflict in Macedonia. If we do not act in Macedonia, there will be another conflict involving nuclear weapons somewhere on the fringe of the Soviet Union.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): It is a privilege to take part in what is for many of us an emotional and important debate. We are debating the spiral of violence in the Balkans that we see nightly on our television screens. The media like to put labels around one's neck. I am a minimalist. Unlike the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone), I want minimum intervention. I am frightened that we have become more involved in the quagmire in the past six months. If we have another debate in six months' time, I fear that we will find that we are even deeper in the mire.

I will not be accused of being an appeaser or a user of weasel words. However, I beg hon. Members to be a little more cautious about committing British troops to combat for unlimited periods for confused and blurred objectives. Before I entered politics, I was an infantry soldier for 10 years—twice on active service. A driver was killed alongside me. It behoves all of us with such a background to remember that we are talking about human lives; we are talking about our constituents and our countrymen.

Let us put the Balkans in some sort of perspective. The world's major religions meet in the Balkans. There has been ethnic feuding in the region for 300 years. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary made an authoritative and excellent speech this afternoon, but perhaps he was a little optimistic in thinking that some time in the next 30 years all the fighting in that part of the world will miraculously come to an end.

The United Nations is desperately overstretched. Countries have not been paying their dues—and the United States is a bad offender. There is an unwillingness, which I entirely understand, for sovereign Governments to commit their troops to fight other people's wars. When we hear the demand for troops on the ground to be dispatched, it is not made clear exactly who will supply those troops. It is impossible for that world body, the United Nations, to deal with the 25 conflicts and the 70 potential flashpoints in the world. In the past, it has not tried to deal with them. In Cambodia, 1·5 million people were killed in the civil war—one fifth of the population was destroyed. It was not expected that the United Nations should intervene and become a third party to the dispute in Uganda or Biafra.

In Angola, we all know that UNITA lost the election but is now back fighting its corner. Is there a call in the House to take action against UNITA? I do not think so. We are being lead by the media—we must be cautious about this—like little dogs on a lead. The pictures are incredibly emotional. Many people saw the young boy who had been blinded the other day when meeting his brother. I told my wife on the telephone what I had seen on television and she said that the family cried when they saw it. That has been a common experience throughout the country.

The media are fickle. We all know that, if British Tornado pilots were to kill men, women and children while trying to take out a strategic bridge in Serbia, those pictures would be flashed around the world and those reporters in the media who are saying, "You must do something," would be saying, "My God, what have you done? Bring them back."

As the Secretary of State well knows, I was cautious about the commitment of the Cheshires to Bosnia. In the past, humanitarian aid has been entirely a civilian matter organised by the United Nations. I am the first to pay tribute to the commanding officer of the Cheshires and to the sterling work that they have done. However, I still have reservations. If we switch on our radios at breakfast time tomorrow and hear that there has been some heavy shelling and 12 soldiers have been killed, will we all say how marvellous it was that that battalion was given that task? We have put them in a most invidious position.

I hope that the Secretary of State will explain why British soldiers have been used to bring out in body bags the bodies of those who have been massacred. I am told that it is because no one else was prepared to do it. It is insulting and humiliating for our officers to be held up at checkpoints by drunken bums with kalashnikovs. I query the role that the Cheshire battalion has been given. I wish that we did not intend to replace it. The winter is over. There is a tremendous job to be done in dispersing food. I do not deny that for a moment, but the end of the winter might have been the moment to bring that style of operation to a halt. By all means let us have medical personnel, engineers, communications experts and so on in Bosnia, but I am doubtful about keeping a British battalion there carrying out its present role.

We have been told that the way forward now is to allow the Muslims to have the arms they need. They are short of artillery and tanks. That is a crazy suggestion. It is nonsense to imagine that we would help to resolve the conflict by upping the scale of military hardware. Instead of rifles, there would be machine guns; there would be precision-guided missiles and more and more rockets; and more artillery would be introduced which would kill more people. That cannot be the solution.

There is a danger that the Serbs would get the surplus equipment sitting in Russia waiting for a home rather more quickly than the Muslims would get their equipment from their friends in the middle east. It could be that, within six weeks, the balance of power would be, if anything, more in favour of the Serbs than the Muslims.

I ask hon. Members to think carefully before they call for surgical strikes. Heaven knows, we know what happened in Vietnam, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) said. Some of the American air force generals who talked about surgical strikes were responsible for the fiasco when the United States tried to get its hostages out of Tehran. Surgical strikes mean killing men, women and children. If strikes are to be effective, one needs observers on the ground. They entail involvement of people physically walking, using their radios to report back.

I appreciate that I am running out of time, Madam Deputy Speaker. My message is that we cannot bring about the good governance of every country in the United Nations. That is simply impossible. There is a danger that we would make matters worse. We can attempt to douse the flames. We should go in for humanitarian effort. But we cannot colonise the countries that are misbehaving or where human rights are a disgrace.

In the 1980s, the cry went up that something had to be done about the Lebanon. A bloody, bitter civil war was taking place and there was degradation and despair on all sides. We had no direct interests, but western countries felt that they should help. The multinational force was dispatched. What did it achieve? Some months later, more than 200 United States marines were killed. Shortly after that, the multinational force was withdrawn. No historian would say that it was anything other than a disaster.

I happened to be in Washington when that force was withdrawing. You may remember, Madam Deputy Speaker, that the United States used a world war two battleship, the USS Jersey, to shell the Chouf mountains. Each shell took out an area the size of a football pitch. We watched that on television in the United States. The image stuck in my mind. There was total misunderstanding in the United States of the local scene in Beirut, the local politics, the local ethnic communities and the intricacies of life in a city like Beirut. For heaven's sake let us learn from our previous mistakes and be cautious about greater involvement in the Balkans.

8.4 pm

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): I begin by congratulating the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) on his speech. It is remarkable in this place to find someone who is willing to admit that he has changed his mind. It is even rarer to find someone who is prepared to admit that he was wrong. He did that today in a most eloquent speech.

As the case for military intervention in Bosnia has gathered pace and won more support, a formidable chorus of voices has been raised against that case. We have heard echoes of those arguments in the debate today. We have been told that no British or western national interest is at risk in Bosnia so there is no reason why we should intervene militarily. We have been told that there are other bigger and better wars around the world so why should we become militarily involved in Bosnia. We have been told that there is no guarantee of success.

We have been told that massive numbers of ground forces would be required. We have been told that it will endanger the lives of UN forces and jeopardise humanitarian relief. We have been told that arming the Muslims would escalate the conflict and increase civilian death, injury and suffering. We have been told that air strikes against supply lines would endanger civilian life and cause Serbian retaliation. Of course, all that is true.

However, not only in the debate but previously, far less emphasis has been placed on the risks of doing nothing about what is happening in Bosnia. There is a formidable risk in inaction and failure to take effective military action. From day one, and certainly since British troops were first involved in the United Nations contingent, there has been uncertainty and confusion about not only Her Majesty's Government's political objectives but the whole exercise. The House has been denied a debate on this crucially important issue since last November. I believe that that is because the Government are embarrassed about public scrutiny of their policies, primarily because they have no coherent policy on Bosnia.

NATO military commanders had a perfect right this week to call for clear political direction. The job of the military is to arrange military power to achieve political objectives. There are many objectives at play in Bosnia. The overriding political objective is to stop genocide, stop territorial gain by military aggression, create safe havens, secure an effective ceasefire, encourage joint negotiations to secure future political settlement, secure adequate food, water and medical supplies, to release detainees, sustain displaced persons—let us not forget that there are between 2 million and 3 million in Bosnia now—and bring war criminals to book.

I cannot see how those objectives can be achieved without military intervention mobilised by and through NATO under the overall command of the United Nations. That inevitably calls for a major ground force. Like other hon. Members, I came to that conclusion reluctantly, but nevertheless I accept the consequences of that and I say clearly and unequivocally that those forces need to be deployed in numbers that military commanders judge to be necessary. They should remain there until, in the view of military commanders and their political leaders, their job is complete.

I do not know how many will be required, but we must have to recall, as various military experts have done recently, that the Germans occupied the whole of Yugoslavia with five divisions. We should also understand that, if the Vance-Owen agreement were to be implemented—and I agree with many who have spoken that that agreement is dead—that would require at least 100,000 military personnel and possibly many more.

[Mr. Max Madden]

All of the options we have had paraded not only in this debate but before, have implications for military ground forces. Ground forces, in my view, would be reinforced by air strikes against all those exercising aggression to secure territorial gain—I emphasise "all"—and against supply lines, airfields and other military targets. A total blockade is to be established and I believe that very severe action must be taken against those who are flouting the operation of sanctions—and we all know that they are numerous. Intense diplomatic effort must be made to isolate Serbia and to bring all parties to the negotiating table.

The main aggressor is undoubtedly Serbia. It has an enormous arms superiority and is responsible for many, if not most, of the atrocities which have been committed, including the systematic rape of women designed to humiliate and demoralise the Muslims. The hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) said that 200,000 have been killed. That includes 14,000 children under the age of 14. They have been slaughtered—and the bulk of them were Muslim.

The conflict has been met by hand-wringing and dithering inaction. That will be seen by many, especially those in the Islamic world, as part of a world wide conspiracy against Islam. We should take this factor on board if, in the future, we are to come to terms with the surge of nationalism and the rivalry between minorities —including ethnic and religious minorities. If we are to come to terms with the surge for the right to self-determination, for the right of people to decide their own destinies, the United Nations and the European Community must recognise those realities. The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) was right to say that the United Nations and the European Community are singularly ill-equipped to deal with those political realities.

The hon. Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend) told me that when he visited the United Nations, its control room monitoring the conflict shuts down at the weekend. Is this the way in which the architects of the new world order intend to approach such intensely complex and complicated issues? I fear it is not and that we, the political leaders of this country, should ensure that the international forum that we charge with this responsible task should be properly equipped and resourced to carry it out.

I attended a broadcast debate recently in which a representative of The Times and the Minister of State at the Foreign Office, the right hon. and learned Member for Grantham, (Mr. Hogg) participated. Lord Bonham-Carter intervened to say that that was not the first time that The Times and a Hogg had sung the same tune. He recalled that the Minister's father ran a by-election campaign in the 1930s, under the memorable slogan, "Vote Hogg and save your bacon."

I venture to submit that the stench of appeasement hangs over the Government—and, indeed, over every EC Government. In my view, we do have an obligation to the people of Bosnia—Muslim, Croat and Serb—to defend their independent country from external aggression.

This debate is long overdue. I hope that the voices that have been raised today calling for military intervention will grow and continue to gather popular support. Unlike many other hon. Members who have spoken, I am getting a great deal of pressure from constituents—and they are certainly not all Muslims—for Britain to intervene militarily and effectively. People have said to me that they are ashamed to be British at this particular juncture. I can understand their point of view.

I hope very much that when the Government respond to the debate they will recognise that if we authorise air strikes, inevitably there will be retaliation and a vital need for ground forces. Let us, for God's sake, ensure that those ground forces are properly organised and equipped to do the job.

8.14 pm

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): Those of us who take part in this debate do so with mixed feelings of pride, anger, frustration and humility. We feel pride at the successes of our forces, and civilians too, in delivering humanitarian aid to Bosnia; anger at what is going on in that country—the bloodshed, the rape and the ethnic cleansing; frustration at our inability, so far, to stop the atrocities and humility because it is someone else's country that is being fought over by peoples whom we do not altogether understand, and because it is difficult, though not impossible, to define Britain's national interest. The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) in fact defined it extremely well.

Before we look for an acceptable and workable plan for peace in Bosnia, it is as well to consider what caused those wars—I use the plural deliberately because too many people refer merely to a three-sided civil war. We should not forget that Bosnia, a sovereign state, has been invaded by Serbia.

Hostilities started because the cohesion of communism —the glue which held Yugoslavia together—was removed. Totalitarianism was suddenly replaced by tribalism. In potentially volatile, though heterogeneous communities, tolerance gave way to the fear of minority groups becoming second-class citizens, deprived of their rights, freedoms, property and even their limbs and their lives. Imagine the sudden awful realisation that their neighbour, with whom they and their forebears had co-existed for centuries, was their enemy and that their enemy's enemy was not their friend, but their enemy, too. That is what has happened in this ghastly triangular conflict and it has fanned the flames of war still further.

I do not believe that there was a sudden release of centuries of pent-up ethnic hatred when Yugoslavia fell apart, although I acknowledge that some settling of old scores has triggered repeated reprisals. The problems of former Yugoslavia were exacerbated by the western powers' rush to recognise the independence and sovereignty of former parts of that country without giving any copper-bottomed guarantees to minority groups.

It might have been possible to recognise Slovenia, but it was certainly not possible to recognise Croatia. The fact that no guarantees were given to the Serb minorities led directly to Serbia's invasion of that country. That was just one reason for the 1991 invasion: the other was Serbia's policy to create a greater Serbia and to drive through a northern corridor between Belgrade and the Adriatic.

Before we debate what should be done about Bosnia, we should consider the current situation in Croatia. UN Security Council resolution 743 and subsequent resolutions led to the establishment of UNPROFOR—the UN protection force. The most recent resolution, 815, extends the UN mandate until 30 June.

Croatia is a real test of the UN's ability to enforce such resolutions. At present 15,000 out of some 22,000 troops in former Yugoslavia are stationed in Croatia. They are drawn from 14 different countries. But Serbia is still in unlawful possession of vast areas of Croatia. Nothing has been done to persuade the Serbs to withdraw from those parts of the country that they have unlawfully occupied; the United Nations has failed to remove them.

Many observers feel that the United Nations' failure in Croatia encouraged the Serbs to continue their military aggression and invade Bosnia. The credibility of the United Nations is at stake. Other belligerants around the world—of which there are many—will be encouraged by the UN's failure to enforce its Security Council resolutions. Bosnia is already paying the price. Who will be next? There are 25 wars now being waged throughout the world. The UN is involved in 17 of them and they are all civil wars.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Twenty-six with Northern Ireland.

Mr. Colvin: What should the United Nations do in former Yugoslavia? It may be best to acknowledge that we should leave Croatia to one side at present and deal first with Bosnia, where the position is more serious. One option is to do nothing. That would be a disaster. It would reward Serbian aggression and encourage the Serbs to take further aggressive action and to turn to Kosovo, Macedonia and who knows where. Many contributors to today's debate have reminded us how appeasement encouraged Hitler.

We could lift the arms embargo and let the parties fight it out, in which case humanitarian aid would have to cease. I believe that arms supplies would increase, and conflict and bloodshed would escalate. To lift the arms embargo, we would have to persuade Russia—as a permanent member of the UN Security Council, to agree, which it most certainly would not.

What about armed intervention? Military intervention would worsen the situation in former Yugoslavia. It would be difficult to define with clarity any military objectives. In addition, how would we withdraw if the policy failed? We have to acknowledge that Serbia has enough weapons and ammunition to fight a full-scale war for two years or more. The only way to stop the wheels of war turning is to have a full-scale blockade, but that will not work unless Russia, as well as Serbia's neighbours, Bulgaria and Romania, agree to co-operate. If a blockade is to be effective it must be coupled with a deadline. Unless an ultimatum is given to Serbia to co-operate, the blockade is unlikely to work.

What if the blockade is successful and there is a proper ceasefire? A growing number of people share the view that the Vance-Owen plan is now a non-starter, and a three-way partition of Bosnia is also ruled out. Therefore, there is no alternative but to return to the negotiating table and redraw the map of Bosnia. In any new negotiations, the Bosnian Serbs would be under far greater pressure to agree if a blockade was enforced. Only if the map is redrawn could the United Nations then be asked to set up a protectorate under chapter 12 of the UN charter. I believe that agreement on the map must come first; then the protectorate can be established. The negotiations would stand a better chance of success if they took place in the knowledge that the protectorate would follow.

Even if a plan was agreed by all the parties in former Yugoslavia, it could be achieved only if the UN was prepared to send in troops to underpin it and make it work properly. If that worked, we should have to start thinking about giving the UN the resources to repeat the operation elsewhere. Bosnia presents the western powers with a problem which has serious implications for world peace and the future of the United Nations. I have already referred to 25 conflicts around the world, 17 of which already involve the UN, but there are another 50 or so flashpoints around the world where hostilities could break out at any time.

8.25 pm

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South): In view of the shortage of time, I shall merely pick up on one or two of the issues raised by the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin). There have been continual references in the debate to the other flashpoints throughout the world, and the 25 wars—or, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) said, the 26 wars. I am sure that he was joking when he increased the number.

There is a difference in degree and character between those 25 wars and the position in former Yugoslavia, which is a legacy of the breakdown and the end of the cold war. Many of the other 25 wars are legacies of the cold war itself, with one side intervening on the part of another because the east or the west was involved. Such intervention increased the trouble as an attempt was made to secure victory for one particular combatant in the cold war. We must increasingly take account of those wars, but the position in former Yugoslavia is of immediate importance.

The hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside mentioned Serbian arms. There is no doubt that Serbia has a virtually limitless supply of arms and one of the best military complexes in its part of the world. It is ironic when people say that Russia is prepared to provide more arms to Serbia as the Serbians did not build up their military complex to defend themselves against the west, but against the east—the former USSR and its allies in the Warsaw pact. The idea that Russia will run to the aid of Serbia if the Bosnian nation is armed flies in the face of historical evidence.

It is easy to say—every hon. Member who has participated in the debate has done so—that we are appalled by the position in former Yugoslavia, particularly Bosnia. It makes not one jot of difference whether we are appalled or not. If we are appalled, it will make no difference to the number of lives lost, people maimed and women raped. The only way that we can begin to assist is to do something as an international community or to enable the Bosnian nation to take up arms in its own self-defence.

[Mr. Jim Marshall]

I shall stand back from the horror and seek to draw some conclusions from the mistakes that the international community has made. The present conflict involves some successes as well as errors.

The United Nations humanitarian aid programme has been a success, and a further success is represented by the fact that the states bordering the former Yugoslavia have not yet been drawn into the conflict. Thirdly, the belated safe city policy, which I hope will turn into a safe haven policy, will provide some succour in the coming months.

These successes, however, are far outweighed by the failures. First, there has been the lack of any overall objective, adopted either by the European Community or latterly by the western allies. Secondly, there was the precipitate recognition of the former republics of Yugoslavia. Thirdly, there was the Vance-Owen plan which is now seen, if not actively to be encouraging ethnic cleansing, at least implicitly to recognise it. Lastly, there is the blanket arms embargo on the former republic of Yugoslavia.

There is no doubt in my mind that these failings have fuelled Serb and Croatian nationalism in Bosnia, encouraging Bosnian Serbs and Croats to take up arms, as they have done in the past 12 months—ably assisted and abetted by their masters in Serbia and Croatia.

In the meantime, the multi-ethnic Bosnian Government are virtually powerless, and, despite their cries for international assistance, they remain defenceless and they have not a cat in hell's chance of the international community exhibiting the political will to intervene in sufficient numbers to separate the combatants in Bosnia. If we do not realise this, we fail to understand one of the principal motives of western policy.

Air strikes are becoming increasingly popular among armchair generals. When they were used in Iraq and elsewhere, many people were critical of them, but now they seem to be becoming the day's best treat. Air strikes are nothing but a figleaf for military inaction. Unless they are the precursor of further military action, they will make no difference. And to pretend that air strikes will make any significant difference to the position of the Bosnian Government flies in the face of the evidence.

The arms embargo is virtually a pro-Serbian and pro-Croatian policy, since both countries have access to huge amounts of arms already. The Bosnian Serbs can acquire further supplies from the Serbian republic, while the Bosnian Government and people are denied the elementary right of self-defence.

The policy implied here is that a political solution in Bosnia will be reached only when the Serbs and Croats have realised all their territorial ambitions, whereupon the Bosnian Government will be reluctantly forced to accept the political fact of a rump Bosnian state.

In the meantime, people still advocate no intervention, but until this military and political stalemate has been achieved, thousands more men, women and children—Bosnian Muslims, Bosnians Serbs and Bosnian Croats—will be maimed or killed. That is intolerable.

I am driven to the view that the west intends to take no action, but I believe that we should at least admit that the Bosnian Government and nation have the right of self-defence, the right to defend the lives of their people and to try to defend the integrity of their territory. The only way of doing that and the only positive policy that we can offer the Bosnian Government is a partial lifting of the arms embargo so that the Bosnian Government can acquire the elementary means of self-defence which the west has been denying them.

8.34 pm

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): At this stage in a debate of this character, many of the best and most necessary points will already have been made. Having listened to most of the debate, I believe that I can add only a little of value, so I shall try to be as brief as I can.

I want to look at these important questions under three disarmingly simple rhetorical headings. The first is: why are we in this position? When I say "we", I mean not only the House of Commons—it is interesting to speculate why this matter has not been fully debated here before—but the unfortunate people of Bosnia. Why are they in this tragic position?

I also want to say a word or two about some of the options already touched on fairly fully in this debate; and, thirdly, I want to discuss what I believe to be the least bad way forward in this unhappy situation.

Clearly, the original cause of these difficulties was the collapse of the communist yoke in Yugoslavia itself. Whatever else one says about the former Yugoslavia, it worked in a miraculous way to hold in check all the ethnic differences that have now bubbled out, with the tragic consequences that go under the headings of ethnic cleansing and tribalism. But there is more to it than that. The influence of the mass media on both politicians and public has had its effect, and not only by confusing and troubling us in the so-called free world; it has also had dramatic effects on the dramatis personae in the former Yugoslavia.

As we saw in the Iraq-Kuwait conflict and on other occasions, the media not only manipulate us, willingly or unwillingly; they are also used themselves, wittingly or unwittingly, by the participants. I have heard awful but true stories from people who have been out to Bosnia about the way in which certain parties to the conflict have wrought havoc and destruction on their own vulnerable peoples so as to make a point on CNN or world television.

So, we need to be not only idealistic and moralistic but also cynical. It is hard to hold all these perspectives in the mind at one time.

The issue has already been influenced by Lady Thatcher. I have not heard her much mentioned in this debate, but her influence on the American public is still considerable—and on the way in which opinion evolves within the Beltway in Washington.

Then there is the nature of American politics, something about which many of us know a bit at first or second hand. In the past, the only way the Americans have been mobilised for war, civil or abroad, has been by introducing the moral imperative. That can be very dangerous in situations that do not lend themselves to moral courses of action.

There is also the difficulty of the historical precedents, most of which are beguiling and false and some overlooked, which are used in cases like this. I do not believe that the Gulf war is a legitimate precedent for what is possible or desirable in this case. If hon. Members have had amnesia about some of the historical issues, they have had amnesia about the inability of the most powerful nation in the world—the Americans—to subjugate the Vietcong over many years in Vietnam and the equal inability of the Soviets to subjugate the Afghan rebels in territory which is perhaps a little more similar, in topographical terms, to the territory in Bosnia.

What should we do next? The options have been well rehearsed. I believe that we should continue the humanitarian aid effort plus what the Foreign Secretary described as the peace process. He was right to describe it as a peace process, a phrase that is also applied in the middle east context. The Vance-Owen peace plan is, as has been said in this debate on many occasions, now looking a bit dated and irrelevant.

We must turn the economic sanctions, the effect of which has been rather pitiful so far, into a meaningful economic blockade. For example, I understand that until very recently any lorry or land traffic which could claim that it was in transit through Bosnia and the former Yugoslavia was not affected by any meaningful restrictions. Clearly, things were labelled as being in transit and then, surprise, surprise, they ended up in the relevant place to add to the warfare.

We must also consider the use of selective air strikes. That proposal has been at the heart of this debate. I see only three possible rationales for such a tactic. The first would be as a placebo to make us feel better, and we need only state that for it to be rejected.

The second rationale would be to use selective air strikes as a controlled experiment to test the reaction of the Serbs to see whether such action had any effective leverage over their desire or otherwise to come to the negotiating table. That is the most respectable reason for considering selective air strikes. However, it is not a conclusive reason.

The third rationale, which is the most likely because of the dynamic of escalation, would be to use selective air strikes as yet another step towards a full military commitment which would also involve substantial forces on the ground. I believe that the unwisdom of that was well expressed by Sir Richard Vincent, and I do not have to repeat what he said.

Were we to use ground troops in a peacemaking rather than a peacekeeping role, we would effectively be taking sides to punish aggression. That is a perfectly honourable thing for a nation or group of nations to do, but we must be very clear about the chances of that improving the situation at the end of the day.

Who really are the aggressors? Is Serbia the only aggressor? Obviously that is not the case. There are many other aggressors and no one is really clean. Should we rule out lifting the arms embargo as irresponsible and counterproductive? Yes, I believe that we should. It has been clear throughout this debate that this would be like throwing petrol on a bonfire. Most of the weapons would probably end up in the hands of the Serbs and Croats, and not in the hands of the Muslims, because they have more hard currency, better connections and a larger critical mass of territory to use for that purpose.

The lessons of history should teach us that it is nearly always a bad idea to edge backwards into a policy in which we do not believe and have not thought through. That would be a fair description of what is happening in Washington right now, and it explains to a large extent why President Clinton is taking an inordinately long time for someone with his razor-sharp intellect to reach some sensible conclusions.

What, then, is the least bad way forward? I believe that it is to combine a policy based on our national interest —after all, this is the British House of Commons and our first responsibility is to our voters and to our people—in an area where our national interest is not greatly engaged in the outcome, disagreeable though that may be to some people, with sensible humanitarian efforts and a certain ambiguity about the use of force. I understand the points made by my right hon. Friends the Members for Bridgwater (Mr. King) and for Guildford (Mr. Howell) about maintaining ambiguity. If we do not do that, we undercut the threat of force.

That means maintaining the food and medical aid, persisting with the movement of vulnerable people which is a very useful humanitarian activity. It includes tightening sanctions to the extent that they become effectively an economic blockade on Serbia. In that context, we should exhort the Russians and even use leverage on them, now that the referendum is out of the way, to owe us one and pay us one back in return.

We have been unusually generous to President Yeltsin and to the Russian people in recent times. It is time to call in our IOU if there is any danger of the blockade of Serbia being undermined. Above all, we must resist military escalation, which I believe may mean the necessity for firm, quiet, private advice from our Prime Minister to the President.

I remind the House that about 40 years ago Clem Attlee had to go very swiftly and necessarily, at the height of the Korean war and in slightly more serious circumstances than those that we face now, to dissuade President Truman, for whom I had the highest regard, from allowing General MacArthur to use the nuclear weapon against the Chinese and North Koreans.

In retrospect, we can see that was the right decision and a timely intervention. I hope that it will not be necessary for our Prime Minister to do that in quite such a dramatic form. However, I hope that Her Majesty's Government will act as a restraining influence, because I believe that it is not self-evident that the British national interest is such that we should involve ourselves deeply in a process which would only escalate and probably end in tears, not just for the tragic peoples of Bosnia, but also ultimately for the British people themselves.

8.45 pm

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): This is the nightmare debate that I have feared for two and a half years. As long ago as 1985, I addressed a meeting of the British Yugoslav Society in a Committee Room of this House and I pointed out the dangers of the over-decentralisation of that country as it was then. In April 1991, I sent a letter to the Prime Minister, who replied:

> "Under CSCE we support Yugoslavia's unity and also maintain the right of its peoples to self-determination. We thus believe that it is for all Yugoslavs to determine their country's future."

I was very concerned that we were not giving enough assistance to the federal Government at that time. We even failed to provide assistance through the know-how fund. Nevertheless, I was pleased to be able to tell the Foreign Secretary that I was glad that he had an even-handed approach to the situation in that country.

That was true in August 1991 when I first met Milosevic and Tudjman and was able to tell them that our country stood by the integrity of Yugoslavia. Unfortunately, in

[Mr. Robert N. Wareing]

January 1992 the British Government gave in to pressure from those with less sagacity than the Government—simply, I suggest, because of the opt-out on the Maastricht treaty—to the premature recognition of Croatia despite the Badinter report set up by Lord Carrington. That folly led to further folly. We then recognised Bosnia-Herzegovina. People have been talking about the Bosnians as a nation. There is no nationality of Bosnian. They are Serbs, Croats and Muslims. Even the Muslims are Serbs. They are the descendants of those who converted from the Orthodox religion to the Muslim religion during the time of the Ottoman empire.

People want to orchestrate action against the Serbs because the Serbs have committed atrocities. At least I had the guts to say to Milosevic, "Look, what are you doing in Kosovo?" I faced him and asked him that. I also faced Tudjman because the Croats are by no means innocent in all this.

Recent ceasefires have been broken by the Muslims. General Wahlgren, the Swedish commander of UNPROFOR, is reported in the New York Times as saying that the ceasefire was holding in Bosnia until the Muslims in Srebrenica broke it. He said that they broke it because they wanted to invoke western intervention. An article in a Los Angeles periodical, which I could produce, states that General McKenzie, the commander of the UNPROFOR forces until November 1992, said that every ceasefire that he had negotiated was broken by the Muslims. The reason he gave was that they wanted to get the west to intervene on their behalf.

There are 15,000 or 16,000 British troops in Bosnia, but the HVO—the Croat national army—has 60,000 troops there. It is not a Bosnian-Croat army. Colonel Bob Stewart was justly angry at the atrocities committed by the HVO. He said, "The HVO said 'no cameras' and I told them to get stuffed." He was right. The commander in chief of that army is the President of Croatia, President Tudjman, but that army is not the worst. The HOS troops wear Utashe arm bands and flaunt the swastika in areas around Mostar.

When I was in Geneva, the military adviser to David Owen told me that one of the biggest problems faced by the British Army was the HOS, but we still hear orchestrated campaigns about Serbian aggression. More than 60 per cent. of the land in Bosnia-Herzegovina was owned by Serbian people when the conflict started, but only 34 per cent. of the population are Serbs. Only one large town which could be described as Muslim has been taken by the Serbs—the town which controls the water supply to Banja Luka, which is a Serbian stronghold.

I have seen Bosnian Muslims at the Palic refugee camp in the north of Serbia looked after by Serbs and the International Red Cross. It is untrue to say that every Muslim is at risk. Ironically, those who are calling for military intervention in the former Yugoslavia are the same people who call for troops to be pulled out of Ireland. When an Italian plane was shot down by the Croats, people said, "Bomb the Serbs." When a French United Nations convoy was attacked by Muslims and people were killed, there was the same cry. On 26 January, the Croats launched their attack on Kriena and the cry was "Bomb the Serbs." When one of our soldiers was killed by Croat bullets, people again said, "Bomb the Serbs." The same cry was heard even when it was discovered that the attack on a bread queue in Sarajevo was by Muslims. On Friday there were television reports of Croat atrocities and on television last night we saw Muslims demanding to be allowed to search British tanks for civilians. Yet in both cases people said, "Bomb the Serbs."

My party talks about air strikes without understanding the consequences, not only for the civilian population but for humanitarian aid because the strikes would be on bridges across which that aid pours into Bosnia from Serbia. Most of the convoys come from Belgrade, across bridges such as that which I saw a few months ago. That is not a rational formulation of policy—it is giving in to an emotional spasm.

The Vance-Owen plans has often been held up as though it were sacrosanct, but in March 1992 there was another plan which all three parties agreed to sign. But then the Muslims withdrew. There are alternatives to the Vance-Owen plan. We must not become hung up on the idea that that is the only possibility on offer. Churchill once said that "jaw, jaw" was better than "war, war." Neither air strikes nor military intervention will solve the problem.

People do not think about the political consequences of intervention in Serbia. Two years ago, I spoke in the House about Vojislav Seselj. When I met Milosevic at that time I said, "The more bloodshed there is, the more this escalates and the more your position is at risk." He said, "What do you mean?" I said, "Seselj, the fascists, the chetnik radical party, the people who were responsible for the murder of 17 Croats in the area around Osijek." He said, "Oh no, they have only one or two Members of Parliament." In the election in December they won 75 of the 250 seats in the Yugoslav Parliament.

Air strikes, more military intervention or even tightening sanctions will not destroy Milosevic in favour of democratic forces. It will harness the decent Serbian people behind Seselj and people like him and war criminals. That would be piling folly upon folly. Last December I met Albanians in Kosovo who are under moderate leadership. They have legitimate complaints and need to have their human rights protected. The CSCE is there now and I was glad to hear the Foreign Secretary say that that will be strengthened. War in Bosnia will encourage extremists among the Albanians.

8.55 pm

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): The hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) made a powerful speech. The information that I have shows that there is little difference between the atrocities committed by all three parties to the conflict, the Serbs, the Croats and the Muslims in Bosnia. I say that on the basis of a visit there in February and some discussions. I agree that the Serbs are responsible for most of the aggression, but that does not mean that they commit the majority of the atrocities.

I heard it said today that because such atrocities are happening in the former Yugoslavia we should be ashamed to be British. That is most unfair. We should feel a sense of shame that human beings can behave in that way towards one another. They are worse than animals because animals rarely kill, other than for food. Through our soldiers we can feel a sense of pride in the courage and skill that they have dedicated to the distribution of humanitarian aid. They are under considerable threat and exercising their skill with great determination and humour. Their presence gives us an authority as well as a responsibility to try to work out where we should go from here.

There are many demands for further action but what should it be? The imposition of the Vance-Owen peace plan is not on the cards because it is not acceptable to all those who are concerned and the number of troops that it would require is massive. If we tried to impose the plan we would require about 10 times the number of troops in Northern Ireland, which means about 250,000.

Bombing the Serbs has been suggested, but those who suggest that speak about surgical bombing strikes. Bombs can be accurately aimed but they are not always accurate, and bombing would certainly not stop the Croats and Muslims murdering each other in central Bosnia. We could stand back and allow the Muslims to be armed, but such arms would need to be delivered by air, which would be extremely hazardous, or would have to come through Serbian or Croat lines and would no doubt be intercepted because I cannot imagine that the Muslims, who are being fought by both the Serbs and the Croats, would allow the arms to get through. They would probably be confiscated en route. Hon. Members have mentioned safe havens. I shall deal with that later, but one must ask who would protect those safe havens.

Every proposed solution is unrealistic because of the nature of the terrain and the ferocity of the three factions. It is unrealistic to expect an external imposition of a military solution. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgewater (Mr. King) said that we should not disclose too much of our hand but should keep the Serbs and others guessing about our intentions. This debate addressed several audiences but the audiences to which we should most address ourselves are those in the United States where people are agonising about their future course of action. In any event, Americans are more likely to listen to the debate than the Serbs.

We need to point out to the Americans the dangers of more action and the vulnerability of our troops. We are entitled to say to them that our troops are within range of Serb and other gun positions. I shall not go into detail but I have seen guns that cover our positions in Bosnia. We and the French are certainly entitled to say to the Americans and others, "You are not on the ground and we are. Do nothing to make the position worse."

It is clear from visits I have paid to America that the people in the Pentagon, in NATO, in SHAPE, in SACEUR, in the executive in the US Administration, appreciate the risks and problems that might be faced in Bosnia if we now escalate the situation. but it is not clear that that is understood on the Hill among the elected representatives or among the American media.

The points raised by Warren Christopher—the points on which he would insist in any further escalation of the war in Bosnia—show, in the four conditions he laid down, that "the goal must be clear and understandable to the American people."

Why the American people? The truth is that the American people, for their own reasons of American politics, are concerned to find a way ahead and to respond to the mass of emotion that is rightly sweeping across the world and demanding a response. He goes on to signal other points that must be fulfilled, but basically his four points are for American consumption.

If I am ruling out many ways in which the war might be escalated, do I believe that there is a possible way forward? First, sanctions could be increased to a full blockade, and we are entitled, as my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) said, as members of the Group of Seven, having promised substantial aid to Russia and with Russia having cleared out of the way the referendum to confirm Yeltsin in a position of authority, to demand full, active and positive co-operation from the Russians. That is an important new point.

Secondly, in terms of humanitarian aid, it is well known that our troops are pushing their brief to, and well beyond, the limits. When the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) demands safe havens, he must accept that in a small, local and pragmatic way, that is tending to happen in Bosnia now as the troops who are there for the distribution of humanitarian aid talk to each side and try to arrange solutions that are acceptable in local areas.

If we were to endorse and support the concept of a development of the Vance-Owen plan with different lines being drawn on the map of Bosnia and with a different geographical area being imposed on each side, it might work if it were pragmatic and local. But if that were to come from New York or some other area, it would not work. It is important to remember that our troops, who are performing well in Bosnia, are acting as a kind of dragging anchor, preventing the situation from drifting into total anarchy.

My third point has not been made before today. We in the United KIngdom have spent about £200 million so far on military force in Bosnia in assisting the distribution of humanitarian aid. All of that has gone effectively into supporting the military. Little has been offered in the way of reconstruction to former Yugoslavia. Every solution and every building block to be discussed so far has been negative, warning, in effect, "If you continue to advance, we shall bomb you," and "If you continue to advance, we shall allow arms to go through to your enemies."

We must think of more positive things to say to the people of the former Yugoslavia. Having spent £200 million on saving that country from the worst excesses of war, we and others could surely find some money to offer to the sides as an inducement—as a carrot as opposed to a stick—to come to the peace table and discuss the terms of a settlement.

We and the French are actively engaged in Bosnia. The three most effective economic nations—America, Japan and Germany—are, for their different reasons, not so engaged, but they could co-operate in a reconstruction plan. Further funds offered to the three sides through the United Nations could act as a bargaining counter and would represent a positive step forward.

I am not entirely without hope for Bosnia. The United States has been through the difficult period of the election and the new Administration is now fully engaged in discussing the issue. I am greatly impressed by the understanding in America of the problems of Bosnia. That must be fully debated so that that knowledge filters through to the American people. The Russians should now be called in to assist us. With that support and with the continued assistance of the troops on the ground, there might yet be hope for Bosnia.

9.4 pm

Ms Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): What is morally right in the former Yugoslavia is also in our self-interest, and those who have pretended that the two are in conflict are profoundly wrong. Serbia is the major aggressor in the former Yugoslavia and hon. Members who pretend either that there is a civil war or that all the parties are equally guilty are making an excuse for inaction against the major aggressor and are wrongly confusing the situation.

Serbia is trying to acquire territory by force. It has invaded other states recognised by the United Nations. It is deliberately engaging in ethnic cleansing. It is systematically slaughtering minorities and terrorising them out of the area that it wants to take. There has always been a lot of rape in times of war, but Serbia has organised a new war crime; the systematic and deliberate use of rape as a weapon of ethnic cleansing to shame women, children and even men—the latter is not much talked about because of the absolute horror of male rape.

It is a pretence to claim that the Bosnian Serbs are not controlled, succoured and given all the resources that they need by the Serbian state. Serbia has already taken 30 per cent. of Croatian territory and 70 per cent. of Bosnia. The aggressor is succeeding. We know that Serbia wants more. We know that it wants to ethnically cleanse Kosovo. If we do not stop it, it will go there. We know that it wants Macedonia. Therefore, it is not a civil war.

The voices in the House that have constantly said that the situation is dangerous and that military action must be ruled out have given the green light to Serbian aggression. They have been saying "Carry on, do nothing." Anyone who has said that there can be no military intervention until all the parties have agreed is reinforcing the Serbian veto. It was the Serbs who would not go for the Vance-Owen plan—a deeply flawed plan that rewards and encourages ethnic cleansing.

Those who say that there can be no action without agreement from the Serbs, and that no military action can be taken to stop the Serbs, are telling the Serbs to carry on with their aggression, ethnic cleansing, rape and the taking of territory because we will do nothing. That, I am afraid, has been the stance of our Government. It is shameful, and also deeply dangerous to the self-interest of the British people, which the Government are not protecting.

There is no doubt that Croatia is also an aggressor—on a lesser scale but nonetheless an aggressor—engaged in a breach of international law in seeking to acquire territory by force. The aggression in which it is engaged is encouraged by the Vance-Owen plan because that would divide Bosnia into ethnic enclaves. Now Croatia wants to take those enclaves into its state. As others have said, the Vance-Owen plan is dead, and we need to learn the lesson that ethnic enclaves in Bosnia are not the way forward for peace in the former Yugoslavia. We need to protect and celebrate multi-ethnic Bosnia rather than break it down.

Bosnia is the major victim. It surprises me, but it is interesting that frequently in the media, and often in the House, there is talk of Muslim Bosnia. That is wrong; that is false. I wonder why they do it. There is no doubt that the majority of the people of Bosnia are Muslim, but Bosnia is a multi-ethnic state, and that is an important part of what is at stake in the conflict. Some 26 per cent. of Bosnian families are mixed. Muslims, Croats and Serbs intermarry and live side by side in the same families in the same cities. The Bosnian fighters, who are fighting almost without arms, with only rifles against large aggressors with major equipment, are Muslims, Serbs and Croats.

It is wrong to talk about Bosnia as if it were only a Muslim state; it is a multi-ethnic state that was recognised by the United Nations and that has all the same rights as Kuwait in international law. We are seeing it decimated, broken up and ethnically cleansed with deep war crimes, yet many hon. Members have said that we must do nothing about it.

We are seeing a war involving heavily armed forces because Serbia has most of the arms of the former Yugoslav army. Yugoslavia was a major arms supplier and trader, so to talk about the arms embargo being even-handed is a disgraceful distortion. The Serbs are using heavy artillery to slaughter women and children, because most of the men are not there to ethnically cleanse. The Serbs have no courage whatsoever. The Bosnian fighters have only rifles, yet hon. Members have repeated that, if we lifted the arms embargo, there would be more deaths. Anyone who uses that argument is looking forward to the death of Bosnia with the Bosnians being unable to fight because they have so few weapons.

An escalation would mean that the Bosnian people would have more equality and a better chance to defend themselves. That would be a less favourable option, but, if the west is unwilling to do anything, as my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Marshall) argued, that is the least we owe to Bosnia. I hope that we will do

Anyone who argues that the embargo is somehow even-handed and is preventing war is not attending to the reality of a heavily armed aggressor fighting an unarmed people, slaughtering their women and children and systematically raping women and girls in order to acquire territory by force.

I said at the beginning of my speech that stopping Serbian aggression is both morally right and in Britain's self-interest. Some enormously important and precious things are at stake, especially in the so-called new world order now that the certainties of the cold war, ugly as they may have been, have ended.

We are witnessing the absolute undermining of international law. The international community recognised Croatia as a full state in international law, the Serbs are invading and seeking to break up that state, yet nothing is being done.

We are seeing genocide which is a breach of the United Nations convention. The world learnt after Hitler's aggression that something had to be done to create international law to stop such evil war crimes as genocide, yet we are seeing it again and being told that nothing can be done.

The authority of the United Nations is being undermined. We have forces on the ground wearing United Nations helmets and operating under the United Nations flag yet the Serbian fighters are saying, "You cannot come here. You cannot bring food in here. We will not let you through." The United Nations is being belittled and humiliated and that is serious for the future of any order and decency in international law and world stability.

We are also seeing the destabilisation of Europe. If the war does not stop it is likely that it will spread to Kosovo; it is very likely that it will spread to Macedonia. If it spreads to Macedonia, and Greece and Turkey are involved, two NATO powers are potentially at war and that is extremely dangerous. It could escalate and it could suck our young men into an horrendous war in future if we do not stop it now.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) said, even if it does not escalate to that extent, about 2 million people have already been displaced. The number of refugees will desatabilise Europe. Germany has already taken large numbers of refugees and ugly, right-wing, fascist parties are growing in Germany because of the problem of refugees. Will we settle the conflict by allowing people to live at peace in their own countries or will there be millions of refugees with all the consequences of destabilisation flowing across Europe?

Finally, it is in our interest not to allow evil, fascist dictators, who wish to acquire territory by force and are willing to engage in genocide, to get away with it. If we cannot stop it in Serbia, there will be others.

The situation in the former Soviet Union is frightening. Petty dictators there are looking to see what the world community is doing about the conflict and will feel encouraged to take similar action. It is not a question of morality verses rationality and self-interest; it is in our interest to stop what is happening in Serbia now before it spreads, escalates and undermines any decency in international law and the authority of the United Nations.

The question is what is to be done. I agree with all those who have said that major errors have been made in the past. The way in which the states of the former Yugoslavia were recognised was wrong. It should have been made clear that recognition was dependent on the absolute undertaking not to seek to change any boundary by force and absolute protection for the human rights of minorities within those states. They should have been clearly entrenched as preconditions of recognition, but they were not.

The failure to consider limited air strikes earlier was disastrous. It was led by those who said that no troops could be risked on the ground. A generation, thinking of the Serbians as the good guys, roughly speaking, in the last war, could not see the reality of what was going on on this occasion. They were scared stiff by any possibility of troops on the ground and therefore rules out even the use of air strikes.

When the artillery and the mortars were raining down on Sarajevo—remember, on the hospital, on the buses full of orphans trying to get away—if there had been limited use of air strikes then, it might have turned back the Serbian aggression. However, errors were made and we must deal with the situation that we face now.

There are three options. We can carry on as now. Yes, sanctions can be tightened, but why were they not tightened earlier? Humanitarian aid will be increasingly difficult to deliver. We can rule out any military action. The Secretary of State may be about to do that in a few minutes. Serbian aggression will continue until the Serbs are satisfied that Bosnia will be destroyed and aggression will succeed.

Sanctions are important but they cannot work in time without something else alongside them. That is the road that we are on now. The Government talk as though they are examining other options and have plenty of time to do so. They do not. If they do not take some kind of urgent action, that will be the outcome.

The second option, the fashionable recent option, is air strikes. That is the "we have got to do something" option; the "we do not have a strategy, but it is dreadful just to let it go on; we do not want any troops on the ground, so let's bomb a few supposed supply lines and pretend that that will bring the conflict to an end" option. That is not a serious option.

When military spokesmen spoke recently at press conferences about the need for a serious strategy, they were objecting to air strikes without an underpinning strategy. Safe havens are the right way forward. I agree with the hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) who said that the troops on the ground are almost trying to create safe havens. The politicians are failing to go for that option. The senior military commanders might not be calling for it, but the troops on the ground are virtually trying to create safe havens.

We let Srebrenica be destroyed, then the Canadians went in, then the United Nations declared it a protected area and then the British Government said that they would help to protect it. Why did we not do that earlier? The only way forward is now to declare that the United Nations will create safe havens in the major area that is left of former Bosnia. Once safe havens have been created—that means no aggression and no attempt to take territory back by force—any aggression against United Nations forces will be answered with force. That means troops on the ground and a willingness to use force to protect what remains. Then, within what remains, we could deliver humanitarian aid and wait for sanctions to work.

Of course there would then have to be a new political settlement and we must seek not to reward any aggression and changing of boundaries by force. That is the only way forward. It is the option that we are creeping towards. It is the option for which our forces on the ground are asking. It is the only one that will give us any dignity and contain the ever-spreading situation.

I plead with the Secretary of State not to rule that out and not to keep sending the message to the Serbs that Britain will never back military action. That is like saying, "Go on offending. Go on being aggressive. We will never do anything to stop you."

9.19 pm

Mr. Peter Temple-Morris (Leominster): At this late hour and in order to try to let another colleague in, my colleagues will be relieved to hear that I do not intend to make the speech that I had planned but just to say a very few words.

There has been a lot of talk about sending our troops, about our doing this, that and the other, and about United Nations authority. Commendable as all those feelings are, we are dealing overwhelmingly with Uncle Sam, with our ally, the United States of America, and the burden on President Clinton at the moment is considerable.

To give a brief example of that, we had a debate in January on Iraq, on the coalition and the enforcement of the no-fly zone. It was announced that the coalition had, in its first despatch of aircraft, sent—if I remember rightly—114 planes into action to enforce, by bombing, the no-fly zone. Of those 114 we sent six, including two tankers, and the French sent six. There were 102 American combat aircraft. One could go through the Gulf war and give even starker examples.

So when it comes to intervention anywhere and when we talk about United Nations authority, not only do we need United Nations consent and Russian approval, we need also American leadership, call it what we may. We need better allied participation, and we need the planned and full use of all three armed services of the countries involved.

In other words, we must permit from the outset, at least in planning, the use of ground troops. It is not practical to speak of using air power without ground forces, and I am amazed at one or two colleagues on both sides, whose views I often agree with, and particularly one or two of my hon. Friends, who have been almost wildly impractical in advocating bombing without saying what else they would do.

This is really the outcome of what I call "war by television". It is very wrong, and my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend) in an elegant speech, dealt with this very well. As has come out in the debate, one is dealing with high emotions on both sides, encouraged by the sort of part-information that one is given on television. It is the duty of all politicians not to react to that, nor to react to our own emotions in what is indeed an appalling situation but rather to approach the situation in a practical way.

All I would say to Her Majesty's Government is that, while we will do what we can in the ways that have been described, the worst scenario of all would be to be gradually sucked into anything because we refused to face

9.21 pm

Mr. Roger Godsiff (Birmingham, Small Heath): There are no easy solutions in this terrible tragedy. I certainly cannot offer any words of wisdom which might throw new light on this terrible problem, but I should like to make one or two points.

We have all heard about the terrible atrocities being carried out, and there is no doubt, despite what was said by the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing), that the majority of the atrocities have been carried out by the Serbs and the Croatians and not by the Muslim communities. That is fact. It must also be pointed out that the current conflict was not precipitated by Bosnia. Bosnia did not start the break-up of Yugoslavia. That was brought about by the militant nationalism of Tudjman and Milosevic.

If it had been a question of individual republics going their own way when Yugoslavia began to fall apart, maybe the history of the past two years would have been different, but it has been conpounded and confused by Milosevic's dream of a greater Serbia. What does a greater Serbia mean? It means the annexation of parcels of land in an independent country by another country. That is what this is all about. Bosnia is an independent country and is recognised as one. It did not ask to become an independent country, nor did it ask for the break-up of Yugoslavia, but when Yugoslavia broke up Bosnia became an independent country.

Serbia is also an independent country, but Milosevic is not satisfied. His dream of a greater Serbia means that large parts of Bosnia need to be annexed and added to the Serbian state. Do we in the international community just stand by, despite all the difficulties, and watch this happen or do we try to do something?

I am not one of those who say that we should try to do something without suggesting what should be done. Let us be under no illusion, however: this is naked aggression by one state against another, made even worse by the fact that the aggressor is using not only the conventional machinery of war, but something much more insidious—it is using rape as a weapon, in order to humiliate a population.

I do not believe that anything will happen until a stalemate is reached. Serbia will be stopped only by force of one kind or another—unless, as I fear, it stops when it has attained its objectives. I understand all the difficulties involved, but if the international community—by which I mean the United Nations—cannot organise itself to take action, what right has it to deny an independent country which is under attack and being dismembered the right to obtain arms to defend itself. What right have we to do that?

That might be a valid argument if we were offering a possible way of resolving the problem or returning it to the negotiating table, but I fear that, as the weeks and months roll on, there will continue to be no action. If that is the case, can we honestly tell an independent country that it has not the right to obtain arms to defend itself? [HON. MEMBERS: "It is a civil war."] No, it is not. If it is a civil war, why has the international community imposed sanctions against Serbia? What right has it to impose sanctions against another independent country if it is not directly involved in what is going on? The international community is well aware that this is not a civil war in the traditional sense; it is naked aggression by one country against another.

The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) mentioned the Spanish civil war. I am sorry that he is not in the Chamber now. He pointed out that the other European powers did not wish to become involved in that war; it should be emphasised, however, that what the Spanish republican Government were asking for above all else was the right to arm and defend themselves. The international community said, "No, we will not stop you doing that"—and we all know what the consequences were.

I have listened to the other options that have been mentioned. I have grave doubts about the success of bombing gun targets. I do not believe that there is such a thing as pinpoint bombing; in any case, what will we do when the Serbs move their gun encampments into civilian areas—next to hospitals or mosques? I also have grave doubts about whether simply aiming at the supply lines in Bosnia would solve the problem. A few days ago, George Shultz said, "If you want to break the supply lines, you bomb all the way to Belgrade." He is right: that is the only way to disrupt the supply lines.

I heard what the leader of the Liberal Democrats said about safe havens, and I sympathised with his view to some extent. I have my doubts about whether the idea will work, but it should be on the table as a possibility.

I believe that we shall halt Serbian aggression only by massive military action. That might not be what we want, but we should be under no illusion: only by massive military intervention on the ground, involving American troops and those from other countries, shall we have any chance of halting Serbian aggression. I do not think that the international community will agree, for some valid reasons, but if the international community does not take that step and is not prepared to commit itself to halting Serbian aggression, it should not deny the legitimate, multiracial Government of Bosnia the right to defend themselves.

9.30 pm

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): We have had a thoughtful debate. Twenty-two right hon. and hon. Members have participated and expressed views as diverse as those held by our own electors. Divisions have occurred, not always across the Chamber but sometimes within our parties. There have been some strange alliances and there are some strange views, but they are held with conviction.

We have heard views as diverse as those expressed by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) and the hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers), who I think argued that there should be no military intervention in Bosnia. I contrast those with the views of my hon. Friends the Members for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone) and for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), who said that, no matter how long it takes and no matter how many troops are needed, there is a moral imperative for us to go into Bosnia.

We heard the cool logic of my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), who outlined our case, in contrast to the passion of my hon. Friends the Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds) and for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short), who set out their views with emotion and clarity. My hon. Friends the Members for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar), for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Godsiff) and for Leicester, South (Mr. Marshall) all suggested a cautious and reasoned approach, and all came to slightly different conclusions. My hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) gave us an insight based on an authentic account of his experiences in the former republic of Yugoslavia and in Bosnia and Croatia.

The words of hon. Members of all parties have added to the richness of the debate. I am sure that the Government have taken note of those words and experiences. Certainly I found them very valuable.

The Foreign Secretary began the debate in a reasoned and rational manner, perhaps weakening only as he reached his peroration, when he seemed to lose his nerve. He showed a certain lack of urgency which highlights, or perhaps epitomises, the Government's attitude. We felt that he showed a certain lack of resolve at that stage as if he was retreating under smoke. He mentioned Macedonia and Kosovo. He recognises the problem down the line, but he did not mention once the best tack which he could take to stabilise the situation and which is in his power, and that is to recognise Macedonia. It is already a member of the United Nations and has a democratically elected Government.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Douglas Hogg): By voting for the admission of Macedonia into the United Nations, we have recognised Macedonia.

Dr. Clark: I am delighted to hear that. It is an excellent point. I hope that before long we shall have accredited representatives there and that we shall do whatever we can to facilitate the financial situation. That issue has not been dealt with. At present, the citizens of that country can trade only in international currencies such as the deutschmark and the American dollar. The Government may have recognised Macedonia formally; they need to move speedily to the next step of putting into effect the apparatus of recognition. Only when that apparatus is in place can we begin to show that we support the boundaries of Macedonia and that we mean what we say. We can also support the 700 United Nations troops who are showing the determination of the United Nations towards the integrity of the state.

Although we have heard many fine words in the House today, perhaps there were more words of wisdom outside which, in a sense, sparked off this debate and shadowed it. I refer to the words of our only serving field marshal, Sir Richard Vincent. He is the chairman of NATO's military command and a former Chief of Defence Staff in the United Kingdom. In a sense, he gave us, as politicians, a timely reminder only a few days ago when he said:

"The first principle of war is . . . decide what you're trying to achieve before you go out there."

It was a timely reminder and showed a perceptive view. We have always supported the view of the primacy of political objectives in warfare. When the House first debated the deployment of British troops to Bosnia, I said:

"there must be a political resolution of the problem in Bosnia . . . The use of the military is merely a means to an end—we should never forget that objective."—[Official Report, 25 September 1992; Vol. 212, c. 180.]

It is important to remember that the use of the military is a means to an end.

It is right and proper to ask: what are we trying to achieve? What is the ultimate objective of our policy? I suggest that we are trying to reach the point at which the people currently living in Bosnia can live a life of some normality without the threat of rape, pillage and murder in the foreseeable future. That is what we are trying to achieve.

If we can use the military to force the warring factions to sign a peace agreement and then perhaps send in United Nations troops to ensure that that agreement is policed, that would be the first step along the path. It is useful to remind ourselves of what we are trying to achieve. As we move towards that objective, we must use other limited transitional objectives as building blocks to move closer to our ultimate objective. At present, the only United Nations objective that is backed by the use of force is the delivery of humanitarian aid.

For colleagues to argue that the flow of aid is diminishing does not serve us well. I have seen the figures for the past week—1,260 tonnes of aid were delivered by our convoys. That does not show any marked diminution of delivery.

Mr. Ashdown: I am listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman's argument. Does he realise that, because of the Croatian fighting, all of the aid is coming through not Croatia but Serbia? The hon. Gentleman referred earlier to cool logic. Will he explain the cool logic of bombing the only supply lines that are providing that humanitarian aid to Bosnia?

Dr. Clark: Perhaps I could come to that point. When there was an intervention on the right hon. Gentleman, he insisted on dealing with the point when he came to it. I will deal with the point, because it is important.

We are fortunate that we have not had to use much force. The mere presence of our armed forces, their determination and skill and the negotiating skill of the local commanders has meant that force has, by and large, not been necessary. We are now approaching the time when we must pay more attention perhaps to extending the

We may need to use military action to develop the humanitarian aid. Obviously, the military means of achieving the objective are varied and many. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) has set out the views of the Labour party relating to air strikes, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland repeated them earlier. They both made it clear that the action would be designed to "bring the slaughter to an early end."

We have said repeatedly that the Labour party recognises that that entails risks for the safety of British personnel in the area.

The Government have shown that they do not have a closed mind about military action. If the Government pursue that line, they must take the necessary precautions. They must either deploy additional personnel to protect the soldiers delivering humanitarian aid or they must withdraw those soldiers. Clearly, it would be highly irresponsible to carry out air strikes without taking those precautions.

We recognise that it is not possible with one or a few strikes to do anything other than hamper the supply lines. But the aim is to show our intent and determination to the Serbs that they must sign the peace agreement. I remind the House that we are nearly there. There are three parts to the peace agreement. The Serbs have signed two. Only the map part remains to be determined. As I understood him, the Foreign Secretary made it clear this afternoon that the precise boundaries on the map were negotiable. He said that there was still room for manoeuvre on the boundaries. Only last weekend, Lord Owen offered a major development when he suggested in advance of the implementation of the plan a corridor protected by the United Nations linking the two Serb areas.

I should like to take it a stage further. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East has also said that we have an inescapable moral duty to do everything within our power to end the slaughter of innocent people which we witness on a daily basis. That is why I wish to mention another type of military action which could be used to safeguard non-combatants—the establishment of safe areas. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has proposed such a move. I suggest that the Government should not shut off that option from the range that they may be considering.

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces told me earlier this week that it was "impossible in the absense of an effective peace agreement to envisage the establishment of genuine safe areas"—[Official Report, 27 April 1993; Vol. 223, c. 393.]

I should be interested to know whether he was referring to the overall settlement or simply to local arrangements. If the latter is the case, I heartily agree with him. It would be difficult to establish safe havens without some form of local establishment. However, if he believes that safe havens cannot be established until after a general political settlement for the whole of Bosnia, he is being far too cautious. We have never ruled out that option.

I hope that the Secretary of State will urgently reconsider his view because the establishment of safe havens may turn out to be one of the few methods available to the United Nations to ensure the protection of non-combatants. I repeat that we believe that there may be an opportunity to establish agreed safe havens possibly for the different ethnic groups. There is an opportunity for lateral thinking there. There is an opportunity to explore some different approaches.

Clearly, the United Nations has not been best organised for military action. Yet virtually all hon. Members accept that if any military action is taken, it must be under the auspices of the United Nations.

On 8 March, the Secretary of State for Defence said that the Government would consider favourably any request from the UN to provide further military personnel. Have the Government done so?

In the longer term, a lasting and peaceful settlement of the dispute is required and the UN now needs to reconsider how to achieve that given the recent Serbian rejection of the Vance-Owen proposals. Some hon. Members believe that those proposals are dead—as dead as a dodo, as one hon. Member said. Others believe that they are still on the table for negotiation. We share the latter belief.

The international community may feel that it is right to impose the Vance-Owen proposals on Bosnia, or it may decide to try to develop some other type of plan. Has the Secretary of State any views about the earlier discussions held prior to and at the Lisbon conference in May 1992, when a map drawn up by our compatriot, Mr. Darwin, was agreed and signed by two sides of the conflict? That agreement was given a fair blessing by the Bosnian Government, only to be withdrawn later. I am merely asking a question about that agreement, but I believe that we should keep all our options open at this stage.

The Labour party firmly believes that the authority to sanction the use of force in Bosnia is the UN. The Labour party is committed, under clause 7 of its rule book, to work for the strengthening of the UN. The Opposition have argued consistently that the UN should be involved not only in the Bosnian conflict, but in many others.

We should remember that, according to the UN charter, one of the reasons, ironically, that it was founded was "to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war".

We have seen on our television screens the ghastly effects of war in Bosnia and now is the time, in the words of that charter,

"to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women".

9.47 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): Today we have experienced the House at its most stimulating, with a series of powerful and convincing speeches from both sides of the House, expressing both sides of the argument. It was one of those rare occasions when, as each hon. Member rose, the House waited to find what he or she had to say, having no knowledge in advance, in most cases, of what that might be.

Speeches were delivered with great conviction. I listened to my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) put forward strongly his long-held views. I then heard my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend) put a contrary case with equal passion and conviction. There were many examples of that phenomenon.

Much of the debate has centred on the role of the United Nations. Some hon. Members have expressed understandable disappointment that it has not, so far, been able to realise the aspirations that we would have wished to see realised. The right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) was perhaps unwise to describe the United Nations as having been humiliated and having failed in its objectives. It is not unreasonable to point out that in a significant respect the United Nations has already achieved more in Bosnia than it has achieved in any comparable crisis since its creation.

If one looks at the ghastly wars that have taken place in recent years, it is only on this occasion that the United Nations, with the tremendous contribution of British forces, along with other forces, has been able to save hundreds of thousands of lives.

One remembers that the United Nations was unable to make any useful contribution during the genocide in Cambodia under Pol Pot. Hon. Members have referred to the continuing agony and anger felt about that civil war, which has gone on for a decade, during which hundreds of thousands of people have been murdered. A tremendous number of atrocities have been committed in Cambodia, but the United Nations has been unable to make a significant contribution to saving lives.

Therefore, although it is understandable that we should be disappointed that the war has not been brought to an end, the United Nations deserves a tribute, which it is right and proper to give. It has not failed in Bosnia; it has already saved the lives of tens of thousands, possibly

I also listened to the argument that we have a special responsibility in the former Yugoslavia that does not apply in other parts of the world. I can understand that, at a political level, we in the United Kingdom clearly have a security interest in stability in Europe. However, I hope that hon. Members will not advance that argument on moral grounds when they demand at the same time that any action must be taken in the name of the United Nations. The UN can make no moral distinction between intervening in Bosnia and intervening in Angola or Cambodia—its responsibility is to the global community. Those hon. Members who called for UN intervention, but sought to imply that it must be made in Bosnia even if not elsewhere, displayed an inappropriate inconsistency.

We are all seeking to address the moral and ethical issues. I do not believe that either side of the argument has a monopoly on ethical wisdom, but sometimes the arguments are advanced as if that were so. I listened carefully to the remarks of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short), who called for the ending of the arms embargo. At first glance, her argument that people had a right to defend themselves and that the Bosnian Muslims had a right to self-defence seemed acceptable and reasonable. Who could possibly take exception to that view?

However, the hon. Lady knows as well as other hon. Members that, when one lifts an embargo and the international community starts supplying arms to a war of particular viciousness, one has no control. The donors of those weapons have no control over how they are used. When we are already aware that vicious atrocities have been committed by all parties in the war, it is not sufficient to say that, because most of the atrocities may have been committed by the Serbians, it is ethically acceptable to provide arms to other parties in the conflict, which may also use them for similar purposes.

Let us imagine that we, or the international community, supplied arms to the Bosnian Muslims or the Bosnian Croats for self-defence and that, one month later, a conflict such as we saw a week or so ago broke out among Croats and Muslims, with British troops in the middle of the conflict trying to sort out the mess, and British soldiers ended up being killed by those who had been provided with weapons by the international community—ostensibly for their own self-defence, not for aggressive purposes. The ethical argument cannot be made in favour of lifting the embargo when that could be the outcome which we would have on our consciences and with which we would have to live.

Ms Short: I want to make it clear that in my speech I said that I preferred the option of the United Nations taking action to halt Serbian aggression and the strategy of safe havens, but that if we did not adopt that policy, it seemed wrong to continue the arms embargo and not allow the Bosnian people to defend themselves.

Mr. Rifkind: I understand that argument, but the hon. Lady cannot avoid the consequences of the actions that she advocates. If those actions were to lead to the arms being used, not just in self-defence, but for the commission of atrocities, all of us—including the hon. Lady—would feel ashamed of the action that we had initiated.

Mr. Frank Field: Does not the Secretary of State feel slightly uncomfortable about the fact that, having been on the winning side in four elections fought on the need for a balance of terror on both sides, and on the success of that policy, he now thinks that the same strategy would not work in Bosnia?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman's argument is uncharacteristically illogical. It is one thing in a state of peace to ensure that a deterrent is maintained between two potential aggressors by ensuring that those who wish to defend themselves from aggression are properly armed; it is quite a different matter to start supplying arms to one side in a vicious war and believe that one is contributing to peace.

As for whether this is a civil war, let us not get into an argument about semantics. Of course it is not purely a civil war; of course there are characteristics about the war that make it similar to many civil wars. The crucial point to be borne in mind is that because the vast majority of those taking part in the actual fighting are Bosnian Serbs, Bosnian Muslims and Bosnian Croats—until a year ago, they were living in the same villages, streets and communities—we cannot treat this in exactly the same way as an invasion of one country by another.

That is why the parallels sometimes drawn with the Gulf or the Falklands, with respect to military intervention, are utterly wrong. In those cases there was a military solution if the political will existed. In both cases, the political will did exist, and the invader was eventually expelled from the country it had invaded. But no Bosnian Serb, Muslim or Croat can be expelled from Bosnia by a United Nations army or by other forces.

Mr. Cormack: Of course, many of the Muslims have indeed been expelled from their own country by the Serbs. Would my right hon. and learned Friend acknowledge —this has already been acknowledged often—that this war was started by Belgrade and is still being supplied by Belgrade? Almost daily, tanks are going from Serbia into Bosnia.

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, of course. My hon. Friend is right to say that a huge amount of unwarranted intervention by the former Republic of Yugoslavia, in the form of Serbia and Montenegro, is going on. That is why the Government support the blockade of Serbia—to force it to change its ways.

Mr. Wareing: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Rifkind: I am afraid that I do not have much longer to speak.

We always listen with great care to my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath). He called on the Government instantly to rule out all possible use of force, either now or in the future. In that respect he was unwise. I believe that we should pay considerable attention to the counsel of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King). It is important for several reasons to act in the way that he suggested.

First, it is important to think about the consequences of what we say and how it will be heard in Belgrade. It is important to ensure that the Serbians cannot take for granted certain forms of policy, including inaction on the part of the international community. It is also not simply the policy of the United Kingdom or of any one country that matters. If we are to influence the Serbian Government's behaviour, it is crucial that they see that the international community continues to speak with a single voice so as to put the maximum pressure on that Government and to force a change of policy.

If, at this delicate moment in the development of policy, any one Government—especially the United States, France and the United Kingdom—made unilateral statements of the sort that my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup suggested, that would do a disservice to the cause of maintaining the maximum international pressure on the Serbian Government to achieve the policies that are vital if the fighting is to be brought to an end.

Of course I pay tribute to the sincerity with which the right hon. Member for Yeovil advances his proposals for safe havens and enclaves. No one can object in principle to the development of safe enclaves, if they are a practical proposition, but we should pay close attention to a remark by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore). He told the right hon. Member for Yeovil that the 150 troops in Srebrenica are there only by the consent of the Serbian forces, who allow them to enter the city.

Essentially, the right hon. Member for Yeovil must realise that a policy of safe havens can operate only when a ceasefire has been agreed or if those who urge it are prepared to use force to impose it.

Mr. Ashdown: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for giving way. He has been very generous. How does he account for the fact that a safe haven has been declared, not negotiated, by the United Nations in Zepa and Gorazde? May we take it from the Secretary of State's answer that as the UN has declared safe havens, the Government do not agree and are not prepared to support that declaration? I remind the Secretary of State that they were declared, not negotiated.

Mr. Rifkind: The UN has, of course, declared its desire to see those areas treated as safe havens to ensure the physical safety of those living there. We are having a practical discussion as to whether the use of force and

The right hon. Gentleman cannot escape from the fact that unless there is a ceasefire or the consent of the Serbian forces, unless he wishes to call for the use of force to impose a safe haven and if he wishes to call for the use of ground forces for that purpose—[Interruption.] The right hon. Gentleman has talked about air power. He must address himself to the fact that earlier he argued that ground forces should be used to achieve safe havens. He must appreciate the fact that without a vast increase in the number of forces on the ground, and without a commitment of the kind that would last many years and risk massive casualties, he is setting out a proposal that is impractical and unrealistic.

The Government will continue to use all the powers at our disposal to ensure a blockade of the Serbian Government and to ensure that other options are considered with the seriousness that they deserve. However, we owe it to the people of Bosnia not to bring forward proposals which are based on emotion and which are not justified by honest judgment of the practical way in which they would help the process of peace in Bosnia at the present time.

We do no service to the cause of peace by responding to arguments that are essentially based on a failure to realise the consequences that they would bring about.

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS &c.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

INTERNATIONAL IMMUNITIES AND PRIVILEGES

Resolved,

That the draft Treaty on Open Skies (Privileges and Immunities) Order 1993, which was laid before this House on 24th February, be approved.—[Mr. Robert G. Hughes.]

NORTHERN IRELAND

Resolved,

That the draft Access to Health Records (Northern Ireland) Order 1993, which was laid before this House on 8th March, be approved.—[Mr. Robert G. Hughes.]

Question agreed to.

Northern Ireland Legislation (Timing)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Robert G. Hughes.]

10 pm

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): I am particularly glad to have this opportunity to return to the question of the Order in Council method of legislating for Northern Ireland. I suppose that I should describe that procedure briefly, but time is short. I refer those who may read the report of this debate—if anyone does—to the description of that procedure in the report of the Hansard Society commission on the legislative process.

Normally when we criticise the Order in Council procedure, we do so on the grounds that it is undemocratic and that it deprives this House generally, and Members who represent Northern Ireland in particular, of the opportunity of debating and proposing amendments to Northern ireland legislation. We have pressed that argument several times in the House over the years.

I want to open a different argument tonight. I want to argue that the Order in Council procedure, as well as being objectionable in democratic terms, is also inefficient. I should be able to produce evidence to show that it is inefficient and produces delay and confusion in the legislative process with regard to Northern Ireland.

When we consider legislation generally in Great Britain, we find that there is a procedure: at the beginning of the Session there is the Queen's Speech in which an announcement is made about the legislation to be introduced during that Session so that people know in advance what is going to happen. Generally, the Session sees that legislation through. Occasionally new things come forward and sometimes things are not passed in a Session. Nevertheless, there is a pattern.

There is no equivalent with regard to Northern Ireland. It is true—I acknowledge this and it has been very useful to me on this occasion—that the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland sends letters twice a year to the political parties of the Members for Northern Ireland in which he outlines the Orders in Council which may come forward in the forthcoming weeks and months. That is very useful to us, but the information does not go beyond us.

The "Weekly Information Bulletin" of the House of Commons provides a schedule of Northern Ireland legislation. That is very useful, but I am afraid that the schedule is sometimes misleading because it does not indicate the disposal of the legislation at the end of the day. It does not say whether something has been withdrawn or is continuing. When the Minister replies, will he undertake to inform the editor of the "Weekly Information Bulletin" whenever a completed order is about to issue? That would make the list much more useful to hon. Members and to other people in Northern Ireland.

I shall concentrate on the problem of delay, and deal first with negative resolution orders. There should not be problems with such orders because, as hon. Members know, they are not debated in the House. An Act for Great Britain authorises the making of an order by resolution and it should be a simple matter for the draftsman in Northern Ireland to modify the Great Britain Bill, if necessary, for any differences in the legislative history of Northern Ireland and to introduce it as the Bill goes for Royal Assent. The greatest difficulty about a negative resolution order ought to be catching an appropriate Privy Council meeting to make it.

Of the 20 Orders in Council in 1992, eight were made by negative resolution. It should have been possible to bring those eight orders into operation at the same time as the Acts that they followed, but it seems that three of those orders are not yet in operation. They are the orders dealing with competition and services, offshore safety and the prescription of medical products, and they all relate to Acts made in the same year which are themselves not yet in force.

The Northern Ireland Office managed to get it right with one of the other five orders—the Still Birth (Definition) (Northern Ireland) Order 1992 which came into operation on 1 October, the same day as the Still Birth (Definition) Act 1992. Of the other four orders, the Radioactive Material (Road Transport) Order 1992 came into operation on 12 April 1992 while the relevant Act, the Radioactive Material (Road Transport) Act 1991, came into force on 28 August 1991. The Home Loss Payments (Northern Ireland) Order 1992 came into operation on 5 August 1992 and the corresponding sections of the Planning and Compensation Act 1991—that is, sections 68 and 69—came into force on 25 September 1991. The Social Security (Mortgage Interest Payments) (Northern Ireland) Order came into operation on 11 June 1992 while the corresponding Act came into force on 16 March 1992. The Firearms (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order came into operation on 16 September and the corresponding Act on 16 March.

Respectively, those four orders had delays of nine, 11, three and six months, but it should have been simple to get them spot on. It may be said that it does not make much difference. Is it important that an order to vary the duration of a firearms certificate is available in Northern Ireland six months after the legislation applies in England? In some cases it does make a difference. If enabling mortgage interest to be paid directly to lenders was good, why should it be avaialble in Northern Ireland three months after it was available everywhere else? For 11 months people in Northern Ireland whose homes may have been compulsorily acquired could have received lower compensation by not benefiting during that period from the tenfold increase in the maximum home loss payments. Is that right? That deals with negative resolution orders.

Affirmative orders are subject to substantial delays, the worst of which occurred with the Children (Northern Ireland) Order. In the list that we received from the Secretary of State it was said that the purpose of that order was,

"to revise, harmonise and bring together the private and public law affecting children in a civil code along the lines of the Children Act 1989."

That order has been on the Secretary of State's list since April 1991. At that time, it was described under the heading of proposals intended to be published before the end of the 1990-91 Session. In the letter of November 1991 it was under the heading of proposals intended to be published before the Easter recess and it was under the same heading in January 1992 and January 1993, although they were three different Easter recesses.

It is now four years since the passing of the equivalent English Act and 12 years since the Black report which reviewed the whole area. My hon. Friend the Member for

[Mr. David Trimble]

Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) told me that when he first came to the House he pressed for a children Bill to be introduced. We have constantly pressed the matter but there has been a great delay. We are four years behind the Great Britain legislation. The Minister may say in defence that the Government have had difficulties fine-tuning the legislation for Northern Ireland and that they are still consulting various people. If they are, they are consulting secretly, because there has been no consultation with political parties and no local political input or discussion. Against that background, one must ask whether there is any effective ministerial push.

Another bad case relates to environmental protection. There was legislation for Great Britain in 1990 and a useful Select Committee report pressed for something to be done. There was reference in November 1991 to an integrated pollution control and control of air pollution measure, but that disappeared from the lists. In recent lists there has been reference to litter, with an instrument

"to replicate for Northern Ireland the provisions of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 which relate to litter."

It has been cut down from the full scope of the 1990 Act to that small bit, but three years later we still do not have it.

Another example with an environmental element concerns agriculture. In the April 1991 list there was reference to the Agriculture (Miscellaneous Provisions) Order and we were told that that was "to extend and rationalise existing legislation, for example, to ensure a reasonable balance of interests between the agriculture industry and the maintenance of rural areas in general."

There was a sort of conservation element there. It was listed for publication before the end of the 1990-91 session, but it disappeared from view. In 1993, the lists again refer to that order, but it is now described as being

"to replicate for Northern Ireland the provisions of section 17 of the Agriculture Act 1986 by requiring the Minister to take into account certain matters such as conservation; to allow grants for the purpose of encouraging rural development".

The purpose seems to have changed by going back to an Act of 1986, for which we do not have an equivalent in Northern Ireland. Again, there was a delay of seven years.

In some cases there is confusion as well as delay, certainly in regard to road traffic. The Road Traffic (Amendment) Order was mentioned in lists published between November 1990 and January 1991. That was replaced by the Road Traffic (Offenders) Order in the 1991 list, and that stayed until January 1992. Then we had what was described as a "Roads Proposal" published in October 1992 in relation to a roads measure, apparently for a different purpose from the other two provisions. That introduced into Northern Ireland provisions enacted for Great Britain relating to roads and street works. In other words, as I say, there is confusion as well as delay.

It is even worse when we consider criminal justice. There was reference to a Criminal Justice (Fines and Penalties) Order in the lists from November 1991 right through to January 1992. That referred to

"replicating some of the provisions in the English Criminal Justice Act 1988."

But that has not come forward. In the January 1993 list we had another instrument, the Criminal Justice (Children's Evidence, etc.) Order which was,

"to replicate for Northern Ireland the provisions of the Criminal Justice Act 1991."

On the April 1993 list those two disappeared and we had instead a single Criminal Justice Order which seemed to include the purposes of the other two. But that has not yet been published. Instead, we have had a big consultation paper published entitled "Crime in the Community", covering the purpose of one of those measures, and we are left to wonder what will happen, for it will be months before the consultation is completed.

I am glad that the Minister of State is to reply to the debate because when I think of criminal justice provisions I am reminded of the old Army adage about order, counter-order and disorder. It seems that in the criminal justice sphere we are now in the disorder situation. There is delay because we are referring to Great Britain Acts of 1991 not being introduced in Northern Ireland, and there is confusion throughout the system. Clearly, the system is not operating efficiently.

I could give other examples, but I shall not go on because I am anxious to give the Minister ample time in which to respond. The few examples that I have given show that there are delays and that in some important areas there are serious delays. There is also confusion and failure to give the public adequate information about the operation of the legislative process as it affects Northern Ireland.

I appreciate that the Minister may not be able to respond to all the detailed examples that I have given, but I particularly ask him to explain the cause of the present state of affairs. The Order in Council procedure is truncated. In relation to negative resolution orders, it should be easy to produce them on time. The procedure with affirmative resolution orders may take somewhat longer. But why does it take so long?

It seems to take longer to produce legislation for Northern Ireland by the truncated Order in Council procedure than it takes to produce legislation for England by proper Bills. Why that delay? Does it arise in the Northern Ireland Departments from which instructions are issued to the legislative draftsman's office? Does the delay occur in the draftsman's office, in the drafting and sorting out procedure? Does it arise in the Minister's office because policy decisions are involved from time to time?

Some of my hon. Friends suggest that the recent inter-party talks absorb so much interest and time of Northern Ireland Office Ministers that that might be the cause of the delay. I doubt whether that is the cause, because although I have given examples from 1992 I could give many others relating to other periods.

I asked a former colleague the other day whether he knew the cause. Without revealing the office in which the conversation took place, he told me that he was in a Government office not so long ago and mentioned the matter and asked whether there was a problem. The people to whom he addressed the question laughed but would not reveal anything further. I am glad to know that some civil servants observe the Official Secrets Act in that respect, if no other.

Whatever the cause might be, responsibility must lie with the Ministers in the Northern Ireland Office, because they have presided over that inefficient system. I shall not repeat to the Minister the comments that I made the other Monday night, which seemed to have some effect. There is a case to answer and a need for solutions, not just in terms of sorting out the Order in Council procedure, but in terms of the legislative process generally.

I referred earlier to the report of the Hansard Society commission on the legislative process. Paragraph 363 refers briefly to the evidence that it received from Members of Parliament from Northern Ireland and other regions of the United Kingdom. It said:

"We hope that their special problems will be considered sympathetically—especially the case for returning to legislating for Northern Ireland by Acts rather than by Orders".

The case for so doing is irrefutable.

To show how easily it can be done, let us examine the home loss payments order made in 1992, which followed two sections of the Planning and Compensation Act 1991. The Minister will see that the Act covers two different jurisdictions—England and Wales, and Scotland. For Scotland, it has to deal with a different legislative history and a different legislative background and to introduce different sections. Parts of the Act deal with England and parts deal with Scotland. It would have been easy to include within the Act further sections dealing with Northern Ireland; there would then not have been a nine-month delay in introducing the increase in home loss payments for people in Northern Ireland. That is an obvious course to follow.

It would also help to solve the problem if there were proper scrutiny of the Northern Ireland Office. The fact that it is the only Department of State not subject to scrutiny must inevitably encourage people, or make it easier for them, to take it easy. I suspect that that is what happens with the Northern Ireland legislative process.

10.12 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Michael Mates): The hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) has long made clear his own dissatisfaction, and that of his party, with the present arrangements for legislating for Northern Ireland. His choice of subject for this debate therefore comes as no surprise, but I welcome the opportunity to explain how we see the situation and why, contrary to some of his assertions, it is wrong to blame the present method of legislating for Northern Ireland for any lengthy delays in introducing, where appropriate, legislation for Northern Ireland on similar lines to that already enacted for the rest of the United Kingdom.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has said before now that the present system for legislation is not entirely satisfactory. To that extent, we would not quarrel with the hon. Gentleman. That system arises from the present constitutional arrangements for dealing with Northern Ireland's affairs. Those arrangements will continue unless and until it proves possible to reach agreement on new political institutions for Northern Ireland.

However, if and when new institutions can be agreed upon—it is to that end that my right hon. and learned Friend is seeking to promote a new round of political talks—then those institutions will doubtless assume responsibility for many issues involving the need for legislation. They, rather than Westminster Ministers, will undoubtedly take control of a range of matters and be able to set their own legislative programme in those areas. That should lessen the need for so much of Northern Ireland's legislation to be dealt with in this Parliament, and remove the grounds for many or most of the complaints that he has voiced.

However, in the absence of new political institutions, we will need to continue with present legislative arrangements. These take account of, indeed arise from, the fact that, until the introduction of direct rule, Northern Ireland had a Legislature and Executive of its own and therefore had its own body of legislation. It has been the policy of successive Governments to seek to return legislative and executive powers to locally elected representatives as part of an overall political settlement if a suitable basis for this can be found.

To that end, we have been anxious to preserve a separate body of powers for ready transfer to any new political institutions. The present arrangements, whereby legislation for Northern Ireland, other than in the so-called excepted field, is generally made by Order in Council under the Northern Ireland Act 1974, has seemed the best way of preserving such a body of powers.

The use of the Order in Council procedure has, of course, its limitations. As hon. Members of the hon. Gentleman's party do not hesitate, rightly, to point out at frequent intervals, such orders are unamendable once laid in draft before Parliament. It is for this reason that the practice of publishing proposals for draft orders in Council has been adopted. Such proposals are circulated to Northern Ireland Members and to the Northern Ireland spokesmen of the major political parties in Great Britain and to other interested bodies in Northern Ireland.

The hon. Gentleman's point about the information on Northern Ireland legislation provided in the House of Commons weekly bulletin is a matter for the House. If it is felt that the extra information that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned should be included, the Northern Ireland Office would be happy to provide any assistance that it can. However, it is not a matter for us.

The process of consultation and the frequent need to adapt to local circumstances provisions originally prepared for Great Britain inevitably mean that Northern Ireland legislation is made some time after that in Great Britain. But I am sure that it is necessary in the interests both of getting legislation technically right and of giving Northern Ireland Members and other representatives of opinion in Northern Ireland the opportunity to coment on legislative proposals before they are set in the concrete of a draft Order in Council.

Of course some legislation for Northern Ireland intended to follow Great Britain policy closely has been introduced up to several years after the Great Britain legislation, and the hon. Member for Upper Bann has given us some examples. The reasons are various and include the need to give priority to some legislation over other and the inevitable limitations caused by finite resources among others.

I should, however, remind the House that social security and financial provisions, for example, and other legislation which could have a direct financial effect on citizens in Northern Ireland is virtually always implemented at the same time as the relevant Great Britain legislation. Indeed, the negative resolution procedure for making Northern Ireland Orders in Council provides a ready means for achieving speedy implementation of such so-called parity legislation or when it is otherwise appropriate.

On the other hand, delays may occur because some powers may simply not be required in Northern Ireland as early as equivalent powers are needed in Great Britain. The recent financial provisions order to which the hon. Gentleman alluded is a case in point.

On occasion, too, there may also be advantage to be gained by having the opportunity to see how Great Britain legislation works out in practice before proceeding to introduce equivalent law for Northern Ireland. Furthermore, the different social mores of people in Northern Ireland from those in Great Britain have in the past been grounds for either delaying or indeed not implementing Northern Ireland legislation equivalent to Great Britain legislation.

So when talking about the timing of Northern Ireland legislation and delays in producing it, the House will recognise that there are normally perfectly good reasons for such so-called delays, including the need to take proper account of the different legislative and administrative history of Northern Ireland. It is therefore not unreasonable for the preparation even of legislation which does follow Great Britain legislation in its broad principles to take a little time.

That is not to say that there have not been and, in the nature of things, will not be occasions when it takes longer than is strictly necessary for legislation to be made. We are continually looking at ways of minimising the time it takes to produce necessary legislation without of course resorting to cutting corners when it comes to appropriate consultation.
